[Different rules apply] if, however, those on the extremes can see those in the center, but those on the extremes cannot see each other, he may separate from those on the extremes for those on the center and from those in the center for those on the extremes. He may not, however, separate from those on one extreme for those on the other extreme.

22 [The following laws apply to] olive trees: All the trees on one of the sides of a city, e.g., all of the olive trees on the entire western side or the entire eastern side of a city are considered as being from one field and one portion of pe'ah should be left for all of them.

23 A person who harvests a portion of his vineyard from either side in order to lessen [the demand] on the vines so that the other clusters will have more room and increase in size is called one who reduces. We already explained that a person who harvests from one side is not considered as one who reduces. Therefore he must leave the amount of pe'ah appropriate for the entire field even though he harvested [with the intent of selling the grapes in] the marketplace. If, however, he reduces [the produce on the vines with the intent of] selling [the produce] in the marketplace, he should not leave pe'ah for the produce that he took off. [Nevertheless,] if he reduces [the produce on the vines with the intent of] taking it home, he should leave the amount of pe'ah appropriate for the entire field from [the grapes] he left to be trodden for the vat.

1 What is meant by leket? Produce that fall from the sickle when one is reaping or falls from his hand when he gathers the stalks [of grain] and harvests. [The above applies] provided only one or two stalks fell. If, however, three fell at the same time, the three belong to the owner of the field. If grain fell from behind the sickle or behind one's hand, it is not leket even if only one stalk fell.

2 When he was harvesting by hand without a sickle, the stalks that fall from his hand are not leket. When, however, one pulls out crops that are usually pulled out by hand, those which fall from his hand are leket. If he was harvesting [with a sickle] or pulling out crops that are usually pulled out and after he harvested an armful [of produce] or after he pulled out a handful, [the produce] fell from his hand because he was struck by a thorn, [the produce] belongs to the owner.

3 [The following laws apply if a person] was harvesting and left a stalk of grain standing without harvesting it, although he harvested all the grain around it. If its tip could reach the standing grain at its side and it could be harvested with that grain, it belongs to the owner of the field. If not, it belongs to the poor.

4 [The following laws apply if] there were two stalks next to each other, the inner stalk could be harvested with [the remainder of] the standing grain and the outer could be harvested together with the inner stalk, but not with the standing grain. The inner stalk is retrieved and it retrieves the outer stalk. For it is considered as falling from the sickle, even though it was not harvested yet.
Stalks that are among the straw belong to the owner of the field.

5 [The following laws apply when] the wind scattered sheaves [of grain] and the harvest belonging to the owner becomes mixed with the leket. We estimate how much leket the field would produce and that amount is given to the poor. [A greater amount is not required] because this comes about due to forces beyond one's control. How much is this measure? Four kabbin for an area in which a kor of wheat would grow.

6 What should the owner of a field do if leket fell to the ground, it was not collected by the poor and he made a grainheap of his harvest on this earth? He should move his grain pile to another place, [but] all the stalks that are touching the ground belong to the poor. [The rationale is that] we do not know which of them was leket and whenever there is a doubt concerning [whether produce] is from the presents for the poor, [it is given] to the poor. [This is implied by the term (Leviticus 23:22 :] "Leave," i.e., leave from your produce for them.

7 Why don't we make an estimation and give the poor [the amount that would be left as leket? Because [the owner] transgressed and made his grainheap on leket, he was penalized, even if he did so inadvertently. Even if the leket was barley and he made a grainheap of wheat upon it, even if he called for the poor [to collect the leket] and they did not come, and even if others made the grainheap without his knowledge, all of the produce touching the ground belongs to the poor.

8 [The following laws apply when a person] must fertilize his field before the poor collect the leket in it. If his loss will be greater than the loss to the poor, he is permitted to fertilize it. If the loss to the poor will be greater than his loss, it is forbidden for him to fertilize. If he collects all the leket and places it on the fence until a poor person comes and collects it, that is an expression of the quality of piety.

9 When kernels of grain are found in ant holes, if the holes were located in the midst of the standing grain, [the kernels] belong to the owner of the field, for the poor people do not have a right to anything in the standing grain. If they were located in the place which was harvested, they belong to the poor, because perhaps they were taken from the leket. Even if the kernel [in the hole] is black, we do not say that it was from the previous year, because whenever there is a doubt concerning [whether produce] is leket, we consider it as leket.

10 When a stalk of leket becomes intermingled with the grain heap, the owner must separate two stalks. On the first, he says: "If this is leket, it belongs to the poor. If it is not leket, may the tithes for which I am obligated from this stalk be fixed on the other stalk." He then goes back and makes this same stipulation on the second stalk. He then gives one of the stalks to the poor and the other one will be [part of] the tithes.

11 A person should not hire a worker with the intent that his son collect the leket after him. Sharecroppers, tenant farmers, and a person who purchased standing grain from a colleague to harvest, by contrast, may have their sons collect after them. A worker may bring his wife and his children to collect leket after him. [This applies] even if he hired him with the intent that he receive half of the harvest, one third, or one fourth as his wage.

12 A person who does not allow the poor to collect the leket, allows one but does not allow another, or helps one of them, [giving him an advantage] over his colleagues is considered as stealing from the poor.

13 It is forbidden for a person to have a lion or the like rest in his field so that the poor will fear and flee. When there are those among the poor who are not entitled to collect leket, if the owner can rebuke them, he should. If not, he should allow them [to collect it as an expression of] the ways of peace.

14 If a person [desires to] declare [produce falling] as leket ownerless, if the majority has already fallen, it is not ownerless. [The rationale is that] once the majority has left his hand, he no longer has authority over it.

15 What is meant by peret? One grape or two grapes that separate from the cluster in the midst of the harvest. If three grapes fall at the same time, they are not peret.

16 When a person was reaping [his grape harvest] and cut off a cluster, [that cluster] became entangled with its leaves and it fell to the ground and became divided into individual grapes, it is not peret. If, however, [the reaper] was harvesting and throwing the clusters to the earth, [more stringent rules apply]. Even if half the cluster is discovered [broken into individual grapes], it is peret. Similarly, [even] if an entire cluster was broken up into individual grapes, they are peret. When a person places a basket below the vine at the time he is harvesting, he is stealing from the poor.

17 What is an olelet? This is a small cluster which is not thick like ordinary clusters and does not have a kataf, nor are its grapes notfot one on top of the other, but rather scattered. If it has a kataf, but not a nataf or a nataf, but not a kataf, it belongs to the owner of the vineyard. If there is a doubt, it should be given to the poor.

18 What is kataf? Small clusters connected to the central stem [of the larger cluster], one on top of the other. [What is] nataf? Grapes connected to the center stem and hanging down. [The above applies] provided all of the individual grapes in the ollelot can touch the palm of his hand.

Why is such [an underdeveloped cluster] called an ollel? Because it is comparable to a developed cluster in the same way an infant is comparable to an adult.

19 The owner of the vineyard is not obligated to harvest the underdeveloped clusters and give them to the poor. Instead, [he should leave them for the poor] to harvest themselves. An individual grape is considered as an ollelet.

20 [The following laws apply when] there was a cluster on a branch of a vine and an underdeveloped cluster on an offshoot of the branch. If [the offshoot] can be harvested with the cluster, it belongs to the owner of the vineyard. If not, it belongs to the poor.

21 When a vineyard is comprised entirely of underdeveloped clusters, it belongs to the poor. [This is derived from Leviticus 19:10:] "Do not collect underdeveloped clusters in your vineyard," i.e., even if it comprises the entire vineyard. [The laws of] peret and ollelot apply only in a vineyard.

22 The poor do not have the right to take peret and ollelot until the owner of the vineyard begins harvesting his vineyard, as [Deuteronomy 24:21] states: "When you harvest your vineyard, do not collect underdeveloped clusters." How much must [the owner] harvest for [the poor] to receive this right? Three clusters that will produce a revi'it [of wine].

23 When a person consecrates his vineyard before he becomes aware of the underdeveloped clusters, the underdeveloped clusters do not belong to the poor. If he has become aware of the underdeveloped clusters, the underdeveloped clusters belong to the poor. They must pay a fee for their [increase in value] while they grew to the Temple treasury.

24 When one prunes a vine after he became aware of ollelot, he may prune according to his ordinary pattern. Just as he cuts off [fully-formed] clusters, he cuts off underdeveloped clusters.

25 When a gentile sells his vineyard to a Jew to harvest, the Jew is obligated to leave the underdeveloped clusters. When a Jew and a gentile are partners in a vineyard, there is an obligation [to leave] ollelot in the portion belonging to the Jew. That belonging to the gentile is exempt.

26 When the tithes [of a vineyard] were given to a Levite while they were still tevel, and ollelot were found in them, he should give them to a poor person. If they can be harvested with the cluster, he may use them as terumat ma'aser for other crops.

27 [The following laws apply when a person] has five vines, harvests them, and [brings the grapes] into his home. If his intent is to eat them while they are grapes, he is not obligated [to leave] peret, shichichah, and [neta] revai'i, but is obligated [to leave] the ollelot [for the poor]. If he reaped them to make wine, he is obligated in all of the above unless he left a portion [unharvested].

1 In none [of the following situations] is a [forgotten] sheaf [of grain] considered as shichichah. It was forgotten by workers and not forgotten by the owner of the field; it was forgotten by the owner of the field, but not the workers; or both these individuals forgot it, but there were others passing by who observed them at the time they forgot it. [To be shichichah] it must be forgotten by all people. Even a sheaf that was hidden away [purposely], if it is forgotten, it is shichichah.

2 When the owner of the field was in the city and he said: "I know that the workers forgot a sheaf in this-and-this place," [but afterwards, the owner] forgot it, it is shichichah. If he was in the field and made such statements, but then forgot [the sheaf], it is not shichichah. [The rationale is that,] in a field, [only a sheaf] that was forgotten at the outset is shichichah. In a city, by contrast, even if one remembered it and afterwards forgot it, it is shichichah, as [indicated by Deuteronomy 24:19]: "If you forget a sheaf in the field," [i.e., in the field,] but not in a city.

3 If the poor stood in front of [the sheaf] or covered it with straw and he remembered the straw, or he took hold of it to bring it to the city, but left it in the field and forgot it, it is not shichichah. If, however, he moved it from place to place, even if he left it next to a gate, a grainheap, cattle, or utensils, and he forgot it, it is shichichah.

4 [The following rules apply if] he took a sheaf with the intent of bringing it to the city, put it down on another [sheaf], and then forgot both of them. If he remembered the top sheaf before he sees it, the bottom one is not shichichah. If not, the bottom one is shichichah.

5 If a person's sheaves flew into a field belonging to a colleague because of a strong wind and he forgot a sheaf there, it is not shichichah, for [Deuteronomy 24:19] states: "[If you reap] your harvest in your field." If, however, the wind scattered the sheaves within his own field and he forgot them, it is shichichah.

6 [The following rules apply when a person] takes the first, second, and third sheaves, but leaves the fourth. If there was a sixth sheaf, the fourth sheaf is not shichichah until he takes the fifth sheaf. If, however, there are only five sheaves, when he bends down to take the fifth sheaf, the fourth is shichichah.

7 When the sheaves in a field are mixed together, he forgot one of them, it is not shichichah unless he takes everything around it.

8 Although wild onions, garlic, onions, and the like are buried in the earth, the laws of shichichah apply to them. When a person harvests his field at night and forgets standing grain or he binds the grain into sheaves at night and forgets a sheaf and similarly, a blind man who forgets sheaves, the laws of shichichah apply. If, however, the blind person or the one harvesting at night only intended to take bulky [sheaves], the laws of shichichah do not apply.

Whenever a person says: "I am harvesting the field on the condition that I may take what I forget," [his statement is of no consequence and] the laws of shichichah apply. [The rationale is that] whenever a person establishes a condition that contradicts the Torah, the condition is nullified.

9 When grain was harvested before it fully matured with the intent that it be fed to animals, the laws of shichichah do not apply. Similarly, if a person [binds the grain into] small bundles [as] he harvests without binding them into sheaves or he uprooted garlic or onions and made them into small bundles to sell in the marketplace instead of binding them into larger sheaves to store in a storehouse, [the laws of shichichah do not apply].

10 When a person began harvesting from the beginning of a row [of grain] and forgot grain both in front of him and behind him, [the grain] behind him is shichichah, [the grain] in front of him is not shichichah, as [implied by Deuteronomy, loc. cit.,]: "Do not go back to take it." [Grain is] not shichichah unless [the harvester] passes it and leaves it behind him. This is the general principle: Whenever the adjuration "Do not return" applies, [the laws of] shichichah apply. Whenever the adjuration "Do not return" does not apply, [the laws of] shichichah do not apply.

11 [The following laws apply when] two people began to harvest from the middle of the field, one facing north and the other facing south and they both forgot [sheaves] in front of them and behind them. [The sheaves] in front of them are shichichah, because what is in front of one is behind the other. A sheaf that was forgotten behind them in the place from which they began harvesting is not shichichah, because it is combined with the rows that run from east to west and they indicate that this is not

Similar [concepts apply with regard to] the rows of sheaves that were being moved to the threshing floor and two people began [collecting] them from the middle of the field and forgot a sheaf in the middle, between their backs, [the laws of] shichichah do not apply. [The rationale is that] it is in the midst of the row between the west and the east where they have not begun [collecting]. Its position indicates that it was not forgotten.

12 [The following rules apply when a person] harvests, binds [the grain] into sheaves, and then moves these sheaves - which are called omerim - from one place to another, and then from the second place to a third, and then from the third to the threshing floor. Should he forget a sheaf when he is moving it from one place to another, if he forgot it when he was moving to a place where work is completed, [the laws of] shichichah apply. Afterwards, when he moves it from the place where the work is completed to the threshing floor, [the laws of] shichichah do not apply. If he moved the sheaves to a place where work is not completed and forgot [them], [the laws of] shichichah do not apply. Afterwards, when he moves it from the place where the work is not completed to the threshing floor, [the laws of] shichichah do apply.

13 What constitutes a place "where work is completed"? A place where one intends to collect all the sheaves and thresh them there or take them to the threshing floor. What constitutes a place "where work is not completed"? A place where sheaves are collected to bind them into larger sheaves to bring them to another place.

14 When two bundles [of grain] are separate from each other, [the laws of] shichichah apply. [If there are] three, [the laws of] shichichah do not apply. When two sheaves are separate from each other, [the laws of] shichichah apply. [If there are] three, [the laws of] shichichah do not apply.

15 When two mounds of olives or carobs are separate from each other, [the laws of] shichichah apply. [If there are] three, [the laws of] shichichah do not apply. When two bundles of flax are separate from each other, [the laws of] shichichah apply. [If there are] three, [the laws of] shichichah do not apply.

16 When there are two vines - or two of any other tree - are separate from each other, [the laws of] shichichah apply. [If there are] three, [the laws of] shichichah do not apply. [This is derived from Leviticus 19:10] "Leave them for the poor and the stranger." [Implied is that] even if there are two, one should be given to the poor and one to the stranger.

17 If all the sheaves contain a kab and one contains four kabbim, and it was forgotten, [the laws of] shichichah apply. If it contained more than four kabbim, [the laws of] shichichah do not apply. Similarly, if [the sheaves] all contain two kabbim and there is one which contains more than eight kabbim, [the laws of] shichichah do not apply.

18 [When one] forgets a sheaf that contains two se'ah [of grain, the laws of] shichichah do not apply, as [implied by Deuteronomy 24:19]: "When you forget a sheaf in the field," i.e., [a sheaf], but not a grainheap. [This applies] even if [one collects all the grain into] sheaves containing two se'ah.

When a person forgets two sheaves, [the laws of] shichichah apply even though together they contain two se'ah since each of them individually is less than two se'ah. It thus appears to me that [the laws of] shichichah apply even though together they contain more than two se'ah.

19 When there are more than two se'ah of standing grain [left unharvested], [the laws of] shichichah do not apply. If less than two se'ah [were left], we consider the thin stalks as if they were healthy and long and those with few kernels as if they were full. If, while such considerations were to be made, [the grain] would be sufficient to produce two se'ah and he forgot it, [the laws of] shichichah do not apply.

20 When a person forgets a se'ah of grain that has been cut down and a se'ah which has not been cut down, they are not combined and [the laws of] shichichah apply to each of them. Similarly, with regard to garlic, onions, and fruit from trees. If a person forgot a portion of them in [- or attached to -] the ground and a portion of them detached, they cannot be combined [to form a single quantity]. Instead, [even though] together there are two se'ah, [the laws of] shichichah apply to each of them.

21 When a person forgets a sheaf at the side of standing grain that was not forgotten, [the laws of] shichichah do not apply. [This is implied by Deuteronomy, loc. cit.]: "When you harvest... and you forget a sheaf...."

[Implied is that when] a sheaf [is located] in an area that has been harvested, [the laws of] shichichah apply. When a sheaf [is located] in an area where there is standing grain, [the laws of] shichichah do not apply.

Similarly, if he forgot standing grain that was located next to standing grain that was not forgotten, even one stem, it rescues the forgotten [grain] and [the owner] is permitted to come and take it. If, however, he forgot a sheaf or standing grain at the side of a sheaf that was not forgotten, even if the sheaf contains two se'ah, it does not rescue the forgotten grain and that grain belongs to the poor.

Standing grain belonging to a colleague does not rescue one's own sheaves, nor does standing barley rescue a sheaf of wheat. [Instead,] the standing grain must be of the same species as the sheaf.

22 When a person forgets a tree among others - even if it carries many se'ah of fruit - or if he forgot two trees, [the laws of] shichichah apply. [If he forgot] three, [the laws of] shichichah do not apply.

23 When does the above apply? With regard to a tree that is not well known and distinguished by its place, e.g., it was located at the side of the olive-press or an open portion [of a fence], by its yield, e.g., it produced many olives, or its name: e.g., the flowing olive among the olive trees, i.e., that it produces much oil, the outpouring olive, the shameful olive. If, however, it was distinguished in any of these three ways, [the laws of] shichichah do not apply. [This is derived from Deuteronomy, loc. cit.]: "And you shall forget a sheaf in the field." [Implied is that this command applies to] a sheaf that could be forgotten forever which you will not bring to mind unless you return and see it. It excludes this tree that you will remember afterwards even if you do not encounter it, because it is well known and distinguished.

24 If [a tree] is distinguished in the mind of [the owner], it is as if it is well known and distinguished. If an [olive tree] was located next to a palm tree, the palm causes it to be distinguished. If two trees are "flowing olives," each one causes the other to be distinguished. If, however, one's entire field consists of "flowing olives" and one forgets one or two trees, [the laws of] shichichah apply. When is [the concept that the laws of shichichah do not apply to a tree that is distinguished] relevant? When one has not begun harvesting this distinguished tree. If, however, one began harvesting it and then forgot a portion of it, [the laws of] shichichah apply, even though it is distinguished, provided less than two se'ah [of fruit] remain upon it. If, however, two se'ah [of fruit] remain upon it, [the laws of] shichichah do not apply unless he forgets the entire tree as we explained.

25 [The following law applies with regard to] an olive tree standing alone in the middle of rows [of olive trees, i.e.,] there are three rows of olive trees surrounding it on three sides, even though each of these rows contains only two olive trees. If [the owner] forgot the olive tree in the middle, [the laws of] shichichah do not [apply], because the rows [of trees] hid it. Why was [this law] stated only with regard to an olive tree? For they were important in Eretz Yisrael at that time.

26 When do the laws of shichichah apply with regard to [vines lifted on] a trellis? Whenever [the owner has passed the grapes] to the extent that he cannot extend his hand and take them.

[When do they apply] in a vineyard? When he passes the vine or the vines and forgets them.

[When do they apply] with regard to a vine draped over a high support or a palm tree? When he descends from it. And with regard to other trees? When he turns and walks away from it.

When does the above apply? When he did not begin [harvesting its fruit]. If, however, he began harvesting its fruit and forgot it, [the laws of shichichah] do not apply until he harvests all [the fruit in] the surrounding area.

27 When a person declares his vineyard ownerless and gets up early in the morning acquires it for himself and harvests it, he is bound by [the laws of] peret, ollelot, shichichah, and peah, for this can rightfully be called "your field" and "your vineyard." It was his and now it is his. If, however, he acquired a field that had previously belonged to another person that was declared ownerless, he is exempt from all of these obligations. In all instances, he is exempt from [the obligation of] the tithes, as will be explained.

1 There is a sixth present [awarded] to the poor from the land's produce: the tithe given to the poor. It is called the tithe for the poor.

2 This is the order of [the separation of] the terumot and the tithes. After one harvests produce from the earth or fruit from the tree and completes all the necessary work, he separates one fiftieth of the produce. This is called the great terumah and should be given to the priest. Concerning this the Torah states [Deuteronomy 18:4]: "The first of your grain, your wine, and your oil." Afterwards, he separates one tenth from the remainder. This is called the first tithe and must be given to the Levite. Concerning this, the Torah states [Numbers 18:24]: "For the tithes of the children of Israel..." and [ibid.:24] states: "To the descendants of Levi have I given all the tithes within Israel."

3 Afterwards, he separates one tenth from the remainder. This is called "the second tithe." This belongs to the owners and is eaten in Jerusalem. Concerning this, it is stated [Leviticus 27:31]: "If a person shall redeem his tithes and [Deuteronomy 14:22-23] states: "You shall surely tithe.... And you shall partake of it before God your Lord in the place that He will choose."

4 These portions should be separated in this order in the first, second, fourth, and fifth years of the Sabbatical cycle. In the third and sixth years of that cycle, by contrast, after the first tithe is separated, a different tithe is separated from the remainder and it is given to the poor. It is called the tithe for the poor. In these two years, the second tithe is not separated, only the tithe for the poor. Concerning it is written [Deuteronomy 14:28-29]: "At the conclusion of three years, you shall bring out the tithe of all your grain in that year and deposit it in your gates and the Levite...

[and the stranger, the orphan...] shall come." And concerning it, it is written [ibid. 26:12]: "When you will complete your tithing [in the third year]...."

5 In the seventh year, all [the produce] is ownerless. There is no [obligation to separate] terumah, no tithes at all, not the first tithe, nor the second tithe, nor the tithe for the poor. In the Diaspora where [the requirement to] let the land lie fallow does not apply, [in the seventh year, in Egypt, Ammon, and Moab, we separate the first tithe and the tithe for the poor, because these lands are close to Eretz Yisrael and in this way, the poor people in Eretz Yisrael can rely on [the produce of these other lands] in the Sabbatical year.

It is a halachah conveyed to Moses at Sinai that the tithe for the poor should be separated in the lands of Ammon and Moab in the Sabbatical year. In Babylonia, the second tithe should be separated in the Sabbatical year as is the practice in most years.

6 [After] taking the first tithe, a Levite should separate one tenth and give it to a priest. It is called terumat ma'aser. Concerning this, [Numbers 18:26] states: "To the Levites, say...."

7 When poor people pass by the owner of the field while he is [in his field] and in possession of the tithe for the poor, he should give each poor person who passes by him [a portion] of the tithe that will satisfy him, [as implied by Deuteronomy 26:12]: "And they shall eat in your gates and be satisfied."

8 How much is "[a portion] that will satisfy him? If from wheat, he should give him no less than half a kab. If from barley, he should give him no less than a kab. If from spelt, he should give him no less than a kab. If from dried figs, he should give him no less than a kab. If from a mass of figs, he should give him no less than the weight of 25 selaim. If from wine, he should give him no less than half a log. If from oil, he should give him no less than a fourth [of a log]. If from rice, he should give him no less than a fourth of a kab. If he gives him vegetables, he should give him a liter weight, i.e., the weight of 35 dinarim. From carobs, [he should give him] three kabbim; from nuts, ten, from peaches, five; from pomegranates, two; an esrog, one. If he gives him from other produce, he should not give him less than would enable him to sell them and to buy food for two meals with the proceeds.

9 If one only has a small amount of produce and there are many poor people so that he does not have enough to give each one the appropriate measure, he should place [the entire quantity] before them and they should divide it among themselves.

10 The owners do not have the right to apportion the tithe for the poor that is given away at the grainheap at their discretion. Instead, the poor come and take it against their will. Even the poor among the Jewish people can expropriate from them. When, by contrast, one gives out the tithe of the poor in his home, he may give it to any poor man to whom he desires.

11 When a person has [a quantity of] the tithe for the poor in his grainheap and he desires to give it to a poor person who is his relative or acquaintance, he should set aside half of it to give it to him and half to give to all the poor who pass by according to the measures mentioned above.

12 When does the concept that one must give a poor person enough to satisfy him apply? In the field. If, however, he has tithes in his home, he may divide it among all the poor people, giving each one even only an olive-sized portion, for he is not commanded to give him an amount necessary to satisfy him except in a field, for there are no others there from whom to take, as [implied by] the verse: "And they shall eat in your gates and be satisfied."

13 If a man and a woman come to [a person possessing tithes] at home, we give to the woman first and allow her to depart and then give to the man. [In the situations, when one] of the pair - a father and his son, a person and his relative, two brothers, or two partners - was poor, the other may give him the tithe for the poor which he possesses.

14 When two poor people receive a field under a sharecropping agreement, one may separate the tithe for the poor from his portion and give it to his colleague. And his colleague may separate the tithe for the poor from his portion and give it to him.

15 When a person receives [the right] to harvest a field, he is forbidden to collect leket, shichichah, pe'ah, and the tithe for the poor.
When does the above apply? When he accepted a field [with the proviso] that he receive a portion of the produce of the entire field, e.g., he was given a third or a fourth [of the harvest] as his wage. If, however, the owner of the field told him: "You will receive only a third of what you harvest," or "...a fourth of what you will harvest," [the harvester of the field] does not have a right to anything until he harvests it. Hence, at the time of the harvest, he is a poor man. Therefore he is permitted [to collect] leket, shichichah, and pe'ah, but he is forbidden [to take] the tithe for the poor. [The rationale is that] the tithe for the poor is separated only after the harvest is completed and [at that time,] he has already acquired the portion he harvested.

16 When a person sells his field - both the land and the produce - and becomes impoverished, he is permitted [to collect] leket, shichichah, pe'ah, and tithe for the poor from it. The purchaser is forbidden [to collect] these presents even though he has not paid the money [for the field] yet. Even if he borrowed the money and purchased it, he can no longer collect the presents for the poor.

17 The tithe for the poor may not be used as payment for a loan, nor can it be given in exchange for favors. It may be used for an act of kindness, but one must tell the recipient that it is the tithe for the poor. It should not be used to redeem captives, given as shushbinut, nor given as a specific gift to charity. It can be given to the sage of a city for his benefit and it may not be taken from Eretz Yisrael into the Diaspora, as [Deuteronomy 14:28] states: "And you shall place it in your gates," and it is written [ibid. 26:12]: "And they shall eat in your gates and be satiated."

1 It is a positive commandment to give charity to the poor among the Jewish people, according to what is appropriate for the poor person if this is within the financial capacity of the donor, as [Deuteronomy 15:8] states: "You shall certainly open your hand to him." [Leviticus 25:35] states: "You shall support him, a stranger and a resident and they shall live with you," and [ibid.:36] states: "And your brother shall live with you."

2 Anyone who sees a poor person asking and turns his eyes away from him and does not give him charity transgresses a negative commandment, as [Deuteronomy 15:7] states: "Do not harden your heart or close your hand against your brother, the poor person."

3 We are commanded to give a poor person according to what he lacks. If he lacks clothes, we should clothe him. If he lacks household utensils, we should purchase them for him. If he is unmarried, we should help him marry. And for an unmarried woman, we should find a husband for her. Even if the personal habit of this poor person was to ride on a horse and to have a servant run before him and then he became impoverished and lost his wealth, we should buy a horse for him to ride and a servant to run before him. [This is implied by Deuteronomy 15:8 which] speaks [of providing him with] "enough to [fill the] lack that he feels." You are commanded to fill his lack, but you are not obligated to enrich him.

4 With regard to an orphan for whom people are seeking to find a wife for him to marry: First, we rent for him a house, provide for him a bed and all his household necessities and then we seek to find a wife for him to marry.

5 When a poor person comes and asks for his needs to be met and the giver does not have the financial capacity, he should give him according to his financial capacity.

How much? The most desirable way of performing the mitzvah is to give one fifth of one's financial resources. Giving one tenth is an ordinary measure. Giving less [than that] reflects parsimony. A person should never refrain from giving less than a third of a shekel a year. A person who gives less than this has not fulfilled the mitzvah. Even a poor person who derives his livelihood from charity is obligated to give charity to another person.

6 When a poor person whose identity is unknown says: "I am hungry, provide me with food," we do not investigate whether he is a deceiver. Instead, we provide him with sustenance immediately. If he was unclothed and he said: "Cloth me," we investigate whether he is a deceiver. If we are familiar with him, we clothe him according to his honor immediately and we do not investigate the matter.

7 We provide sustenance and clothing for the poor of the gentiles together with the poor of the Jewish people as an expression of the ways of peace.

When a poor person begs from door to door, we do not give him a large gift. Instead, we give him a small gift. It is forbidden to turn away a poor person who asks [for charity] empty-handed. Even giving him one fig [is sufficient], as [Psalms 74:21] states: "Let not the dejected turn away in shame."

8 When a poor person travels from place to place, we do not give him less than a loaf of bread that is sold for a punidyon when wheat is being sold for four se'ah a sela. We have already explained all the measures.
If he stays overnight, we give him a mattress to sleep on, a pillow to place under his head, oil and beans. If he stays for the Sabbath, we give him food for three meals, oil, beans, fish, and vegetables. If we are familiar with him, we give him according to his honor.

9 When a poor person does not desire to take charity, we trick him and give it to him as a present or as a loan. When a rich man starves himself, because he is miserly with his money, using it for neither food nor drink, we do not pay any attention to him.

10 When a person does not want to give charity or desires to give less than what is appropriate for him, the court should compel him and give him stripes for rebellious conduct until he gives the amount it was estimated that he should give. We take possession of his property when he is present and expropriate the amount that is appropriate for him to give. We expropriate property for the sake of charity even on Fridays.

11 It is forbidden to demand and to collect charity from a soft-hearted person who gives more than is appropriate to charity or from a person who causes himself difficulty and gives to charity collectors so that he will not be embarrassed. When a charity collector embarrasses such a person and asks him [for charity], [the charity collector] will be subjected to retribution in the future, as [implied by Jeremiah 30:20:] "I will visit My providence on those who pressure him."

12 We do not impose a levy for charity on orphans, even for the redemption of captives, and even if they possess many financial resources. If a judge imposed a levy upon them to heighten their reputation, it is permitted.
A charity collector may accept small [donations] from women, servants, and children, but not large donations. For we operate under the assumption that a large amount was stolen or robbed from others. What is meant by a small [donation]? Everything is calculated according to the wealth or poverty of the owners.

13 A poor person who is one's relative receives priority over all others. The poor of one's household receive priority over the poor of one's city. And the poor of one's city receive priority over the poor of another city, as [implied by Deuteronomy 15:11]: "[You shall surely open your hand to] your brother, the poor, and the destitute in your land."

14 When a person went on a business trip and the people of the city to which he traveled levy an assessment for charity upon him, he should give it to the poor of that city. If there are many [such individuals] and an assessment for charity was made upon them, they must make the allocation and when they go [to return home], they take [the money] with them and use it to support the poor of their city. If there is a communal sage, they give it to him and he divides it as he sees fit.

15 When a person says: "Give 200 zuz to a synagogue" or "Give a Torah scroll to a synagogue," we give it to the synagogue which he customarily [attends]. If he would frequent two, [the sum] should be divided among both of them. If he says: "Give 200 dinarim to the poor," we give them to the poor of his city.

1 Charity is considered as a vow. Therefore one who says: "I pledge to give a sela to charity" or "[I will give] this sela to charity," he is obligated to give it [to charity] immediately. If he delays, he transgresses the commandment against delaying [the observance of one's vow], for he has the capacity to make the gift immediately and [generally,] there are poor people at hand.
If there are no poor people at hand, he should set aside [the donation] and put it away until he finds poor people. If he made a stipulation that he is not obligated to make the donation until he finds poor people, he does not have to separate it [until the poor are at hand]. Similarly, if he made a stipulation at the time he made his vow to charity or pledged his donation that the trustees of the charitable fund could exchange it for gold, they are permitted to do so.

2 When a person extends a vow made to charity, he is obligated as is the case with regard to other vows.
What is implied? If he said: "This sela is like this one [given to charity], it is also charity. When a person sets aside a sela and says: "This is charity" and then takes another sela and says: "And this," the second is also charity even though he did not say so explicitly.

3 When a person takes a vow [to give charity], but does not remember how much he vowed to give, he should give until he says: "I did not intend [to give] this [much]."

4 [The following rules apply] both to a person who says: "This sela is charity" and one who says: "I pledge a sela for charity" and sets it aside. If he desires to exchange it with another [coin], he is permitted to do so. Once it reaches the hand of the treasurer of the charity, it is forbidden to be exchanged. If the treasurer of the charity desires to exchange the common currency for dinarim, they are not permitted to do so. If there are no poor among whom to distribute the funds, they should have others exchange the coins, but they should not do so themselves.

5 If the poor would benefit from the delay of the money in the possession of the charity collector so that he could motivate others to give, that charity collector may borrow the money and pay [when the funds are required]. For charity does not resemble funds dedicated to the Temple treasury from which it is forbidden to benefit.

6 When a person donates a candelabra or a lamp to a synagogue, it is forbidden to exchange it. If it is for a sacramental purpose, it is permitted to exchange it, even though the name of the donor is still associated with it, e.g., it is said: "This is so-and-so's candelabra" or "...so-and-so's lamp."

If the name of the donor is no longer associated with it, it may be exchanged even for matters that are not sacramental in nature.

7 When does the above apply? When the donor was Jewish. If, however, he was a gentile, it is forbidden to exchange it even for matters that are sacramental in nature as long as the name of the donor is still associated with it. [We fear that] the gentile might say: "I consecrated an article to the Jews' synagogue and they sold it for their own purposes."

8 When a gentile seeks to make a donation to the Temple treasury, initially, we do not accept it. If, however, it was taken from him, we do not return it to him. If it was a specific article, e.g., a beam or a stone, we return it to him so that there will not be a specific entity in the Temple associated with [a gentile], as [Ezra 4:3] states: "It is not for you, together with us to build a Temple for our God." For a synagogue, by contrast, we may accept their [donations, even] initially, provided they say: "I am donating it according to the intent of the Jewish people." If he does not say so, it must be entombed, for perhaps his intent was to consecrate it unto God. We do not receive donations from them for the walls of Jerusalem or an aqueduct in [that city], as [Nechemiah 2:20] states: "And you do not have a portion or a remembrance in Jerusalem."

9 It is forbidden for a Jew to receive charity from a gentile in public. If he is unable to subsist on the charity given by the Jews and it is impossible to receive charity from the gentiles in private, it is permitted.
When a gentile king or official sends money to the Jews for charity, we do not return it to him so as [not to jeopardize] peaceful relations with the king. Instead, we take [the charity] from him and give it to the gentile poor in secret so that the king will not hear.

10 The redemption of captives receives priority over sustaining the poor and providing them with clothing. [Indeed,] there is no greater mitzvah than the redemption of captives. For a captive is among those who are hungry, thirsty, and unclothed and he is in mortal peril. If someone pays no attention to his redemption, he violates the negative commandments: "Do not harden your heart or close your hand" (Deuteronomy 15:7 , "Do not stand by when the blood of your neighbor is in danger" (Leviticus 19:16 , and "He shall not oppress him with exhausting work in your presence" (ibid. 25:53). And he has negated the observance of the positive commandments: "You shall certainly open up your hand to him" (Deuteronomy 15:8 , "And your brother shall live with you" (ibid. 19:18), "Love your neighbor as yourself" (Leviticus 19:18 , "Save those who are taken for death" (Proverbs 24:11 , and many other decrees of this nature. There is no mitzvah as great as the redemption of captives.

11 When the inhabitants of a city collected money for building a synagogue and a purpose associated with a mitzvah arose, they may use the money for that purpose. If they purchased stones and beams, they should not sell them [and use the proceeds] for a purpose associated with a mitzvah other than the redemption of captives. Even though they brought the stones [to the building site], cut the beams and shaped them to size, and prepared everything for building, it should all be sold, [but] only for the sake of redeeming captives. If they built [the synagogue] and completed it, it should not be sold. Instead, the funds necessary to redeem the captives should be raised from the community.

12 We do not redeem captives for more than their worth for the benefit of the world at large, i.e., so that enemies will not pursue people to hold them captive. We do not assist captives in escaping, for the benefit of the world at large, i.e., so that enemies will not oppress captives seriously and be very strict when guarding them.

13 When a person sold himself and his children [as servants] to gentiles or borrowed money from them and they held him captive or imprisoned him [because of his failure to pay] the loan, it is a mitzvah to redeem him the first or second time [he is held]. [If this happens] a third time, we do not redeem him. We do, however, redeem the sons after their father's passing. If they sought to kill him, we redeem him from their hands even if he [has been held captive] several times.

14 When a servant is held captive, since he immersed himself [in the mikveh] and accepted the mitzvot, he should be redeemed like a Jew who has been taken captive. When a captive abandons his faith even with regard to only one mitzvah, e.g., he eats meat from animals that were not ritually slaughtered with the intent of angering God or the like, it is forbidden to redeem him.

15 A woman receives precedence over a man with regard to being given sustenance, clothing, and to be redeemed from captivity. [The rationale is that] it is common for a man to beg, but not for a woman and this is extremely embarrassing for her. If they were both held in captivity and they were both solicited for a transgression, the man should be redeemed first, because this is not ordinary for him.

16 When a male and female orphan come seeking assistance in marriage, we assist the woman before the man, because the woman's shame is greater. She should not be given less than the weight of six and a quarter dinarim of pure silver. If the treasury of the charitable fund has the means, we give the money according to her honor.

17 If there were many poor people or many captives and one does not have the means to provide sustenance or clothing for all of them or to redeem all of them, a priest is given precedence over a Levite. A Levite is given precedence over an Israelite. An Israelite is given precedence over a challal, a challal over a shituki, a shituki over an asufi, an asufi over a mamzer, a mamzer over a netin, and a netin over a convert. [The rationale for the latter is that] a netin grew up with us in holiness. A convert is granted precedence over a freed servant, for [the latter] was originally among those who were "cursed."

18 When does the above apply? When the two [captives] were equal in knowledge. If, however, a High Priest was unlearned and a mamzer was a Torah scholar, the Torah scholar receives precedence. Whoever surpasses his colleague in knowledge receives precedence over his colleague.
If, however, one [of the poor or the captives] is one's teacher or father, His father or teacher who is a Torah scholar receives precedence over another who surpasses him in wisdom.

1 In every city where Jews live, they are obligated to appoint faithful, men of renown as trustees of a charitable fund. They should circulate among the people from Friday to Friday and take from each person what is appropriate for him to give and the assessment made upon him. They then allocate the money from Friday to Friday, giving each poor person sufficient food for seven days. This is called the kupah.

2 Similarly, we appoint trustees who take bread, different types of food, fruit, or money from every courtyard from those who make a spontaneous donation and divide what was collected among the poor in the evening, giving each poor person sustenance for that day. This is called the tamchui.

3 We have never seen nor heard of a Jewish community that does not have a kupah for charity. A tamchui, by contrast, exists in some communities, but not in others. The common practice at present is that the trustees of the kupah circulate [among the community and collect] every day and divide [the proceeds] every Friday.

4 On fast days, we distribute food to the poor. Whenever there is a fast day on which the people eat and went to bed without distributing charity to the poor, they are considered as murderers. Concerning them, the Oral Tradition says [Isaiah 1:21]: "Charity is held overnight and now [you are] murderers."

When does this apply? When they did not give them bread and fruit which is [usually] eaten together with bread, e.g., dates and grapes. If, however, they delayed the delivery of money or wheat, they are not considered as murderers.

5 [Money for] the kupah should be collected only by two people together, for no less than two communal trustees should ever be appointed over the financial interests of the community. It is permitted to entrust the money of the kupah to one person, but [the funds] should not be distributed by less than three trustees, because [the allocation] is comparable to a judgment concerning financial matters, since each person is given his needs for that week. [Donations for] the tamchui should be collected by three - because it does not involve a fixed amount - and it is distributed by three.

6 [Donations for] the tamchui are collected every day. [Those for] the kupah are collected from Friday until Friday. [The gifts from] the tamchui are given [also] to poor people at large. [Those from] the kupah are given only to the poor of that city.

7 The inhabitants of a city have permission to give [the donations given to] the kupah to the tamchui and [those given for] the tamchui to the kupah. Similarly, they may exchange [these donations] for any communal purpose that they desire even though a stipulation to that effect was not made when they were collected. If there is a great sage in that city dependent on whose judgment all collections are made and he is the one who allocates the funds to the poor according to his assessment, he is permitted to use [these funds] for any communal purpose he sees fit.

8 Trustees of a charitable fund are not permitted to depart from each other in the marketplace [except for a brief time], e.g., one goes to the gate to collect and the other to a shop.

9 If a charity trustee finds money in the marketplace, he should not put it into his own pocket, but instead into the wallet of the charitable fund. When he comes home, he should take it [for himself].

10 If a charity trustee is owed money by a colleague and [the latter] pays him in the marketplace, he should not put [this money] in his pocket, but instead into the wallet of the charitable fund. When he comes home, he should take it [for himself].

He should not count out the money of the charitable fund in pairs, but rather one coin at a time, lest suspicions be aroused, as [implied by Numbers 32:22]: "And you shall be guiltless in the eyes of God and Israel."

11 When the trustee of a charitable fund does not have poor people to whom to distribute the money, he may exchange the coins for dinarim. Another person, however, [should carry out the transaction], not he himself.

When the trustee of a tamchui does not have poor people to whom to distribute [the food he collected], he should sell it to others, but not to himself.

We do not enter into a reckoning with the trustee of a charitable fund concerning the charity he collected or with the treasures of the Temple regarding funds consecrated to them, as stated [in II Kings 22:7]: "No reckoning shall be made with them for the money entrusted to them because they are acting in good faith."

12 When a person has lived in a city for 30 days, we compel him to give charity to the kupah together with the inhabitants of the city. If he dwelled there for three months, we compel him to contribute to the tamchui. If he dwelled there for six months, we compel him to contribute to the fund used to clothe the poor of the city. If he dwelled there for nine months, we compel him to contribute to the fund used for the burial of the poor of the city and the provision of all their burial needs.

13 When a person has enough food for two meals, it is forbidden for him to take from the tamchui. When he has enough food for fourteen meals, he should not take from the kupah. If he has 200 zuz, even if he does not invest or do business with them - or 50 zuz that he invests - he should not take shichachah, peah, or the tithe for the poor. If he has 200 zuz less a dinar, even though 1000 people give him at one time, he is permitted to take [the above]. If he has money in hand, but he owes a debt or it is under lien to his wife for her ketubah, he is permitted to take.

14 When a poor person is in need, but owns a courtyard and household utensils - even silver and golden utensils - we do not obligate him to sell his house and his personal possessions. Instead, he is permitted to accept [charity] and it is a mitzvah to give him.

When does the above apply? With regard to eating utensils, drinking utensils, clothing, bedding, and the like. If, however, he owns a golden comb or pestle or the like, he should sell them and buy less valuable ones.

When does the above apply? Before he has descended to the level where he takes charity from people at large. Once he collects charity [from the community], we obligate him to sell his utensils and purchase lesser ones and then accept charity.

15 When a man of means is in the midst of a journey from city to city, he used up all his money on the journey, and he does not have anything to eat, it is permitted for him to take leket, shichachah, pe'ah, and the tithe for the poor and he may benefit from charity. When he returns to his home, he is not obligated to pay, because he was poor at that time. To what can this be compared? To a poor person who became wealthy who is not obligated to pay back [the charity he received while poor].

16 When a person possesses homes, fields, and vineyards which were he to sell them in the winter, he would be forced to sell them cheaply, but were he to leave them until the summer, he would be able to sell them at their worth, we do not obligate him to sell them [in the winter]. Instead, we enable him to partake of the tithe of the poor [until he partakes of] half the worth of his property [so that] he will not be pressed to sell outside the [appropriate] time to sell.

17 If people at large were purchasing property at high prices, but he could only find people to purchase from him cheaply, because he is pressed for funds and preoccupied, we do not require him to sell [at a low price]. Instead, he is allowed to continue to partake of the tithe for the poor until he can sell his property at its worth and everyone will know that he is not under pressure to sell.

18 When funds were collected for a poor person to satisfy his lack and [the collection] exceeded his needs, the additional funds belong to him. Extra funds [donated for] the poor should be given to the poor. Extra funds [donated for the redemption of] captives should be used for that purpose. Extra funds [donated for the redemption of] one individual captive should be given to that captive. Extra funds [donated for the burial of] the deceased should be used for that purpose. Extra funds [donated for the burial of] an individual deceased person should be given to his heirs.

19 When a poor person gives a p'rutah to the tamchui or to the kupah, we accept it from him. If he does not give, we do not require him to give. If he was given new clothes and he gave them back his worn clothes, we accept them from him. If he does not give them, we do not require him to.

1 We are obligated to be careful with regard to the mitzvah of charity to a greater extent than all [other] positive commandments, because charity is an identifying mark for a righteous person, a descendant of Abraham, our patriarch, as [Genesis 18:19] states: "I have known him, because he commands his children... to perform charity." The throne of Israel will not be established, nor will the true faith stand except through charity, as [Isaiah 54:14] states: "You shall be established through righteousness." And Israel will be redeemed solely through charity, as [ibid. 1:27] states: "Zion will be redeemed through judgment and those who return to her through charity."

2 A person will never become impoverished from giving charity. No harm nor damage will ever be caused because of charity, as [ibid. 32:17] states: "And the deed of charity is peace." Everyone who is merciful evokes mercy from others, as [Deuteronomy 13:18] states: "And He shall grant you mercy and shower mercy upon you and multiply you." Whenever a person is cruel and does not show mercy, his lineage is suspect, for cruelty is found only among the gentiles, as [Jeremiah 50:42] states: "They are cruel and will not show mercy."

The entire Jewish people and all those who attach themselves to them are as brothers, as [Deuteronomy 14:1] states: "You are children unto God your Lord." And if a brother will not show mercy to a brother, who will show mercy to them? To whom do the poor of Israel lift up their eyes? To the gentiles who hate them and pursue them? Behold their eyes are pointed to their brethren alone.

3 Anyone who turns his eyes away from [giving] charity is described as being "rebellious" like someone who worships false divinities is described as "rebellious, as [Deuteronomy 13:14] states with regard to the worship of false divinities: "Rebellious men went out." And with regard to a person who turns his eyes away from [giving] charity, [ibid. 15:9] states: "Be careful, lest a rebellious thought arise in your heart." Such a person is also called "wicked," as [Proverbs 12:10] states: "The mercies of the wicked are cruel." And he is called a sinner, as [Deuteronomy, loc. cit.,] states: "And he shall cry out against you to God and you will be deemed as sinning." The Holy One, blessed be He, is close to the outcry of the poor, as it is written: "You hear the outcry of the poor." Therefore one must be careful with regard to their outcry, for a covenant has been established with them, as [Exodus 22:26] states: "When he will cry out to Me, I will listen, for I am compassionate."

4 Whenever a person gives charity to a poor person with an unpleasant countenance and with his face buried in the earth, he loses and destroys his merit even if he gives him 1000 gold pieces. Instead, he should give him with a pleasant countenance and with happiness, commiserating with him about his troubles, as [Job 30:25] states: "Did I not weep for those who face difficult times; did not my soul feel sorrow for the destitute?" And he should speak to him words of sympathy and comfort, as [ibid. 29:13] states: "I would bring joy to a widow's heart."

5 If a poor person asks one for a donation and he has nothing to give him, he should conciliate him with words. It is forbidden to scold a poor person or to raise one's voice against him while shouting, because his heart is broken and crushed, and [Psalms 51:19] states: "God will not scorn a broken and crushed heart." And [Isaiah 57:15 describes as Divine the attribute of] "reviv[ing] the spirit of the lowly and revitalize[ing] the heart of the crushed." Woe unto he who shames the poor, woe be he! Instead, one should be like a father to him, both in mercies and in words, as [Job 29:16] states: "I am a father to the destitute."

6 A person who compels others to give charity and motivates them to do so receives a greater reward than the person who actually gives, as [alluded to by Isaiah 32:17]: "And the deed of charity is peace." With regard to the collectors of charity and the like can be applied [the words of praise, Daniel 12:3]: "Those who bring merit to the many are like the stars."

7 There are eight levels in charity, each level surpassing the other. The highest level beyond which there is none is a person who supports a Jew who has fallen into poverty [by] giving him a present or a loan, entering into partnership with him, or finding him work so that his hand will be fortified so that he will not have to ask others [for alms]. Concerning this [Leviticus 25:35] states: "You shall support him, the stranger, the resident, and he shall live among you." Implied is that you should support him before he falls and becomes needy.

8 A lower [level] than this is one who gives charity to the poor without knowing to whom he gave and without the poor person knowing from whom he received. For this is an observance of the mitzvah for its sake alone. This [type of giving was] exemplified by the secret chamber that existed in the Temple. The righteous would make donations there in secret and poor people of distinguished lineage would derive their livelihood from it in secret.

A level close to this is giving to a charity fund. A person should not give to a charity fund unless he knows that the person managing it is faithful, wise, and capable of administering it in a proper manner as Rebbe Chananya ben Tradyon was.

9 A lower level than that is an instance when the giver knows to whom he is giving, but the poor person does not know from whom he received. An example of this were the great Sages who would go in secret and throw money into the doorways of the poor. This is a worthy way of giving charity and it is a good quality [to express] if the trustees of the charitable fund are not conducting themselves appropriately.

10 A lower level than that is an instance when the poor person knows from whom he took, but the donor does not know to whom he gave. An example of this were the great Sages who would bundle coins in a sheet and hang them over their shoulders and the poor would come and take them so that they would not be embarrassed.

11 A lower level than that is giving [the poor person] in his hand before he asks.

12 A lower level than that is giving him after he asks.

13 A lower level than this is giving him less than what is appropriate, but with a pleasant countenance.

14 A lower level than that is giving him with sadness.

15 Great sages would give a p'rutah to a poor person before every prayer service and then they would pray, as [implied by Psalms 17:15]: "I will see Your countenance in righteousness."

16 A person who gives money to his sons and daughters who are past the age of majority and whom he is not obligated to support in order to teach the males Torah and to direct the females in a course of upright path so that they will not become objects of derision and similarly one who gives food to his father and his mother is included among [those who give] charity. Indeed, it is a very important charity, for precedence is established on one's degree of closeness.

Anyone who gives food and drink to the poor and orphans at his table,he will call out to God and [God] will answer him and he will derive pleasure from Him, as [Isaiah 58:9] states: "Then you will call out and God will answer."

17 Our Sages commanded that the poor and orphans should be members of a person's household rather than servants. This is preferable for him to employ these people and thus enable the descendants of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob to benefit from his possessions rather than the descendants of Cham. Whoever increases [the number of] servants in his possession adds sin and transgression to the world every day. [Conversely,] if the poor are members of one's household, at every hour he adds merits and mitzvot.

18 A person should always construct himself and bear hardship rather than appeal to people at large and make himself a burden on the community. Our Sages commanded, saying: "Make your Sabbaths as weekdays, and do not appeal to people at large." Even a distinguished sage who becomes poor should involve himself in a profession - even a degrading one - rather than appeal to people at large. It is preferable for a person to skin the hide of animal carcasses, rather than tell people: "I am a great sage..." or "I am a priest, grant me sustenance." Our Sages commanded conducting oneself in such a manner.

There were great sages who were woodchoppers, porters of beams, water-carriers for gardens, and iron-smelters and makers of charcoal, but they did not ask anything from the community, nor did they accept gifts that were given to them.

19 Any person who does not need to take [charity] and deceives the people and takes will not reach old age and die until he requires assistance from people at large. He is among those of whom it is said [Jeremiah 17:5]: "Cursed be a person who trusts in mortals."

[Conversely,] anyone who needs to take [charity] and cannot exist unless he takes, e.g., an elderly man, sick, or beset by afflictions, but is proud and does not take is considered as a murderer. He is liable for his soul and all that he has earned through his hardship is sin and guilt. But anyone who needs to take [charity], but causes himself affliction and temporarily constrains himself and lives a life of difficulty so that he will not overburden the community will not reach old age and die before he provides sustenance for others from his own means. Concerning such a person and those like him, it is stated [ibid.:7]: Blessed be a person who trusts in God."

1 According to Scriptural Law, [the obligation to separate] the terumot and the tithes applies only in Eretz Yisrael. [It applies] whether the Temple is standing or not. The prophets ordained that these obligations should be observed in Babylon as well, because it is adjacent to Eretz Yisrael and the majority of the Jewish people journey to and from there. The Sages of the early generations ordained that they also be observed in the lands of Egypt and the lands of Ammon and Moab, because they are on the peripheries of Eretz Yisrael.

2 Whenever Eretz Yisrael is mentioned, the intent is the lands conquered by the King of Israel or a prophet with the consent of the entire Jewish people. This is called "a conquest of the community." If, however, an individual Jew, a family, or a tribe go and conquer a place for themselves - even in the land given to Abraham - it is not considered as Eretz Yisrael in the sense that one is obligated to observe all the mitzvot there. For this reason, Joshua and his court divided the entire Land of Israel into tribal portions even though it was not conquered [entirely] at that time. In this way, when every tribe would ascend and conquer its portion, it would not be considered as merely an individual conquest.

3 The lands which [King] David conquered outside of the Land of Canaan, e.g., Aram Naharaim, Aram Tzovah, Achlab, and the like, even though he was a King of Israel and he was acting with the consent of the High Court, is not considered as the Land of Israel with regard to all matters, nor is it like the Diaspora, i.e., Babylonia and Egypt with regard to all matters. Instead, it was removed from the category of the Diaspora, but did not enter the category of Eretz Yisrael.

Why was its level considered lower than that of Eretz Yisrael? Because David conquered them before he conquered all of Eretz Yisrael. Instead, there were still members of the seven nations there. If, however, he had conquered Eretz Yisrael entirely, in all of its boundaries, and afterwards conquered other lands, his entire conquest would have been equivalent to Eretz Yisrael with regard to all matters. The lands which [King] David conquered are called Syria.

4 There are dimensions of [the laws that apply to] Syria that resemble [the laws that apply in] Eretz Yisrael and there are dimensions of [its laws] that resemble [those which apply] in the Diaspora. A person who purchases landed property [in Syria] is comparable to one who purchases [land] in Eretz Yisrael with regard to terumot, tithes, and the Sabbatical year. All [the laws that apply] in Syria are of Rabbinic origin.

5 All of the lands that [the Jews] who ascended from Egypt took possession of were sanctified in the first consecration [of the land]. When they were exiled, that sanctity was nullified. [The rationale is that] the initial consecration came about because of the conquest. [Hence,] its consecration was effective for the time [it was under their rule], but not for all time. When, by contrast, the descendants of the exiles ascended

[from Babylon] and took possession of a portion of the land, they consecrated it a second time. [This consecration] is perpetuated forever, for that time and for all time.

[The Sages] left those places that had been settled by [the Jews who] ascended from Egypt, but were not settled by those who ascended from Babylon in their previous [halachic status] and did not exempt them from [the obligations of] terumah and tithes so that the poor could rely upon them in the Sabbatical year. Our holy teacher released Beit Shan from those places which [the Jews] who ascended from Babylon did not take hold of. He decided that Ashkelon should be exempted from the tithes.

6 Thus the entire earth is divided into three categories in relation to those mitzvot involving the land: Eretz Yisrael, Syria, and the Diaspora. Eretz Yisrael itself is divided into two categories: a) those portions settled by the Jews who ascended from Babylonia, and b) those portions that were settled only by the Jews who ascended from Egypt.

The Diaspora is divided into two categories: a) Egypt, Babylon, Ammon, and Moab in which the mitzvot are observed according to the decrees of the sages and the prophets and the other lands in which [the obligations of] the terumot and the tithes are not observed.

7 What are [the boundaries of] the land settled by the Jews who ascended from Egypt? From Rekem which is in the east of Eretz Yisrael until the Mediterranean Sea. From Ashkelon which is in the south of Eretz Yisrael until Acre which is in the north. As one proceeds from Acre to Kziv, the area to one's right, on the east, can generally be assumed to be of the Diaspora - it is impure as is the lands of the nations and is exempt from [the mitzvot of] the tithes and the Sabbatical year - unless it is known that it was part of Eretz Yisrael. The area to one's left, to the west, can generally be assumed to be part of Eretz Yisrael - it is pure [from the impurity associated with] the lands of the nations and is obligated with regard to [mitzvot of] the tithes and the Sabbatical year - unless it is known to be part of the Diaspora. With regard to the entire area that slopes downward from the Samnum Mountains: The inner [portion] is Eretz Yisrael, the portion outside the Samnum Mountains is the Diaspora.

With regard to the islands in the sea, we consider their [status dependent] on an [imaginary] line extended from the Samnum Mountains until the River of Egypt. Those within this line are part of Eretz Yisrael. Those outside this line are part of the Diaspora. This is a depiction of the matter.

8 Which area did the Jews who ascended from Babylonia settle in? [The area] from Kziv inward toward the east. They did not, however, take possession of the area from Kziv outward until Amana which is Samnum until the river, i.e., the River of Egypt. And they did not take possession of Kziv itself.

9 What constitutes Syria? From Eretz Yisrael and below parallel to Aram Naharaim and Aram Tzovah, the entire region of the Euphrates until Babylonia, e.g., Damascus, Achalev, Charan, Minbag, and the like until Shinar and Tzahar. These are considered like Syria. Acre, by contrast, is considered part of the Diaspora, like Ashkelon. These are the boundaries of Eretz Yisrael.

10 When a gentile purchases land in Eretz Yisrael, he does not cause it to be absolved from [the observance of] the mitzvot. Instead, its holiness is still intact. Therefore, if a Jew purchases this land from [the gentile], it is not considered as a private conquest. Instead, he should separate the terumot and the tithes and bring the first fruits. All these [obligations] are Scriptural in origin, as if it was never sold to a gentile. When a gentile acquires land in Syria, his acquisition has the power to absolve [the land] from the obligations of tithes and the Sabbatical year, as will be explained.

11 [The following laws apply with regard to] produce belonging to a gentile that grew on land that he purchased in Eretz Yisrael. If all the work involving the produce was completed in the possession of a gentile and the gentile straightened the edges of the grain heap, they are exempt, because [the verse mentioning the obligation to separate terumah, Deuteronomy 18:4] mentions "your grain," [thus excluding] the grain of a gentile.

If a Jew purchases [the produce] after it was harvested, but before the tasks involved with it were completed and they were completed by a Jew, all [of the agricultural obligations apply with regard to the produce] according to Scriptural Law. He must separate the great terumah and give it to a priest and [separate] the terumat ma'aser and sell it to a priest. The first tithe belongs to him, because he can tell a Levite with regard to the tithes and a priest with regard to the terumat ma'aser: "I am coming in the stead of a person from which you could not have collected anything."

Why do we say that he should not give the terumat ma'aser to a priest as [he gives him] the great terumah? Because with regard to terumat ma'aser, it is written: "When you take the tithes from the children of Israel...." [Implied is that from] untithed produce that you purchase from a Jew, you should separate terumat ma'aser and give it to a priest, but from untithed produce that you purchase from a gentile, you need not give the priest the terumat ma'aser you separate from it. Instead, you sell it to the priest and take the money.

12 [The following laws apply if] a gentile sold his produce to a Jew while it was connected to the earth. If [he sold it] before it developed to a stage when he is obligated to separate tithes and the work [associated with it] was completed while it was owned by the Jew, [the Jew] is responsible for all of the agricultural obligations and should give the terumot and the tithes to their [appropriate] owners. If [the gentile] sold [the produce] after it developed to a stage when he is obligated to separate tithes, he should separate terumat ma'aser and the tithes and give them to their [appropriate] owners according to the [acceptable] reckoning.

What is implied? If he purchased grain that had been sown from a gentile after it reached a third of its growth and the work associated with its completion was performed while it was in the possession of a Jew, he should separate the terumot and the tithes, as we explained. He should give two thirds of the tithes to a Levite. [With regard to the] terumat ma'aser, he should give two thirds to the priest and sell him one third.

13 [The following laws apply if] a Jew sold his produce to a gentile before it developed to a stage when he is obligated to separate tithes and the work [associated with it] was completed by the gentiles, it is exempt from the terumot and the tithes. If [he purchased it] after it developed to a stage when the tithes are obligated to be separated, even if the gentile completed the work associated with it, all of the agricultural obligations are incumbent upon it according to Rabbinic decree.

Similarly, if a gentile completed [the work associated with] produce belonging to a Jew, since the work associated with them was completed by a gentile, the obligation for terumot and tithes is incumbent upon them, but it is only Rabbinic in origin.

14 If a gentile sold produce that was still connected to the earth after it reached the stage when the tithes are obligated to be separated and [another] gentile straightened the edges of the grain heap in the possession of a Jew, [the produce] is not obligated in the terumot or the tithes. Since the produce reached the stage when the tithes are obligated to be separated in the possession of a gentile and a gentile straightened the edges of the grain heap, [the fact] the produce belongs to a Jew [is not significant].

15 When a person purchases a field in Syria, he is obligated by Rabbinic decree to separate terumot and tithes like one who purchases [a field] in Jerusalem according to Scriptural Law, as we explained. If, however, a person [merely] purchases produce from a gentile - whether it was harvested or [still] connected to the earth - he is exempt, because [the produce] does not come from his land. [This applies] even if [he purchases the produce] before it develops to a stage when the tithes are obligated to be separated [and] even though a Jew straightened the edges

16 [The following laws apply when a person] purchases land in Syria to which produce is attached. If it reached a stage when the tithes are obligated to be separated while in the possession of a gentile, it is exempt. [Conversely,] if it did not reach a stage when the tithes are obligated to be separated [in his possession], [the Jewish purchaser] is obligated to tithe it, since he purchased it together with the land.

17 When a Jew is working as a sharecropper for a gentile in Syria, his produce is exempt from the tithes, because he does not own the land itself at all. A gentile's purchase of land in Syria causes it to be absolved from [the obligation of] the tithes, as we explained. The same laws apply when one rents a field, but stipulates that the payment will be made in produce, enters into a sharecropping agreement as a mekabel, or rents a field for money from a gentile in Syria, he is absolved [from the obligations of] terumot and tithes.

18 [The following law applies when] a Jew purchases a field from a gentile in Syria before [the crops] reached a third of their development and sells it to a gentile after the crops reach a third of their development. If a Jew purchases it a second time, he is obligated [to separate] the terumot and the tithes, because [the field] incurred that obligation in the possession of a Jew.

19 When a Jew owns land in Syria and he hired a sharecropper and the sharecropper sent him produce, he is not obligated to separate [the terumot and tithes], for it is possible to say that [the sharecropper] purchased [the produce he gave him] from the marketplace. [This applies] provided this species is available in the marketplace.

20 There is an obligation [to separate] the terumot and the tithes [from crops grown on land owned in] partnership with a gentile.

What is implied? When a Jew and a non-Jew purchased a field in partnership - even if they divided the field while the grain was standing, and needless to say, if they divided it after it was collected in a grain heap - tevel and ordinary produce are mixed together in each and every stalk of grain in the gentile's share. [This applies] even if the gentile straightened the edges of the grain heap and thus the obligation is Rabbinic in origin, as explained.

21 When does the above apply? In Eretz Yisrael, where [the obligation to] tithe is Scriptural in origin, and according to Scriptural Law, the principle of bereirah does not apply. If, however, he purchased a field in Syria, since [the obligation to] tithe there is Rabbinic in origin, even if they divided a grain heap, the portion of the gentile is exempt entirely.

22 When produce from Eretz Yisrael is taken to the Diaspora, it is exempt from the obligations of challah, the terumot, and the tithes, [for one of the prooftexts requiring the separation of these gifts, Numbers 15:18] states: "[the land] to which I am bringing you." [Implied is that] these obligations exist there alone. In the Diaspora, one is exempt. If [the produce] was taken to Syria, one is obligated by Rabbinic decree.

Conversely, we are obligated [to separate] challah from produce from the Diaspora that was brought into Eretz Yisrael, as [suggested by the phrase] "to which." [Implied is that] one is liable [to make these gifts] there, whether the produce is from Eretz Yisrael or the Diaspora. If the obligation [to separate challah or the tithes] was established [because of the actions] of a Jew after the produce entered Eretz Yisrael, there is an obligation of Rabbinic origin to separate the tithes.

23 When earth from the Diaspora is brought to Eretz Yisrael by ship, if the ship's [bottom] comes in contact with the earth [of Eretz Yisrael], terumah and tithes must [be separated from produce] growing on [the earth in the ship] and the Sabbatical laws must be observed as if [the produce] was growing in Eretz Yisrael itself.

24 When a tree is standing in the Diaspora and its foliage leans into Eretz Yisrael or it is standing in Eretz Yisrael and its foliage leans into the Diaspora, [the determination of its status] depends on its roots. If some of its roots were in Eretz Yisrael and others were in the Diaspora - even if they were separated by glistening stone, [it is considered as if] tevel and ordinary produce are mixed together [throughout the entire produce].

25 [The following rules apply when] a plant in a flowerpot with a hole has not sprouted roots [outside the flowerpot]. If its roots were in Eretz Yisrael and its foliage in the Diaspora, [the determination of its status] depends on its foliage.

26 In the present era, even in the areas settled by the Jews who ascended from Babylonia, even those [settled] in the era of Ezra, [the obligation to separate] terumah does not have the status of a Scriptural commandment, merely that of a Rabbinic decree. [The rationale is that] the Scriptural [commandment to separate] terumah applies only in Eretz Yisrael and only when the entire Jewish people are located there. [This is derived from the phrase] "When you enter...." [Implied is that] the entire [Jewish people] must enter [the land], as they did when they took possession of the land originally and as will happen in the future when they take possession of the land a third time. In contrast, the second time [the people] took possession of the land, in the time of Ezra, only a portion entered. Hence, they were not obligated according to Scriptural Law. Similarly, it appears to me that the same concept applies with regard to the tithes. In the present era, this obligation [as well] has the status of a Rabbinic decree like terumah.

1 [We are] obligated [to separate] terumah from food [designated] for human [consumption], that is guarded, and that grows from the earth. It is a positive commandment to separate the first portion [of such crops] for a priest, as [Deuteronomy 18:4] states: "You shall give him the first portion of your grain, your wine, and your oil." Just as grain, wine, and oil are [agricultural produce that] is food that is designated for humans, grows from the earth, and has an owner - as indicated by the term "your grain," - so, too, [we are] obligated to [separate] terumot and tithes from any analogous [agricultural produce].

2 [We are] obligated [to separate] terumah and tithes from vetch, even though it is not [usually] food for humans, since it is eaten [by humans] in a year of famine. [We are] obligated [to separate] tithes from siyah, hyssop, and koranit that are sown for human consumption. Similar laws apply to analogous species.

If they were sown as animal fodder, even though the person changed his mind and thought to use them for human [consumption] while they were still connected to the ground, they are exempt. For the intent [of the owner] while [the produce] is growing is of no consequence.

[The following rules apply if] these herbs grow in a courtyard on their own. If the produce growing in the courtyard is guarded, [we are] obligated to [separate the tithes], for most probably it is for human consumption. If the produce within is not guarded, it is exempt.

3 Seeds of garden vegetables that are not eaten, e.g., turnip seed, raddish seed, onion seed, and the like are exempt from terumah and tithes, because they are not used for human consumption. [We are,] by contrast, obligated [to separate] terumah and tithes from caraway seed.

4 Blossoms of chilba, mustard seed, white beans, capers, and the caper bark are exempt, because they are not considered as produce.

When does the above apply? When they were sown for seed. When, however, they were sown for their produce, there is an obligation [to tithe]. Similarly, there is an obligation [to tithe] caper berries, because they are produce.

5 When coriander was sown for seed, its vegetable is exempt from terumah and the tithes. If it was sown as a vegetable, we must separate terumot and tithes from both the vegetables and the seed. Similarly, when shevet is sown for seed, its vegetable is exempt from terumah and the tithes. If it was sown as a vegetable, we must separate terumot and tithes from both the vegetables and the seed. The seed capsules need not be tithed. If he sowed it for the sake of the seed capsules, he must separate terumot and tithes from the vegetables, the seed, and the seed capsules. Similarly, when cress and wild cress were sown as a vegetable, we must separate tithes from both the seed and the vegetables.

What is meant by [the statement] we must separate tithes from both the seed and the vegetables? That if he gathered the vegetables to eat them, he must separate terumah and the tithes and [only] then, eat. When [he allows the plant] to dry [and produce] seeds which he gathers, he must make these separations from the seed.

6 Even though vegetables are used for human consumption, the obligation to tithe them is only Rabbinic in origin. [The rationale is that] with regard to the tithes, [Deuteronomy 14:22] speaks of "the yield of your planting." Now the term tevuah [translated as "yield"] refers to grain and the like. Vegetables are not included as tevuah.

Similarly, it appears to me that this also applies with regard to terumah, for with regard to terumah, it is stated: "your grain, your wine, and your oil." Implied is that the obligation is applied to all species resembling those. Instead, terumah which is separated from vegetables is a Rabbinic decree like their tithes.

7 We do not separate terumah and tithes from vegetables in the Diaspora, even in the places where we said that tithes should be separated, Similarly, vegetables that come from the Diaspora to Eretz Yisrael, even though there is earth in their roots, they are exempt and nothing was decreed concerning them.

When grain or legumes are sown for their vegetables, the person's intent is not considered of consequence because of the prevailing conception of most people. [Hence,] their vegetables are exempt and [we are] obligated [to separate] terumah and tithes from their kernels.

8 Even though tiltan is not considered as fit for human consumption when it becomes hard, since most people eat it at the beginning [of its development], [we are] obligated [to separate] terumah and tithes from it.

9 The following are exempt from terumah and tithes: Leket, shichachah, pe'ah, individual grapes that separate from a cluster, and underdeveloped grape clusters. This applies even if [a poor person] collects them in a grainheap. If, however, he collects them in a granary in the field, it is established that there is an obligation for tithes upon them and terumah and tithes must be separated from them. If, however, he collects them in a granary in a town, they are exempt, for the matter is spoken about and everyone knows that [the produce] is leket, shichachah, and pe'ah.

10 One is obligated [to separate] terumah and tithes from leket, shichachah, and pe'ah [left] by a gentile unless he declared them ownerless. Similarly, if grain and olives did not reach a third of their growth, they are exempt from terumah and the tithes.

How can one know [whether produce has reached a third of its growth]? When [the kernels] would grow if they were sown, it is known that it has reached a third of its growth. If a person transgressed and separated [terumah] from grain and olives before they reached a third of their growth, [the separated produce] is not terumah.

11 Similarly, produce that is declared ownerless is exempt from terumah and tithes. [This applies also to produce] declared ownerless by a gentile. Nevertheless, if one planted [crops] on a field that was declared ownerless, he is obligated [to separate] terumah and tithes [from the crops].

12 When a person declares standing grain ownerless, takes possession of it, and then transgresses and separates terumah, the laws of terumah apply to the produce separated. If, however, he declared sheaves [of grain] ownerless, takes possession of them, and transgresses and separates terumah, the laws of terumah do not apply to the produce separated. Similarly, whenever a person separates [terumah] from produce from which terumah is not obligated to be separated, the laws of terumah do not apply to the produce separated.

Similarly, with regard to tithes, produce which the majority of people do not ordinarily sow in their gardens and fields, but instead, can be assumed to have grown ownerless are exempt from terumah and tithes. [This includes] garlic that makes one cry, onions of Rikpah, a pearled Cilcilian bean, Egyptian lentils, and the like.

13 [The following laws apply if] produce from which we are obligated to separate terumah becomes mixed with produce which is exempt, e.g., olives gathered by the poor become mixed with olives reaped [by the owner], underdeveloped grape clusters become mixed with grapes that were harvested. If the person has other produce, he separates [terumah from it] for the produce upon which the obligation lies according to the appropriate reckoning. If this is all the produce the person has, he should separate terumah and terumat ma'aser for the entire mixture, as if there was an obligation to separate terumah from the entire amount. He should separate the first and second tithes for the produce upon which the obligation lies according to the appropriate reckoning.

14 Terumah [must be given] to a priest whether it is in a state of ritual purity or not. Even if all the grain or the wine became impure before [terumah] was separated, he is obligated to separate the terumah that is impure and give it to a priest, as [Numbers 18:8] states: "And behold I have given you the watch over My terumah," i.e., whether it is pure or impure. The pure [terumah] may be eaten by the priests and they can benefit from the impure [terumah] by burning it. If it is oil, it can be kindled [as fuel for a lamp]. If it is grain or the like, it can be used as fuel for an oven.

15 Similarly, if terumat ma'aser became impure - or if the tithes became impure, he must separate [terumat ma'aser] in impurity and give it to a priest to benefit from by using it as fuel.

16 Anyone who separates the great terumah or terumat ma'aser should recite a blessing before separating it, just as one recites a blessing over the observance of all the mitzvot, as we explained in [Hilchot] Berachot.

17 Terumah - even impure terumah - should not be taken from Eretz Yisrael to the Diaspora. We should not bring terumah from the Diaspora to Eretz Yisrael. If it was brought [from the Diaspora], it should not be eaten, because it is impure because [of contact with] the earth of the nations. It should not be burnt, lest people say: "We saw terumah that did not become impure being burnt." It should not be returned to the Diaspora, lest people say: "Terumah may be taken [from Eretz Yisrael] to the Diaspora." Instead, we leave it until it becomes impure because of a known source of impurity or until the day before Pesach if it was leaven, and then it will be burnt.

1 There is no minimum requirement for the great terumah according to Scriptural Law, as [implied by Deuteronomy 18:4]: "The first of your grain," i.e., even the slightest amount. Even one kernel of grain fulfills the requirement for the entire grain heap. Idealy, one should separate only according to the measures specified by our Sages. In the present age, when [the terumah] will be burnt because of impurity, a person may separate even the smallest amount as an initial and prefatory measure.

2 What is the measure that our Sages established? A generous measure is one fourtieth [of the crop]. The average [measure] is one fiftieth and a parsimonious measure is one sixtieth.

3 Idealy, we may separate one sixtieth [of the crop] as terumah from species to which the priests do not pay attention, e.g., carobs and kilisin beans.
[Similarly,] we [may separate] one sixtieth [of the crop as terumah] in the following situations: terumah separated from produce grown from terumah, terumah that is mixed [with tevel], or impure terumah that became impure against one's will or inadvertently, terumah taken from consecrated crops, terumah [separated in] the Diaspora, terumah from ketzach, kilisin, carobs, poor quality wild figs, red barley kernels, and the like, and produce grown in a flower-pot that does not have a hole.
Similarly, when guardians separate [terumah] from the produce of orphans, they should separate one sixtieth.

4 One should not separate this terumah with a measure, a scale, or by number, because [the Torah] did not specify a measure for this [allocation]. Instead, one makes an estimation and separates one fiftieth according to his conception. One may, however, separate terumah from [produce that is] measured, weighed, or counted. He should not separate terumah using a basket or a container whose measure is known. He may, however, separate terumah by [filling] half or a third of their measure. One should not separate terumah [by using] half [a measure of] a se'ah, because its half is also a measure.

5 When a person separates a large measure of terumah, as long as he leaves a certain portion as ordinary produce, [the separated portion] is terumah. If, however, he said: "All of this produce is terumah," his statements are of no consequence.

If a person intended to separate one tenth [of his crop] as terumah, but it happened that he actually set aside one sixtieth, [the separated portion] is terumah. If, however, he intended to give the sixtieth as terumah, but it happened that he actually set aside one fiftieth, [the separated portion] is not terumah.

6 When a person sets aside terumah and it happened that he gave one twentieth [of his crop], [the separated portion] is terumah. If he set aside terumah and it happened that he gave one sixtieth [of his crop] and hence, he added more produce for the sake of terumah, the tithes must be separated from that additional amount. The priest must separate them and only then may he partake of it.

If a person set aside terumah and it happened that he gave one sixty-first [of his crop], [the separated portion] is terumah, but he must set aside a second portion to complete the measure that he originally intended to give. This additional measure may be set aside with a measure, a scale, or by number. He should set aside [the terumah] only from the produce that is encompassed [in the same area] as is true with regard to the initial separation [of terumah].

7 When a person separates a portion of the terumah [that he originally intended to separate], that portion does not have the status of terumah. Nevertheless, the terumah from that portion should be separated from it and not from other produce.

8 When a person separates a portion of terumah from one grain heap and a portion of terumah from a second grain heap of the same species, he should not separate terumah from one grain heap for the other.
[The following rules apply when a person] says: "The terumah for this grain heap is in its midst." If he specified a place - on the north side or the south - he has designated terumah and is obligated to separate terumah from that [portion of the grain heap]. If he did not specify a place, his statements are of no consequence.

9 If [a person separating terumah] said: "The terumah for this grain heap is this and the terumah for this grain heap is like that one," at the place where the terumah for the first grain heap ended, the terumah for the second grain heap also ended.

10 Terumat Ma'aser may not be separated by estimation. [Instead,] one must be precise in its measure, even in the present age, because its measure is explicitly stated in the Torah.

11 [Produce] that is usually measured in volume, should be measured in volume. [Produce] that is weighed should be weighed and if it can [easily] be counted, it should be counted. If it could [easily] be counted, weighed, or measured in volume, it is praiseworthy to count it, more praiseworthy to measure its volume, and most praiseworthy to weigh it.

12 The mitzvah [to separate] terumat ma'aser is for a Levite to separate it from the tithe [given] him, as [Numbers 18:26] states: "When you take the tithe from the children of Israel...." An Israelite may separate terumat ma'aser and give it to a priest and then give the tithes to a Levite after separating the terumat [ma'aser] from it, i.e., a tenth of a tenth.

13 When an Israelite separates the first tithe while the crop is still stalks [of grain] and gives it to the Levite before it was threshed and before he separated the great terumah, the Levite is not required to separate the great terumah from it after he threshes it, only terumat ma'aser.

If, however, the Israelite threshed [the crop] and separated a tithe of the grain and gave it to the Levite before he separated the great terumah, the Levite is obligated to separate the great terumah and terumat ma'aser, since [the crop] has already been [separated into kernels of] grain, the obligation [to separate] terumah has fallen upon it, as [implied by the phrase]: "The first of your grain."

14 When a Levite took grain while it was in stalks, he should not give the terumah to the priest in stalks. Instead, we penalize him [and require him] to thresh [the crop], winnow it, and give the priest a tenth of a tenth of the kernels of the grain. He is not required to give him a tenth of the straw or the chaff. If he set aside terumat ma'aser while the crop was in stalks as it was given to him, he must crush it and give the priest the kernels and the straw.

Why did they penalize him and make him crush it? Because he accepted the tithe while it was in the stalks and thus precluded the separation of the great terumah.

15 When an Israelite tells a Levite: "My father told me: 'I have ma'aser for you in my possession,' we are not concerned about [the possibility of] it containing terumat ma'aser. [We are confident] that his father separated the terumat ma'aser. Therefore he commanded him that the [entire] tithe should be given to the Levite.

If [the Israelite] told [the Levite]: "My father told me: 'I have a kor of ma'aser for you in my possession,' we are concerned about [the possibility of] it containing terumat ma'aser.

16 Terumat ma'aser that is an eighth of an eighth [of a log] should be brought to a priest. For less than that, [we do not trouble him] to bring it to a priest. Instead, he may throw it into the fire and burn it. With regard to wine and oil, by contrast, even the smallest amount [of terumat ma'aser] should be brought to a priest provided it is definitely terumat ma'aser and ritually pure. If it was ritually impure or if it was demai, if it does not contain [the above] measure, he is not required to trouble himself with it. Instead, he should burn it.

17 We should separate the great terumah only from [produce] in the same location. What is implied? A person had 50 se'ah in one room and 50 se'ah in another, he should not separate two se'ah from one room for the entire 100 se'ah, for he would be separating produce from one location for produce from another.

[After the fact,] if one separated terumah from one location for produce in another, the separation is effective, provided the produce separated [as terumah] is protected. If, however, a person possessed jugs of oil and/or wine and saw that they were breaking, should he say: "These are terumah for the produce in my home," his words are of no consequence.

18 When produce is scattered in a room or there are two granaries in the same room, one may separate terumah from one for the entire amount. When sacks of grain, spheres of dried figs, or jugs of figs are in the same place, one may separate from one for the entire amount. With regard to jugs of wine, until one has sealed their lids closed, he may separate terumah from one for the entire amount. After they have been sealed, he must separate terumah from each one individually.

19 When a person was gathering bunches of vegetables and leaving them in [his] garden, he may separate terumah from one for the entire amount. If he brings another type of produce between them, he must separate terumah from each one individually. If he brought several species together in a container, e.g., cabbage on top, cabbage on bottom, and another species in between, he should not separate terumah from the top head for the bottom head.

If he collected five piles in one granary, he may separate terumah from one for the entire amount provided the fundamental collection is intact. If the fundamental collection is not intact, he must separate terumah from each one individually.

20 Terumat ma'aser may be separated even if [the produce] is not in the same location. [This is implied by Numbers 18:28]: Separate terumah "from all of your tithes." [Implied is that] even if there is one [collection of] tithes in one city and another [collection of] tithes in another city, one may separate terumat [ma'aser] once for all of them. Torah scholars separate even terumat ma'aser only from [produce] in one location.

21 When a Levite possessed [produce from] the first tithe from which terumat ma'aser was not separated and he left it so that he could continuously separate terumat ma'aser [for other crops] from it while it is still tevel, his actions are viable. [This is derived from Numbers 18:24]: "For the tithes of the children of Israel [from] which they will separate terumah...." Implied is that [the tithes] can be transformed into terumat [ma'aser] in their entirety.

22 If one separated terumat ma'aser first and then left [the produce] so that one could continually separate terumat ma'aser for other produce from it until it becomes terumat ma'aser in its entirety, at which he would give it to a priest, his actions are of no consequence. [This is derived from ibid.: 29]: "The sacred portion from it." Implied is that when its sacred portion is in it, it can be made terumat [ma'aser] for other [crops]. If its sacred portion is no longer in it, it cannot be made terumat [ma'aser] for other [crops]. Similarly, when a person sets aside crops to separate the great terumah from them, they must be tevel with regard to terumah. If a person sets aside crops to separate the tithes from them, they must be tevel with regard to the tithes.

23 When terumah and the tithes are separated, we separate them in proper sequence.

What is implied? Before everything, one separates bikkurim. Afterwards,

[he separates] the great terumah, the first tithe, then the second tithe or the tithe for the poor. If a person separated the second [tithe] before the first, or the tithes before terumah, or terumah before bikkurim, his actions are effective despite the fact that he has transgressed a negative commandment.

What is the source which teaches that a negative commandment is involved? [Exodus 22:28] states: "Do not delay your fullness offering or your priestly heave-offering." [Implied is a command] not to delay [the separation of produce] that should come first. Lashes are not given [as punishment for the violation] of this prohibition.

24 When a person desires to separate the great terumah and terumat ma'aser at the same time, he should separate 1/33.33 of his crop. He should say: "One hundredth of [the produce] that is here - i.e., on the side of the produce which I set aside - is ordinary produce. The remainder of what I separated is terumah for the entire crop. The tithes which are necessary to be separated for these hundred portions of ordinary produce are at the side of [the produce] that I separated. The remainder of what I separated aside from the terumah is terumat ma'aser on the entire amount."

1 A person may appoint an agent to separate terumah and the tithes for him, as [Numbers 18:28] states: "So shall you separate, also you." [The wording implies] the inclusion of an agent. A gentile may not be appointed as an agent, because [the phrase] "also you" [implies an equation between you and your agent]. Just as you are a member of the covenant, your agent must be a member of the covenant.

2 There are five [types of individuals] who should not separate terumah and [even] if they do, [the produce] they separated is not considered as terumah: A deaf-mute, a mentally or emotionally unstable person, a minor, a gentile who separated terumah from produce belonging to a Jew, even with his permission, and a person who separates terumah from produce that does not belong to him without the owner's permission. If, however, a person separates terumah from his own produce for the produce of others, the produce is terumah and [the colleague's] produce has been prepared for use. The satisfaction [of allocating the terumah] belongs [to the person who separated it and he may] give to whichever priest he desires.

3 [The following rules apply when a person] separates terumah [from a colleague's produce] without permission or descends into his colleague's field and gathered produce without permission so that he could take them [for himself], but separate some as terumah. When the owner comes and says: "You should have taken better ones," if there are better ones than those separated as terumah, the separation is effective, because [the owner] did not object. If there are not better ones, his separation is not effective, for his statements were made as an objection. If the owner came and gathered produce and added it to the quantity separated, whether he possesses better produce or not, his separation is effective.

4 There are five who should not separate terumah, but if they do, their separation is effective:
a person who is deaf, but not mute, because he cannot hear the blessing, a mute who can hear, but not speak and a person who is naked, because they cannot recite the blessing, and a person who is drunk and a blind person, because they cannot make distinctions and separate the most attractive portion [as terumah].

5 When a minor reaches the age when his vows may be of consequence - even though he has not manifested signs of physical maturity and he has not attained majority - separates terumah, his separation is of consequence. [This applies] even with regard to terumah mandated by Scriptural Law. [The rationale is that] their vows and their consecration [of property] is valid according to Scriptural Law, as explained in [Hilchot] Nedarim.

6 When a person tells his agent: "Go and separate terumah for me" and he goes to separate terumah, but [the principal] does not know whether he [actually] separated terumah or not, [even] when he discovers that terumah was separated from the granary, we do not assume that [he] separated terumah. For with regard to prohibitions, we apply the principle: "An agent can be assumed to have carried out his mission," only when that leads to a stringency, not when it leads to a leniency. [Instead,] we suspect that another person separated the terumah without his permission.

7 When a person tells his agent: "Go and separate terumah," he should separate according to the temperament of the owner. If he knows that he is parsimonious, he should separate one sixtieth. If he was generous, he should separate one fortieth. If he does not know his temperament, he should make the average separation, one fiftieth. If he intended to make the average separation, but it turned out that he separated one fortieth or one sixtieth, his separation is effective. If he intended to add to the average separation, and he separated even one forty-ninth, his separation is not effective.

8 There is an obligation to separate terumah and tithes from produce belonging to partners, for [Numbers 18:28] speaks of "your tithes," [using a plural term,] implying even from two people.

Partners do not have to receive permission from each other. Instead, whenever anyone separates terumah, the separation is effective. [The following rules apply when] one of them separated terumah and then the other came and separated terumah, because he did not know that his colleague had separated it. If they relied on each other, the terumah separated by the second is not of consequence. If they did not rely on each other, but the first one separated an appropriate amount, the separation of the second one is of no consequence. If the first did not separate the appropriate amount, the separation of the second one is also of consequence.

9 [The following rules apply when a person] tells his agent, his attendant, his servant, or his maid-servant to separate terumah and they went to separate the terumah, but he nullified their agency before they made the separation. If the agent did not deviate [from the principal's instructions], his separation is effective. If he did deviate, e.g., the principal told him: "Separate from the northern side," and he separated from the southern side, since he nullified the agency previously, the separation is not effective.

10 [The following rules apply when] a sharecropper separates terumah and the owner [of the land] objects. If he objects before he completes the separation of the terumah, the separation is not of consequence. If he objected after the separation, the separation is of consequence.
Guardians may separate terumah from the property of orphans.

11 The separation of terumah by a thief, a robber, and a man of force is effective. If the owner is pursuing them, the separation is not effective.

12 A child, a worker, a servant, and a wife should separate terumah for [produce] that they are eating, but not for the entire [crop]. For a person should not separate terumah from [produce] that does not belong to him.
When a son eats together with his father and a woman [makes] dough, they may separate terumah, because they have license to do so.

13 Workers do not have license to separate terumah without the consent of the owner with the exception of those who tread grapes in the vat. [They are given this license because] if they desired to make the wine impure, they could do so immediately. Since the wine was thus given over to their domain and they were entrusted with it, they are considered as agents. If they separate terumah, the separation is effective.

14 When a worker is told by the owner: "Bring my granary in and separate terumah," but he separates and then brings the granary in, his separation is effective.

15 When a gentile separates terumah from his own produce, according to Scriptural Law, the separation is not effective, because he is not obligated to do so. [Our Rabbis] decreed that his separation should be effective, because of the wealthy, [i.e., they were fearful] lest the money belong to a Jew and he say that it belongs to a gentile to make it exempt.

We cross-examine the gentile who separates terumah. If he says: "I separated it so that it should be like a Jew's," we give it to a priest. If not, it should be entombed, for perhaps his intent was [to dedicate it] to heaven.

When does the above apply? In Eretz Yisrael. Our Sages did not, however, issue a decree if a gentile separates terumah in the Diaspora. We tell him that he is not obligated to do this and the produce is not terumah at all.

16 When a person [makes a separation and] intends to say terumah, but instead says tithes, or intends to say tithes, but instead says terumah, his statement is of no consequence unless his mouth and his heart are in accord.

If one separates terumah in his mind without uttering anything verbally, the separation is effective, as [implied by Numbers 18:27]: "And your terumah will be considered for you as the terumah of the granary." Through thought alone, it becomes terumah.

17 [The following rules apply when a person] separates terumah with a stipulation. If the stipulation is fulfilled, the separation is effective. If not, it is not effective.

When a person separates terumah and/or the tithes and then regrets [his act], he may approach a sage and ask for its repeal as other vows are repealed. The produce then reverts to being ordinary produce as it was before until he makes a separation a second time, [setting aside] either the same produce he separated initially or other produce.

18 [The following rules apply when a person] separates terumah from a cistern of wine, saying: "Behold [the contents of] this [container] are terumah on the condition that it ascends intact [from the cistern]," [for the condition to have been met, the container] must ascend intact from being broken or spilt. [The stipulation does not cover the wine] becoming impure. If [the container] is broken [and the wine] spills back into the cistern, it does not cause the mixture to become meduma. If [he lifted the container from the cistern and] put it in a place where if it breaks or rolls, it will not reach the cistern, [should the wine later spill into the cistern], it causes the mixture to become meduma, because the stipulation was fulfilled.

19 When does the above apply? With regard to the great terumah. With regard to terumat ma'aser, by contrast, [different rules apply] because it is permitted to make this separation from produce that is not in the same place. [Hence as soon as the container] ascends [from the cistern], his stipulation is considered to have been fulfilled and [the wine separated] is terumat ma'aser, even though [afterwards, the container] breaks or [the wine] spills. Needless to say, this applies if [the terumat ma'aser] becomes impure.

20 When a person says: "The produce in the upper portion [of this container] is terumah and that in its lower portion is ordinary produce" or "The produce in the upper portion [of this container] is ordinary produce and that in its lower portion is terumah," his statements are effective. For the matter is dependent on the thought of the person making the separation.

21 When a person separates terumah from [grain in] a granary, he must have the intent in his heart that [the produce separated] will be terumah for this grain heap, the stalks of wheat that were cut [and not threshed], [the grain] on the side of the grain heap, and [the kernels] in the straw. When a person separates terumah from a vat [of wine], he must have the intent in his heart that he is separating terumah for [the wine absorbed] in the kernels and the peels.

When a person separates terumah from a cistern of wine, he must have the intent in his heart that he is separating terumah for [the wine absorbed] in the peat. [in all the above instances,] if he separates terumah without having a specific intent, all of the produce is included. For it is a condition of the court that [when one separates terumah, it] includes everything. When a person separates terumah from a basket of figs and other figs are found at the side of the basket, terumah need not be separated from them, because in his heart, a person has the intent to separate terumah for all the produce.

1 We should separate terumah only from the most choice [produce], as [implied by Numbers 18:30]: "When you separate its most choice portion from it." If, however, there is no priest accessible, one should separate terumah from produce that will last even though there is more choice produce but it will not last.

What is implied? A person should separate fresh figs as terumah for dried figs. In a place where there are no priests, he should separate dried figs for fresh figs. If he is accustomed to dry fresh figs, he may separate fresh figs as terumah for dried figs even in a place where there is no priest. In a place where there is a priest, by contrast, dried figs are never separated as terumah for fresh figs, even in a place where it is customary to dry fresh figs.

2 One may separate an entire onion as terumah even if it is small, but not half an onion, even if it is large in all places. We do not separate one type of produce as terumah for another type of produce, as [implied by Numbers 18:30]: "As grain from the granary and as wine from the vat." If one made such a separation, it is not considered terumah.

3 Zucchini and cucumbers are considered as one species. All of the types of wheat are one species. All of the types of figs, dried figs, and blocks of figs are one species. [In the above instances,] one may separate terumah from one type for the other. [By contrast,] all types of produce which are considered as a mixture of species may not be separated as terumah for each other, even when one separates the choicest produce as terumah for produce of lesser quality.

What is implied? A person has 50 se'ah of wheat and 50 se'ah of barley in one building. If he separates two se'ah of wheat [as terumah] for the entire amount, his separation is not effective. When types of produce are not considered as a mixture of species, one may separate the better type as terumah for the lesser type, but not the lesser type as terumah for the better type. If one did separate [the lesser type of produce as terumah for the better type, after the fact,] the separation is effective with one exception. *Zunin*may not be separated as terumah for wheat, because it is not used as food for humans.

4 We do not separate terumah from produce for which all the work [in preparing it] was completed for produce for which the work [in preparing it] is incomplete, from produce for which the work [in preparing it] is incomplete for [other] produce for which the work [in preparing it] is incomplete, nor from produce for which the work [in preparing it] is incomplete for produce for which all the work [in preparing it] was completed. [This is also derived from the above prooftext:] "As grain from the granary and as wine from the vat." [Implied is that terumah should be separated from produce] for which [all work] was completed for similar produce. If, however, one separated terumah [in any of the above instances], the separation is effective [after the fact].

5 When should terumah be separated from a granary? When the kernels are separated. If a person separated part [of the grain], he may designate the kernels he separated as terumah for the produce that was not separated. When one brings stalks of grain into his home to eat husked grain, he should separate terumah while the grain is in the stalks.

6 When should terumah be separated from a vat? When [the treaders] have walked horizontally and vertically over the grapes.
When should one separate terumah from olives? When [the beam of the press] is placed upon them.

7 We should not separate terumah from ritually pure produce for produce that is not ritually pure. If, however, one separated terumah [in this manner], the separation is effective [after the fact].
It is a halachah conveyed to Moses at Sinai that when a portion of a cake of dried figs has become impure, we may separate terumah from the pure portion of it for the impure portion of it as an initial preference. This applies not only to a cake of dried figs which appears as one mass, but also to a bundle of vegetables and even a mound of wheat. If a portion of it became impure, one may separate terumah from the pure portion for the impure portion.
If, however, there were two cakes of dried figs, two bundles of vegetables, or two mounds of wheat, one impure and one pure at its side, as an initial preference, one should not separate terumah from the produce that is pure for the produce that is impure. One may, however, separate terumat ma'aser from produce that is pure for produce that is impure as an initial preference. [This is derived from Numbers 18:29:] "its sacred portion from it." [Implied is that] one should take from the sacred portion in it.

8 We may not separate produce that is ritually impure as terumah for produce that is ritually pure. If one made such a separation inadvertently, the portion separated is terumah. If one made the separation intentionally, he did not fulfill the obligation for the remainder [of the produce], but [the produce] separated is terumah. He must separate terumah a second time.

When does the above apply? When he did not know of the impurity. If, however, he knew of the impurity, but erred in that he thought it was permitted to separate produce that is ritually impure as terumah for produce that is ritually pure, he is considered as if he acted intentionally. Similar laws apply with regard to terumat ma'aser.

9 We may not separate produce that is still attached to the earth as terumah for produce that has already been detached. Nor may produce that has already been detached be separated as terumah for produce that is still attached to the earth.

What is implied? A person had produce that was detached and said: "This produce will be terumah for this produce which is attached to the earth" - and even if he said "...when [the attached produce] is detached," his words are of no consequence. [This ruling also applies] if he possessed two rows [of produce] and said: "The produce of this row which is detached will be terumah for this row which is attached," or "The produce of this row which is attached will be terumah for this row which is detached."

[Diferent rules apply should] he say: "The produce of this row which is detached will be terumah for this row when it will be detached," if [the produce] is [later] detached - since it is within his potential to detach it - when they are both detached, his words are binding, provided both [types of produce] had attained at least a third of their standard size at the time he made his statements.

10 We may not separate fresh produce as terumah for dried produce, nor dried produce as terumah for fresh produce. If, however, one made such a separation, it is effective.

What is implied? One reaped a type of vegetable one day and then reaped the same [type of vegetable] the following day. One may not separate one as terumah for the other unless this vegetable remains fresh for two days. Similarly, if a vegetable usually remains fresh for three days, e.g., cucumbers, all [of that type of vegetable] that are harvested for three days may be joined together and terumah may be separated from one for the other. When a type of vegetable remains fresh for only one day and one harvested some in the morning and some in the evening, one may separate one as terumah for the other.

11 One may not separate produce from the present year as terumah for produce of the previous year, nor may one separate produce from the previous year as terumah for produce of the present year. If one made such a separation, it is not effective, as [indicated by Deuteronomy 14:22]: "From year to year."Thus if one harvested a vegetable on the day preceding Rosh HaShanah before sunset and harvested another after sunset, one may not separate terumah from one for the other. For one is considered "old" and the other, "new."

Similarly, if one harvested an esrog on the day before the fifteenth of Shvat on the evening before sunset and harvested another one after sunset [that day], one may not separate terumah from one for the other. [The rationale is that] the first of Tishrei is the Rosh HaShanah for tithing grain, legumes, and vegetables and the fifteenth of Shvat is Rosh HaShanah for tithing [of the produce] of trees.

12 We may not separate produce from Eretz [Yisrael] as terumah for produce of the Diaspora, nor may produce of the Diaspora be separated for produce from Eretz Yisrael, nor may produce of Eretz Yisrael be separated for produce from Syria, and nor may produce of Syria be separated for produce from Eretz Yisrael.

Similarly, [we may not separate terumah] from produce for which terumah need not be separated, e.g., leket, shichachah, and pe'ah or from produce from which terumah was already separated for produce for which terumah must be separated. Nor may we separate terumah from produce for which terumah must be separated for produce for which there is no obligation. [Even] if the terumah was separated, the separation is not of consequence.

13 When a person separates terumah [for other produce] from produce that was designated as the first tithe, but from which its terumah had not been separated or from produce which was designated as the second tithe or that had been consecrated, but which had not been redeemed, the separation is not effective.

14 We may not separate terumah from produce for which we are required to separate terumah according to Scriptural Law for produce for which we are required to separate terumah [only] according to Rabbinic Law, nor from produce for which we are required to separate terumah [only] according to Rabbinic Law for produce for which we are required to separate terumah according to Scriptural Law. If one separated terumah [in the above instance], the produce separated is considered as terumah, but he must separate terumah again [for the obligation incumbent on this produce to be fulfilled].

15 A flowerpot with a hole is considered as [connected] to the earth. How large must the hole be [for this law to apply]? Large enough for a small root to pass through it. This is smaller than an olive.
[The following rules apply when a person] planted grain in a flowerpot that did not have a hole and it reached a third of its maturity. Afterwards, he perforated [the flowerpot] and the grain completed [its growth] while [the flowerpot] was perforated. It is, [nevertheless,] considered as if it grew in [a flowerpot] without a hole. [This ruling changes] only when [the flowerpot] was perforated before [the grain] reached a third of its maturity.

16 When a person separates terumah from produce which grows in the earth for produce that grows in a perforated flowerpot or from produce which grows in a perforated flowerpot for produce which grows in the earth, the separation is effective.
If he separates terumah from [produce growing] in a [flowerpot] that was not perforated for [produce growing] in a perforated [flowerpot], the produce separated is considered as terumah, but he must separate terumah again.

If he separates terumah from [produce growing] in a perforated [flowerpot] for [produce growing] in a [flowerpot] that was not perforated, the produce separated is considered as terumah. [Nevertheless, the priest to whom it was given] should not partake of it until [the owner] separates terumah and tithes for [the portion separated] from other produce.

17 When a person separates terumat [ma'aser] from produce that is demai for other produce that is demai or from produce that is demai for produce from which we are certain that the tithes were not separated, the produce separated is considered as terumat [ma'aser]. [Nevertheless,] he should separate terumah again for each type of produce individually.

When he separates terumah from produce from which we are certain that the tithes were not separated for produce that is demai, the produce separated is considered as terumat [ma'aser]. [Nevertheless, the priest to whom it was given] should not partake of it until [the owner] separates terumah and tithes for [the portion separated].

18 We may not separate stalks of grain as terumah for kernels of grain, olives [as terumah] for oil, or grapes [as terumah] for wine. If one made such a separation, it is not effective. This is a decree [enacted] lest one cause the priest to undertake the difficulty of treading [on the grapes] or pressing [the olives].

One may, however, separate oil as terumah for olives that are being pickled or wine as terumah for grapes that are being dried as raisins. What does this resemble? To separating terumah from two species that are not considered kilayim, separating from the good for the bad.

Similarly, one may separate terumah from olives from which oil will be squeezed for olives that will be pickled, but not from olives that will be pickled for olives from which oil will be squeezed. [One may separate terumah] from wine that has not been boiled for wine that has been boiled, but not from [wine] that has been boiled for [wine] that has not been boiled. [One may separate terumah] from [wine that is] clear for [wine that is] not clear, but not from [wine that is] not clear for wine [that is] clear.

One may separate terumah from kernels of wheat for bread, but not from bread for kernels of wheat according to the appropriate calculations. In all the above situations, if one separated terumah [when it was stated that one should not], the separation is effective.

19 We do not separate terumah from oil for olives that are being pressed, nor [do we separate terumah] from wine for grapes that are being tread, for this resembles separating terumah from produce for which all work has been completed for produce for which the work has not been completed. If he did separate terumah [in such a situation], the produce separated is considered as terumah, but he must separate terumah from the olives and the grapes from them themselves.

[When mixed with other produce,] the first creates a situation of dimua alone. One who eats it is liable for it, as one is liable [for partaking] of other terumah that is clearly defined as such. This does not apply with regard to the second terumah [separated].

20 When a person separated oil as terumah for olives that he intended to eat or he separated olives for olives when he intended to eat the entire quantity and then changed his mind and decided to press the olives [for oil] and indeed pressed them after separating terumah for them, he is not required to separate terumah again. [This law also applies if] one separated wine for grapes that he intended to eat or grapes for grapes when he intended to eat the entire quantity and then changed his mind and decided to tread the grapes for wine and indeed had them tread upon after separating terumah for them.

21 We do not separate vinegar as terumah for wine, but we may separate wine as terumah for vinegar, for wine and vinegar are one type of produce. If one had the intent of separating wine for wine and it was discovered that what he separated was vinegar, the separation is not effective. If one had the intent of separating vinegar for vinegar and it was discovered that what he separated was wine, the separation is effective.

22 [The following rules apply when a person] separates a barrel of wine as terumah for wine and it is discovered to be vinegar. If it was known to be vinegar before it was separated, the separation is not effective. If it became vinegar after it was designated as terumah, the separation is effective. If there is a doubt, the separation is effective, but he should make a second separation. The same laws apply when one separates squash as terumah and it is discovered to be bitter or one separates a watermelon as terumah and it has become spoiled or perforated. If he separated a barrel of wine as terumah and it was discovered to have been left open in which instance, it is forbidden to drink it, it is terumah, but he should make a second separation.

[In all these situations, when mixed with other produce,] neither of the two [portions separated as terumah] creates a situation of dimua alone. Nor is a person who eats only one of the two obligated to pay a fifth.

23 What is implied? If one [of the two portions separated as terumah] fell into ordinary produce, it does not cause it to be considered as dimua. If the other [portion] fell into other produce, it does not cause it to be considered as dimua. If, however, both fell into the same produce, it is considered as dimua according to the size of the smaller of the two.

Similarly, if a person other than a priest ate both of them, he should make restitution for the smaller one and its additional fifth. What should he do with the two [portions separated]? He should give them to one priest and take the value of the greater portion from him.

24 [The following rules apply when a person] checks a barrel [of wine] and then leaves it to separate terumah [from it] on other [wine] until it becomes terumah in its entirety, [at which point,] he would give it to the priest. After a certain time, he checked the barrel again and discovered that it had become vinegar. [We rule that the wine] certainly remained wine for three days after the inspection. [The obligations for terumah] have certainly been met for all of the wine for which he considered the wine in the barrel as its terumah during those [three days]. From that time afterwards, there is a doubt [whether the wine had already turned to vinegar] and a second separation [of terumah] must be made.

25 At three times [during the year], it is necessary to check the wine that one set aside to separate terumah from lest it have become vinegar. They are: When the east wind blows after the Sukkos holiday, when grapes form, when fluid begins to enter the unripened grapes. [When one has wine] from the vat, he may use it for the separation [of terumah] for 40 days with the presumption that it is still wine.

26 [The following rules apply when a person] sets aside produce to separate terumah from until [the entire amount] becomes terumah. Although as an initial preference, one should separate terumah only from the same collection of produce, if one separates terumah [in such a manner], we operate under the presumption that the produce continues to exist. If he discovers that they perished, he should entertain doubts that all [the produce for which he thought he separated terumah is in fact tevel]. For perhaps, he did not make any separation until [the produce set aside] perished. Therefore he should separate terumah a second time for them.

1 The great terumah and terumat ma'aser may be eaten by priests, both adults and minors, both males and females and their Canaanite servants, and their livestock, as [Leviticus 22:11] states: "When a priest will purchase a man, he is a financial acquisition...."
When the servant of a priest flees or the wife of a priest rebels against him, they may still partake of terumah.

2 Terumah required by Scriptural Law may only be eaten by a priest whose lineage [has been affirmed]. Priests whose status is accepted on the basis of a prevailing assumption may partake only of terumah required by Rabbinic decree.
Terumah that is ritually pure, whether the great terumah or terumat ma'aser, whether required by Scriptural or Rabbinic Law is given only to a priest who is a Torah scholar because it is forbidden to partake of terumah that is ritually impure. All of the unlearned people are presumed to be ritually impure. For these reasons, one may give impure terumah to any priest one chooses.

3 When an Israelite woman marries a priest, even a minor three years and one day old, she may partake of terumah and the breast and thigh [given the priests from the peace sacrifices].
According to Scriptural Law, she may partake of these foods from the time that she was consecrated. Our Sages, however, forbade her from partaking of them until she enters the chupah. [This is a] decree, [instituted] lest she give her father and brother terumah to eat while she is a consecrated woman in her father's home.

4 A deaf-mute and a mentally or emotionally unstable woman who is married to a priest may not partake of terumah. [This restriction applies] even if her father concluded her marriage. [This is] decree, [instituted] lest a priest who is himself a deaf-mute marry a woman who is a deaf-mute and give her [terumah] to eat. For this reason, our Sages decreed that a deaf-mute who is the daughter of an Israelite should not partake of terumah at all.

5 A non-priest is forbidden to partake of terumah, as [Leviticus 22:10] states: "All non-priests shall not partake of the consecrated food." [This prohibition applies] even to a resident [worker] of the priest or his hired [worker], as [ibid.] states: "A resident [worker] of the priest or his hired [worker] shall not partake of the consecrated food." [The term] "resident [worker]" refers to one hired forever. [The term] "hired [worker]" refers to one hired for years. A Hebrew servant is comparable to a resident [worker] or a hired [worker].

A woman of priestly lineage who is married to a non-priest is considered as a non-priest, as [implied by the wording] "all non-priests" - i.e., neither he nor his wife.

6 A non-priest who willfully partook of terumah - regardless of whether he was ritually pure or impure and regardless of whether [the terumah] was ritually pure or impure - is liable for death at the hand of heaven, as [ibid.:

9] states: "They shall die because of it, for they have defiled it." He is liable for lashes, but does not make financial restitution for what he consumed, because [a transgressor] is never subjected to both lashes and a financial penalty. If he partook [of terumah] inadvertently, [he must make restitution and] add a fifth, as [ibid.:14] states: "When a person eats sanctified food inadvertently, he should add a fifth."

7 [Leviticus 22:12] states: "When the daughter of a priest will marry a non-priest, she should not partake of the sanctified terumah." There are two concepts included in this prohibition:

a) that if a woman engages in sexual relations with a man prohibited to her and thus become a zonah or a chalalah, as we explained in Hilchot Issurei Bi'ah, is forbidden to partake of the terumot forever, as is the law with regard to any challal. For a challal is considered as a non-priest with regard to all matters; and

b) that if she marries an Israelite, she is forbidden to partake of the portions of the sacrifices given the priests, the breast and the thigh forever, even if she is divorced or widowed.

8 She may, however, partake of terumah after [her husband] the Israelite divorces her or dies provided he did not leave any children that she bore, as [ibid.:13] states: "When the daughter of a priest will become a widow or a divorcee and she has no descendants, she shall return to her father's home as in her youth. She may partake of the bread of her father."

9 According to the Oral Tradition, [that verse was interpreted] "from the bread," but not all the bread. She returns to partake of terumah, but not the breast and the thigh.

10 [This concept applies] not only to the daughter of a priest, but to the daughter of a Levite or an Israelite. If she engage in relations with a man forbidden to her, since she became a zonah, she is forbidden to partake of terumah forever, even if she has a descendant born to her from a priest.

11 For this reason, a woman who was taken captive may not partake of terumah even though she says that she was not defiled. Whenever the word of a captive woman who says that she was not defiled is accepted or there is a witness [who testifies to this effect] and she is permitted to her husband, she is permitted to partake of terumah. When a woman engaged in sexual relations with an animal, she is not disqualified from the priesthood and may partake of terumah.

12 A daughter of an Israelite who has an offspring [she bore] from a priest may partake of terumah by virtue of her child. [This applies] whether the child is male or female or even a tumtum or an androgynus. Even the offspring of offspring until the end of time [enable her to partake of terumah], as [indicated by the prooftext]: "She has no descendants."

13 Just as the descendants from an Israelite [born] to the daughter of a priest disqualify her [from partaking of terumah], so too, the descendants from a priest [born] to the daughter of an Israelite entitle her [to partake of terumah]. [This applies] even if the descendants are of blemished lineage.
What is implied? A daughter of an Israelite married a priest or the daughter of a priest married an Israelite and [that woman] gave birth to a daughter. A person who is an ervah for the daughter entered into relations with her or [the daughter] married a mamzer [and the daughter gave birth to a baby which is a mamzer]. [Afterwards,] the daughter dies, but the mamzer remains alive.

14 If [the mamzer's] grandmother was the daughter of an Israelite who [married] a priest, she may partake of terumah. If she was the daughter of a priest who [married] an Israelite, she may not partake of terumah. Thus we learn that [the daughter of an Israelite] may partake of terumah by virtue of her descendants even though the lineage of that descendant is blemished, even though [the descendant] is not even [on the level of an ordinary] Israelite. Needless to say that if a woman [who married a priest] has a daughter born to her by him - even if the daughter is married to an Israelite and even if she became a challalah - she may partake of terumah by virtue of the daughter of blemished lineage.

15 Similarly, the daughter of a priest may not eat by virtue of her descendant from an Israelite husband, even if that descendant is a priest.
What is implied? A daughter of a priest married an Israelite and gave birth to a daughter that he conceived. That daughter married a priest and gave birth to a son that he conceived. [This son] is fitting to become a High Priest. He enables his mother to partake of terumah and disqualifies his maternal grandmother [from doing so]. [This applies] even if [the priest's] mother dies. [The grandmother] can say: "[One should] not be like my grandson, the High Priest, who disqualifies me from partaking of

16 The descendants of a servant do not disqualify [a woman from partaking of terumah], nor do they enable [a woman to do so].
What is implied? The daughter of a priest married an Israelite or the daughter of an Israelite married a priest. A son was born to that woman. The son [then] went and became attached to a Canaanite maid-servant and conceived [a son] with her. [That son is] a servant. [The following rules apply if the woman's son] dies and the servant remains alive: If the servant's paternal grandmother was the daughter of an Israelite who had married to a priest, she may not partake of terumah. If she was the daughter of a priest who had married an Israelite, she may partake [of terumah], because this offspring is not considered as a descendant, because the concept of parental lineage does not apply with regard to servants.

17 [The above concepts are also relevant in the following instance.] The daughter of an Israelite married a priest and he died. She had borne a son to him. Afterwards, she married an Israelite. [Hence,] she may not partake of terumah. If her Israelite [husband] died, but she bore him a son, she may not partake of terumah because of that son. If that son dies, she may partake of terumah by virtue of her first son.

18 [Similar concepts apply when] the daughter of a priest marries an Israelite. [If] she bore him a son and then married a priest, she may partake of terumah. If [her second husband] dies, but she had borne him a son, she may partake of terumah. If her son conceived by the priest dies, she is forbidden to partake of terumah because of her son conceived by [her first husband,] the Israelite. If her son conceived by the Israelite dies, she returns to her father's home as in her youth. She may partake of terumah, but not of the breast and thigh [of the peace offerings].

19 [Similar laws apply when] a daughter of an Israelite marries an Israelite first and has a son that she bore to him. If she marries a priest [after her first husband dies], she may partake of terumah. If [her second husband, the priest,] dies, but she bore him a son, she may partake [of terumah] by virtue of the son [she bore him]. For he enables her to partake of terumah as his father did.

1 A priest who is ritually impure is forbidden to partake of terumah whether it is ritually pure or ritually impure, as [Leviticus 22:4] states: "Any person from the seed of Aaron who is afflicted with tzaraat or is a zav may not partake of consecrated food." Which consecrated food may be eaten by all the descendants of Aaron, both male and female? We must say: terumah.

[Thus] any impure person who eats terumah that is ritually pure is liable for death at the hand of heaven. Therefore he is given lashes, as [ibid.:9] states: "And you shall protect My charge and not bear sin because of it [and die because of it]."

When an impure person partakes of terumah that is ritually impure, he does not receive lashes, although he transgresses a negative commandment, for [impure terumah] is not holy.

2 Impure [priests who have immersed to purify themselves] may not partake of terumah until the sun sets and three stars appear afterwards [on the day the impure person immerses himself], as [implied by ibid.:7]: "And the sun will set and he will become pure" - until the sky will become pure of the light - "afterwards he may partake of the consecrated foods."

3 A priest who is ritually pure who ate terumah that is ritually impure is not liable for lashes, because [the prohibition is the result of] a positive commandment. For the verse states: "Afterwards he may partake of the consecrated foods." [Implied is that,] after he becomes purified, he may partake of food that is in a state of holiness. Food which is impure, by contrast, he should not eat, even though he becomes purified. A prohibition that stems from a positive commandment has the status of a positive commandment.

4 When [a priest] was partaking of terumah and he feels his limbs shudder to ejaculate. He should hold his member and swallow the terumah.

5 We may immerse a deaf-mute or intellectually or emotionally unstable [priest] and feed him terumah after nightfall on that day. We guard them to make sure that they do not sleep after immersing themselves, because if they sleep, they are [considered] impure for perhaps they had a seminal emission unless a copper container is made for them.

6 Camel-riders are forbidden to partake of terumah until they immerse themselves and [wait] until nightfall, because we presume that they are ritually impure. [The rationale is that] the physical stimulation produced by riding on the flesh of a camel produces a drop of semen.

7 When a woman engages in intimacy, she may immerse herself and partake of terumah in the evening, provided she did not turn over during intimacy. If she turned over during intimacy she is forbidden to partake of terumah for a duration of three days. For it is impossible that she will not discharge [semen] and become impure, as will be explained in the appropriate place.

8 Since the primary obligation of terumah [separated] in the Diaspora is Rabbinic in origin, it is forbidden only to a priest who becomes ritually impure because of a discharge from his body: i.e., men who had a seminal emission, zavim, zavot, niddot, and women who give birth. All of these individuals may partake [of terumah] after they immersed even if they did not [wait] until nightfall. Those who, by contrast, became impure because of contact with a source of ritual impurity - whether contact with a human corpse, a form of impurity which is impossible to purge in the present age or contact with [the corpse of] a crawling animal - need not immerse themselves [to partake of] terumah separated in the Diaspora.

9 For this reason, a male priest who is a minor who has not yet had a seminal emission or a female of the priestly family who has never experienced menstrual bleeding may partake of [terumah from the Diaspora] at all times without undergoing an inspection, for the presumption that they did not have a discharge that would render them ritually impure applies to them.

A metzora is considered as one who had a discharge that renders him impure, provided he is declared impure by a priest whose lineage is established.

10 A priest who is uncircumcised is forbidden to partake of terumah according to Scriptural Law. [This concept is derived as follows: Leviticus 22:10] speaks of a resident worker and a hired worker with regard to [partaking of] terumah and [Exodus 12:45] speaks of a resident worker and a hired worker with regard to [partaking of] the Paschal sacrifice. Just as with regard to the Paschal sacrifice, the resident worker and the hired worker spoken about refer to those who are uncircumcised and who are forbidden [to partake of] it, so too, with regard to terumah, we learn that a resident worker and a hired worker who are uncircumcised are forbidden [to partake of] it. If such a person partakes [of terumah], he is liable for lashes according to Scriptural Law.

A person who extends his foreskin is permitted to partake of terumah even though he appears uncircumcised. According to Rabbinic Law, however, he must be circumcised again until he appears circumcised.

11 One who is born circumcised may partake of terumah. A tumtum may not partake of terumah for there is a doubt whether he is uncircumcised. An androgynus should be circumcised and then he may partake of terumah.

12 Although an uncircumcised priest and all those who are impure are forbidden to partake of terumah, their wives and their servants may partake [of it].

13 [The following laws apply to a priest] who has maimed testicles or a severed member. They and their servants may partake of terumah. Their wives may not partake of terumah. If [such a priest] was not intimate with his wife after suffering these wounds, [his wife] may partake of terumah. Similarly, if he married the descendent of converts, she may partake of terumah.

14 When a priest with maimed testicles consecrates the daughter of a priest, she may not partake of terumah. [When a priest is] a eunuch who was brought to this state through natural means, he, his wife, and his servants may partake of terumah. [When a priest is] a tumtum or an androgynus, their servants may partake of terumah, but not their wives.

15 When a [priest who was] a deaf-mute, a mentally or emotionally unstable person, or a minor purchased servants, they may not partake of terumah. If, however, the local court or their guardian purchases servants for them or they acquire them by inheritance, [the servants] may partake of terumah.

16 When an androgynus [of the priestly family] engages in intimacy - whether through anal intercourse or vaginal intercourse - with a person who is disqualified from partaking of terumah, he is disqualified from partaking of terumah as a woman would be. His servants also may not partake of terumah.

Similarly, if he engages in intimacy with another adrogynus with whom relations would disqualify a woman from partaking of terumah, he is disqualified. Neither he nor his servants may partake of terumah. [The latter law] applies when he engages in intimacy through vaginal intercourse. If, however, he is intimate through anal intercourse, [the above does not apply], because a male does not disqualify another male from priestly [privileges].

17 When a servant belongs to partners and one of them is a priest that does not entitle others to partake of terumah, this servant is forbidden to partake [of terumah]. Whenever [the ownership of a servant] entitles him to partake of terumah, it also entitles him to partake of the breast and the thigh [of the peace sacrifices].

18 When a daughter of an Israelite marries a priest and brings servants [to his domain] - regardless of whether they are classified as nichsei milog or nichsei tzon barzel - they may partake [of terumah]. Similarly, when the servants of priests purchase servants or the servants of a priest's wife purchase servants, they may partake of terumah, as [intimated by Leviticus 22:11]: "[When a priest] will purchase a soul, the acquisition of his money, [he shall partake of it]." Implied is even an acquisition of an acquisition. An acquisition of [a priest] who is permitted to partake of terumah may entitle others to partake [of terumah]. An acquisition who does not partake of terumah may not entitle others to partake [of terumah].

19 When the daughter of a priest marries an Israelite and brings servants [to his domain] - regardless of whether they are classified as nichsei milog or nichsei tzon barzel - they may not partake [of terumah].

20 [The following laws apply when] a widow marries a High Priest or a divorcee or a woman who underwent chalitzah - whether the daughter of a priest or an Israelite - marries an ordinary priest or [a priest] marries another one of the women with whom marriage is prohibited [by Scriptural Law]. If she brings servants [to his domain] which are classified as nichsei milog or nichsei tzon barzel [to his domain], those classified as nichsei milog may not partake [of terumah], even though he is required to provide for their sustenance. Those classified as nichsei tzon barzel may partake of terumah, for they are the husband's property. If [a priest] married a shniyah, she may partake [of terumah], but her servants who are nichsei milog may not partake [of terumah].

21 When the daughter of a priest who is a widow is consecrated by a High Priest or one who is divorced is consecrated by an ordinary priest, they may not partake of terumah, because they are designated for intimate relations that are forbidden according to Scriptural Law. Similarly, if they enter the chupah without being consecrated, they may not partake [of terumah]. For [entering into] the chupah disqualifies them.

If such a woman is widowed or divorced after consecration [but before marriage], she returns to suitability and may partake of terumah. If, however, she had married, she may not partake of terumah, because she already became a chalalah.

22 When the husband of the daughter of a priest who is himself a priest dies and she falls before yevamim, one of which is a challal, she may not partake of terumah because of her connection to the challal. [This applies] even if one of the acceptable [brothers] issued a mamar to her, for a maamar does not constitute a complete acquisition of a yevamah.

23 [Although a yavam who is] a priest gives a bill of divorce to his yevamah, [despite the fact that] she becomes forbidden to him, she still remains connected to him. Hence, she is entitled to partake of terumah. [She is not disqualified,] because she is designated for relations that are forbidden [only] by Rabbinic decree, since a bill of divorce disqualifies a yevamah only according to Rabbinic decree.
Similarly, the daughter of a priest who underwent the rite of chalitzah or is a shniyah who became consecrated to a priest may partake of terumah. [Also,] when an ordinary priest marries an ailonot, she may partake of terumah.

1 A fetus, a yavam, consecration, a deaf-mute, and a child of nine years old disqualify [a woman] from partaking of terumah, but do not entitle her to partake [of it].

2 What is meant [by the above statement] with regard to a fetus? A daughter of an Israelite who was impregnated by a priest is not entitled to partake of terumah by virtue of the fetus. When the daughter of a priest, by contrast, was impregnated by an Israelite, she is prohibited against partaking of terumah because of the fetus. [This is derived from Leviticus 22:13:] "And she shall return to her father's home as in her maidenhood." This excludes a pregnant woman.

3 When an Israelite has relations with a daughter of a priest, we do not suspect that she became pregnant. Instead, she may immerse herself [in the mikveh] and partake [of terumah] in the evening. If she was married to an Israelite and her husband died, she may immerse herself and partake of terumah in the evening [and continue doing so] for 40 days. If her fetus is recognized [afterwards], retroactively, her [actions] are objectionable from the fortieth day onward. For, throughout the forty days, the embryo is not considered as a fetus, merely as water.

4 When a daughter of an Israelite was married to a priest and he died, leaving her pregnant, her servants should not partake of terumah because of the fetus. For only a child that was born entitles others to partake [of terumah]. One which is not born does not entitle others to partake [of terumah]. Therefore if the fetus was a challal [and the woman had other acceptable children, the fetus] does not disqualify the servants from partaking of terumah. Instead, they may partake of it by virtue of his brothers who are acceptable priests until this challal is born, at which point, the servants become forbidden to partake [of terumah].

5 What is meant [by the initial statement] with regard to a yavam? When a daughter of an Israelite is under the obligation to perform yibbum with a priest, she may not partake of terumah, for [ibid.:11] states: "When a priest will purchase a soul" and this [yavam] has not acquired [the woman] yet.

When the daughter of a priest is under the obligation to perform yibbum with an Israelite, she is forbidden [to partake of terumah] because of her yavam, as [implied by the verse:] "And she shall return to her father's home as in her maidenhood." This excludes a woman under obligation to perform yibbum.

6 When a yavam who is a priest engages in relations with his yevamah by force or without intent or he merely uncovers her and does not complete the act of intercourse, he acquires [his yevamah], as stated in Hilchot Yibbum. Nevertheless, he does not entitle her to partake of terumah until he completes the act of intercourse with her consent.

When does the above apply? When [the yevamah] was widowed after consecration [alone]. If, however, she had been married, since she had been partaking of terumah previously, she is entitled to partake of it by virtue of [the inferior] acts of intimacy mentioned above.

7 What is meant [by the initial statement] with regard to a consecration? When a daughter of a priest is consecrated by an Israelite, she is forbidden to partake [of terumah], for he has already acquired her. When the daughter of an Israelite has been consecrated by a priest, she may not partake [of terumah] until she enters the chupah, lest she give terumah to the members of her father's household, as we explained.

8 When an Israelite tells the daughter of a priest: "Behold, you are consecrated to me after 30 days," she may partake [of terumah] for these 30 days, for the consecration has not taken effect yet. If, however, he told her: "You are consecrated to me from the present and after 30 days," she is forbidden to partake [of terumah] immediately. Similar laws apply with regard to other conditional agreements of this type.

9 What is meant [by the initial statement] with regard to a deaf-mute? When a daughter of a priest is married to an Israelite who is a deaf-mute, she may not partake [of terumah], since he acquires her by virtue of the ordinance of our Sages who instituted marriage for him. When a daughter of an Israelite marries a priest who is a deaf-mute, she may not partake [of terumah], because he does not acquire [her] according to Scriptural Law, because he is not of [adequate] intellectual capacity.

10 [When a woman] was consecrated by a priest of ordinary mental capacity, but he did not marry her until he became a deaf-mute, she may not partake [of terumah]. [In the above situation, if after consecrating a woman, a priest] died and she fell before a yavam who is a deaf-mute, she may not partake [of terumah]. If, however, he married her when he was of ordinary mental capacity and then became a deaf-mute, she may [continue] to partake [of terumah]. If he died and she fell before a yavam who is a deaf-mute and he performs yibbum with her, she may [also continue to] partake [of terumah]. [The rationale for the leniency is] that she was partaking of terumah beforehand.

When the wife of [a priest who is] a deaf-mute bears him a child, she may partake [of terumah] by virtue of her child.

11 What is meant [by the initial statement] with regard to a child of nine years old? [When a daughter of a priest] engaged in relations with a child of nine years old who is forbidden to her, since sexual relations in which he engages are significant, she is disqualified from the priesthood and forbidden to partake of terumah, because she becomes a zonah or a chalalah, as we explained. [This applies] even if [the child] is sexually impotent.

When a daughter of an Israelite marries a priest who is nine years old, even though the relations in which he engages are significant, she is not entitled to partake of terumah because of [this] child, because he cannot acquire her [as his wife] until he reaches majority.

If there is a doubt whether [a child forbidden to a daughter of a priest] is nine years old or not, she is forbidden to partake [of terumah]. [This same ruling applies] if she married a boy thirteen years old and there was a question whether he manifested physical signs of maturity or not.

12 All of the relationships [mentioned above] that do not entitle a woman to partake of terumah prescribed by Scriptural Law also do not entitle her to partake of terumah prescribed by Rabbinic Law. [This is] a decree lest they have them partake of terumah prescribed by Scriptural Law.

13 The [following] individuals neither disqualify [the daughter of a priest from partaking of terumah] or enable [the daughter of an Israelite] to partake of it:a rapist, a seducer, or a mentally or emotionally unstable person. [This applies] provided she is not forbidden to them, in which instance, they disqualify her through relations, because she becomes a zonah or a chalalah, as we explained.

14 When a woman married a priest who was intellectually or emotionally unstable or a priest raped her or seduced her and she bore him a child, she may partake of terumah because of her son. There is a doubt concerning the matter, for since she was not consecrated to him, it is possible that she was impregnated by another person. Nevertheless, we operate under the presumption that the child was conceived by [the priest] who engaged in relations with her. [This applies] provided rumors did not circulate concerning her with another person. Instead, everyone gossips about her and this priest.

Similar concepts apply when an Israelite who is intellectually or emotionally unstable engages in relations with the daughter of a priest or [an Israelite] raped or seduced her and she became pregnant. She may not partake of terumah because of the fetus. If the fetus is aborted, she may partake [of terumah].

15 When witnesses concerning a [sotah] warning and witnesses concerning [a sotah] meeting testify against a woman married [to a priest], she is forbidden to partake of terumah until she drinks the bitter water, because there is a question whether she is a zonah. If her husband dies before she drinks the water or she is one of the women who are absolved from drinking and do not receive the money due them by virtue of their ketubah, she is forbidden to partake of terumah forever. Whenever the wife of a priest says: "I have been unfaithful," she is forbidden to partake of terumah.

16 When a daughter of an Israelite who has not attained majority marries a priest without her father's consent, whether in his presence or in his absence, she may not partake of terumah even though her father consecrated her. [The rationale is that] her father might object and then she would retroactively be unfit [to partake of terumah]. [The reason] he remains silent even though he sees is because he is angry because she married without his consent.

1 A woman may partake of terumah until her bill of divorce reaches her hand or the hand of her agent whom she appointed to receive it.
Whenever there is a doubt whether or not a woman was divorced, she may not partake of terumah. When a woman appoints an agent to receive her bill of divorce, she is forbidden to partake of terumah immediately. If she said: "Receive the bill of divorce for me in this-and-this place," she is not forbidden [to partake of terumah] until the agent reaches that place.
If she sent an agent to bring her the bill of divorce, she may partake of terumah until the bill of divorce reaches her hand. When a person tells his wife: "This is your bill of divorce; [it is effective] one hour before my death" she is forbidden to partake of terumah immediately.

2 [The inhabitants of] a city under siege, [the voyagers on] a ship in danger of sinking at sea, and a suspect to be judged [for a crime worthy of capital punishment] are presumed to be alive. Needless to say, this applies to one who goes on a caravan journey.

[In the following instances,] however: a city was captured by besieging forces, a ship was lost at sea, or a person was going out to be executed by a gentile court, a person dragged by a wild beast, one upon whom a landslide fell, or one carried away by a river, we regard the individuals with the stringencies appropriate to both the living and the dead. Therefore if among the women were the daughter of a priest married to an Israelite or the daughter of an Israelite married to a priest, they may not partake [of terumah].

If, however, a person was sentenced to death in a [Jewish] court and was taken to the place where he will be stoned, we presume that he is dead and his wife may not partake [of terumah].

3 If a woman left her husband while he was in his death throes in another country, she may not partake of terumah, whether she is the daughter of a priest married to an Israelite or the daughter of an Israelite married to a priest. [The rationale is that] most people in their death throes die.

If one witness testifies that [a woman's husband] has died and one testifies that he has not died, she may not partake [of terumah].

4 [When a man is married to two wives and] one of the wives tells the other that their husband died, since [the other wife] cannot marry by virtue of this testimony, she may continue to partake of terumah on the presumption that her husband is alive until a person upon whose testimony is sufficient to enable her to marry testifies concerning her. [The same ruling applies] if such testimony is given by any of the five women whose testimony is not accepted if they say that her husband died.

5 When [a priest] frees his servant, from the time he transfers his bill of emancipation to him, he disqualifies him from partaking of terumah. Whenever a servant is given his freedom, but his bill of emancipation is withheld as will be explained in Hilchot Avadim, he is, nonetheless, forbidden to partake of terumah.

6 There is a doubt [whether the transfer of the ownership of a servant is effective in the following situation]. A person composed a legal document transferring his property - which included servants - to another person. He [did not give the document to that person directly, but instead] gave it to another person on his behalf. The recipient [of the present] remained silent and afterwards, protested. There is a doubt whether his protests reflected his initial disposition and thus [the servants] have never left the initial domain or whether his protest after his initial silence is [interpreted as] a renunciation of his initial position. Therefore, [the servants] may not partake of terumah. [This applies] whether the second master was an Israelite and the first master, a priest or the first master was an Israelite and the second, a priest.

7 When an Israelite rents livestock from a priest, he may feed it terumah. When a priest rents livestock from an Israelite, although he is obligated to provide it with food, he may not feed it terumah, because it is not his financial acquisition.

8 When an Israelite receives a cow from a priest for the sake of fattening it and has it evaluated so that its increase in value will be split, he may not feed it terumah even though the priest has a share in its increase in value. If, by contrast, a priest receives a cow from an Israelite for the sake of fattening it and has it evaluated, he may feed it terumah. [The rationale is that] although the Israelite has a share in its increase in value, its body belongs to the priest, because he has [accepted responsibility] for its value.

9 When a cow belonging to an Israelite gives birth to its firstborn, the owner may feed it terumah, for the firstborn belongs to the priests. A person may store vetch that is terumah in his dovecote. He need not worry that his doves will come and eat it.

10 It appears to me that if a priest sold his cow to an Israelite and took payment, he can no longer feed it terumah even though the purchaser has not drawn it into his domain as of yet. [The rationale is that] according to Scriptural Law, the transfer of money completes a transaction, as will be explained in Hilchot Mekach UMemcar. [Conversely,] if an Israelite sold a cow to a priest, he should not feed it terumah until he draws it into his domain even though he already made payment.

1 When a non-priests partakes of terumah unknowingly, he must make restitution for the principal and add a fifth. Even if he knows that it is terumah and that he is warned against partaking of it, but he does not know whether or not he is liable for death, he is considered to have acted unknowingly and he must make restitution for the principal and add a fifth.

2 A person who eats an article [that is terumah] that is ordinarily eaten, drinks something that is ordinarily drunk, or smears himself with something ordinarily used for that purpose [is liable], as [derived from Leviticus 22:15]: "And they shall not defile the sacraments of the children of Israel." This includes one who smears himself.

Whether one partakes of terumah which is ritually pure or ritually impure unknowingly, one must make restitution for the principal and add a fifth. He is not liable for a fifth until he eats an olive-sized portion, as [indicated by ibid.:14]: "When one will eat a sacrament unknowingly"; eating implies consuming no less than an olive-sized portion. Just as one is liable for eating an olive-sized portion, so too, [one is liable for] drinking an olive-sized portion.

3 [The following laws apply if a person] ate terumah and then ate again, drank and then drank again. If there is sufficient time to eat a half a loaf of bread from the time he began to eat until he concluded or sufficient time to drink a revi'it from the time he began to drink until he concluded, [all he consumes] is combined to comprise an olive-sized portion.

4 Terumah, terumat ma'aser, whether the latter is from d'mai or from produce from which the tithes were definitely [not separated], challah, and the first fruits can all be combined together to comprise an olive-sized portion for which one is liable for death or [restitution, plus] a fifth, for they are all called terumah [at different times in the Torah].

According to law, one should not be liable for a fifth for [the unknowing consumption of] terumat ma'aser that is d'mai, just as one is not liable for the second tithe [from d'mai], as will be explained. Nevertheless, our Sages said: If one is not liable for a fifth, people will treat it with disdain.

5 When a person partook terumah intentionally [after] receiving a warning, he is liable for lashes and is not required to make financial restitution. If he did not receive warning, [he is required to make financial restitution]. If [the terumah] was ritually pure, he is required to make restitution for the principal, but is not required to add a fifth. If [the terumah] was ritually impure, he is required to pay only as if it were wood, because it is fit only to use as fuel. Accordingly, if one ate berries or pomegranates or the like that were terumah that became impure, he is not obligated to make restitution, because these are not fit to be used as fuel.

6 When a person eats terumah that is chametz on Pesach, whether willfully or unknowingly, whether it is ritually impure or pure, he is exempt from financial liability. Even if he separated terumah from matzah, but it became chametz [before he ate it], he is exempt. He is not even required to pay as if it were wood, because it is not fit for use as fuel. [Instead,] since it is forbidden to benefit from it, it is of no value whatsoever.

7 If, however, one unknowingly ate terumah on Yom Kippur, ate terumah that was perforated, drank wine that was terumah that was left open, smeared himself with wine and oil [that were terumah] at the same time, or drank oil and vinegar [that were terumah] at the same time, chewed raw kernels of wheat, or swallowed vinegar, he is liable to make restitution for the principal and add a fifth.

8 When a person is satisfied and is disgusted by his food, but continues eating terumah despite the fact that he is satisfied, he is not required to add a fifth [when making restitution, for the prooftext cited above] states: "When one will eat...." [Implied is that he is when he eats in an ordinary manner] and not when he harms himself. Similarly, when one chews raw kernels of barley, he is not liable, because he harms himself.

9 When a non-priest swallowed prunes of terumah [whole unknowingly] and then regurgitated them, and another person came and also ate them unknowingly, the first person is required to make restitution for the principal and add a fifth and the second person is obligated to pay the first one as if the prunes were wood.

10 When one feeds terumah to workers or to guests, they are required to make restitution for the principal and add a fifth, for they acted unknowingly. He must pay them for their meal, for ordinary produce is more valuable than the terumah, since a person's soul is repelled from forbidden food.

11 When [a non-priest] feeds terumah to his children who were below majority or to his servants whether they are above or below majority, he must pay the principal, but not the additional fifth. [This ruling also applies to] one who partakes of terumah from the Diaspora, one who eats or drinks less than an olive-sized portion, a nazarite who unknowingly drank wine that was terumah, one drinks oil [without it being mixed with other liquids] and one who smears himself with wine.

12 When the daughter of a priest who was married to an Israelite or disqualified [from partaking of terumah for other reasons] partook of terumah, she must make restitution for the principal, but she is not required to add a fifth.

When a woman was partaking of terumah and she was told: "Your husband died," or "...divorced you," she is required to pay only the principal. If the terumah was chametz on the day preceding Pesach, she is exempt from making restitution. [The rationale is that then] the time is pressing and she hurried to eat without investigating.

[These same laws apply] when a servant was partaking [of terumah] and he was told: "Your master died and left an heir who does not entitle you to eat," "...sold you to an Israelite," "...gave you to him as a present," or "...freed you," and when a priest was partaking [of terumah] and he discovered that he is the son of a divorcee or a woman who underwent chalitzah. In all of these instances, if these individuals had terumah in their mouths when they discovered that they were forbidden to partake of it, they should spit it out.

13 [Similarly, when a priest] was partaking [of terumah] and he was told: "You became impure," "The terumah became impure," "You were impure," or "the terumah was impure," he should spit it out. [The same ruling applies] if he discovered that [the terumah] was tevel, the first tithe from which terumat ma'aser had not been separated, or ma'aser sheni or consecrated property that was not redeemed, or [when partaking of the terumah,] he tasted a bug.

14 When there are two containers, one of terumah and one of ordinary produce, and terumah fell into one of them, but it is not known which one, we operate under the supposition that it fell into the one which [contained] terumah.

If it is not known which one is terumah and a non-priest partakes of one of them, he is not liable for payment. [The rationale is that when a person seeks] to expropriate money from a colleague, the burden of proof is on him. He must treat the other one as if it were terumah. If another person partakes of the other one, however, he is also exempt. If, however, one person eats them both, he must make restitution for the smaller one. If he did so intentionally, he is required to make restitution for the principal. If he did so unknowingly, he is required to make restitution for the principal, plus a fifth.

15 When a person eats the additional fifth unknowingly, he must [make restitution for it and] add another fifth. For the fifth is considered as the principal with regard to all matters. Similarly, he continues to add a fifth for every fifth forever.

Whenever a person makes restitution for the principal and the additional fifth, [the grain] he gives is terumah with regard to all matters [with one exception]. If they were sown, the grain that grows is ordinary produce. If the priest wishes to forgo [the payment], he cannot. Whenever, [by contrast,] a person makes restitution only for the principal, [the grain] he gives is ordinary grain and if the priest desires to forgo payment, he may.

16 [The following laws apply if] a daughter of an Israelite partakes of terumah and then marries a priest. If [she partook] of terumah that had not been acquired by a priest, she may make restitution of the principal and the additional fifth to herself. If she partook of terumah that a priest had acquired, she is required to make restitution of the principal to its owner, but she may keep the additional fifth as her own. For whenever a person makes restitution and pays an additional fifth, he may give the additional fifth to whichever priest he desires.

17 If she was not able to make restitution before she was divorced, she can no longer make restitution to herself and she is like a person who never married a priest at all.

18 Whenever a person partakes of terumah whether unknowingly or intentionally, he may make restitution only from ordinary produce from which the terumot and the tithes have been separated. Restitution may be made from leket, shichichah, pe'ah, ownerless grain, and grain from the first tithe after terumat ma'aser was separated i.e., even if the great terumah from that crop had not been separated, for the person separated the tithes before the terumah.

One may make restitution from the second tithes and consecrated property that were redeemed, even though they were not redeemed in an appropriate manner. And one may make restitution using new grain for old grain. One may not, however, make restitution from one type [of grain] for another type [of grain]. [This is derived from Leviticus 22:14:] "And he shall give the priest the sanctified [food]." [Implied is that it must be the same] as the sanctified food he ate.

19 When a person eats zucchini from the sixth year, he should wait until [he acquires] the zucchini of the eighth year to make restitution from them. For he cannot pay his debt from the crops of the seventh year, as will be explained in that place.

20 When a person ate terumah that was ritually impure, he makes restitution from ordinary produce, whether pure or impure. If he partook of terumah that was ritually pure, he should make restitution with ordinary grain that is pure. If he made restitution from ordinary grain that was impure whether intentionally or unknowingly, the restitution he made is accepted, but he must make restitution again from ritually pure grain.

21 When a person partook of terumah belonging to a chaver, he should make restitution to him. If he partook of terumah belonging to a common person, he should make restitution to a chaver, and take its worth from him and give it to the common person whose terumah he ate. For we do not give articles that require ritually purity to a common person.

22 When [an Israelite] stole terumah from his maternal grandfather who was a priest and consumed it [unknowingly], and afterwards, his maternal grandfather died, he may not make restitution to himself, but rather to another heir from [the priestly] tribe. Similarly, if he inherited terumah from his maternal grandfather and partook of it, a creditor collected terumah [as payment] for a debt and he partook of it or a woman [received it as part of the money due her by virtue of] her ketubah and she partook of it, they must make restitution for the principal and the additional fifth to a priest who is a chaver and that chaver gives them the monetary equivalent of the terumah at the time they partook of it.

23 When a person steals terumah but does not consume it, he should pay twice its worth to the owners. He may make this payment according to the worth of terumah. If he stole it and ate it, he must pay twice the principal and a fifth of the principal: i.e., the principal and an additional fifth from ordinary grain, and the principal according to the worth of terumah.

24 When a person steals terumah that is consecrated to the Temple treasury and eats it, he is not required to pay a double amount, for a double amount is not paid to the Temple treasury, as explained in the appropriate place. He must, however, make restitution for the principal and add two fifths, one fifth [to atone] for partaking of terumah and one fifth [to atone] for benefiting from consecrated property.

To whom does he make restitution? If [the terumah] was the size of an olive and it was not worth a p'rutah, he should make restitution to the priests. If it is worth a p'rutah - whether or not it is the size of an olive - he should pay the Temple treasury.

25 Why does the prohibition against benefiting from consecrated property fall [on this grain when it is already forbidden because of] the prohibition against terumah? Because the terumah was forbidden to a non-priest and permitted to a priest. Once he consecrated it, it became forbidden to a priest. Therefore a prohibition was added to it even for an Israelite in the manner explained in the laws of forbidden relationships and forbidden foods.

26 When a person obtains terumah by robbery, he must make restitution for the principal and add one fifth. [The rationale is that] the fifth that he is liable for [to atone for partaking of] terumah fulfills his obligation for robbery, as [implied by Leviticus 22:14:] "And you shall give the priest the sacred [food]." He is liable only for the fifth [associated with atonement for] the sacred [food]. If he obtains terumah through robbery and feeds it to another person, that person must make restitution for the principal and add a fifth.

Whenever we have said that a person must make restitution for the principal and add a fifth, [the intent is that] if he ate grain worth four [zuz], he must pay five from the type of grain from which he partook. Whenever we mentioned [payment of] the principal and two fifths, [the intent is that] if he ate grain worth four [zuz], he must pay six. Whenever we mentioned [payment of] two principals and one fifth, [the intent is that] if he ate grain worth four [zuz], he must pay nine.

Whenever he makes restitution, he must pay for the worth of the grain at the time he partook of it whether its value depreciated at the time he made restitution or appreciated.

1 Terumah may be used for eating, drinking, and smearing upon oneself, for smearing upon oneself is equivalent to drinking, as [indicated by Psalms 109:18]: "It has entered his innards like water and like oil into his bones." And drinking is like eating.

[One should] eat a substance fit to be eaten, drink a substance fit to be drunk, and smear a substance fit to be smeared. One should not smear wine and vinegar. One may, however, smear oneself with pure oil and may kindle impure oil. It is referred to as oil [fit for] burning universally.

2 It is permitted to compress dates that are terumah and collect them as a cake of dried dates. It is, however, forbidden to make them into beer. [For the same reason,] we do not make dates into honey, nor apples, wine, nor fall produce into vinegar. Similarly, with regard to other produce, we do not change them from their natural state if they are terumah; the only exceptions are olives and grapes.

If one transgressed and made food into a beverage, one should drink it. When a non-priest partakes of date-honey, apple-wine, or the like that is terumah inadvertently, he is not liable to make restitution. If he partook [of such products] intentionally, he should be given stripes for rebellious conduct.

3 We may not place dried dates and dried figs [that are terumah] into brine. One may, however, place wine in brine. We do not place fragrant herbs in oil, because doing so removes it from the category of food and makes it oil for smearing. One may mix wine, honey, pepper, and the like, in order to partake of them.

4 We do not boil wine that is terumah, because this reduces its quantity. We do not pickle onions that are terumah in vinegar that is terumah, because this spoils the vinegar.

We do not mix grain with legumes. All substances that become distinct from each other when they are sorted through a sieve may be mixed together. When the land of Judah was laid waste, [the people] began mixing one type of grain with another and one type of legumes with another. They did not, however, [mix] grain with legumes.

5 In the same way as ordinary flour is sifted, so too, a priest [sifts flour] that is terumah. He sifts [what is fit] to eat and discards the bran. If he desires to make fine flour, he should sift it many times until he produces a kab or two kabbim from a se'ah. He should not discard the remainder, because it is fit to be eaten. Instead, he should place it in a private place.

6 Oil that is terumah should not be used to seal an oven or a range, nor should it be smeared on a shoe or sandal. Nor should one smear it on his foot while [the foot] is in a shoe or sandal. He may, however, smear [oil that is terumah] on his foot and put on a shoe or smear his entire body and then roll on a new leather mat. Even though they will be smeared, he need not show concern. He should not, however, place oil on a marble tablet to roll upon because he causes it to be ruined.

7 Whenever anyone partakes of terumah - even fruit - he must wash his hands [before doing so. This applies] even if his hands are pure, as will be explained in the appropriate place. It may not be eaten on a table at which a non-priest [is dining; this is] a decree lest he partake of it. Terumah from the Diaspora may be eaten on a table at which a non-priest [is dining] and, like ordinary food, does not require that one wash his hands before partaking of it.

We do not smear oil that is terumah with soiled hands. If, however, [such oil] fell on his flesh, he can rub it with soiled hands. One may apply oil that is terumah to an infant during the seven days after he was born [even though he is uncircumcised]. For a newborn is not considered as uncircumcised for the first seven days [of his life].

8 A priest may smear oil that is terumah on himself and then bring his daughter's son who is an Israelite and roll him on his back. If he smears oil [that is terumah] on his body and enters a bathhouse, a non-priest may massage him in the bathhouse even though [the oil] will be applied to him.

9 When the daughter of a priest applied chilbah which is terumah to her hair, an Israelite woman is not permitted to apply [the remaining chilbah] to [her hair]. She may, however, rub her hair together with the hair [of the daughter of the priest].

Why were priests given permission to apply chilbah which is terumah to their hair? Because it is not fit for human consumption [as food].

10 The stems of figs, dried figs, wild figs, carobs, the insides of melons, the peels of melons, esrogim, and cucumbers even if they do not contain any food, and the extremities of the vegetables that are discarded by homeowners [when preparing vegetables], are forbidden to non-priests. The extremities of the vegetables that are cut off by gardeners, by contrast, are permitted to non-priests.

The casings of beans and sesame seeds are forbidden if they contain food. If they do not contain food, they are permitted.

11 The seeds of esrogim are permitted to be eaten. The seeds of olives, dates, and carobs, [by contrast,] even though they were not collected by a priest, are forbidden to a non-priest. With regard to other seeds, [the rule is]: If they were collected and have moisture, so that they can be sucked, they are forbidden to a non-priest. If they were discarded, they are permitted.

12 Bran from wheat: Fresh bran is forbidden, for it is fit to be eaten by humans. Aged bran is permitted. Until when is the bran considered fresh? For the entire time that people are accustomed to beat the grain at the granaries.

13 Lower quality and slight rotten kernels of grain that are terumah are forbidden. If they already produce dust, they are permitted. When one pours water over dregs [of grapes] that are terumah, the first and second batches are forbidden to non-priests, but the third is permitted. If one does not pour water over them, but instead, strains off the wine from the seeds, even the third straining is forbidden to non-priests.

14 When one has cleared the kernels of wheat that are terumah from a grainheap, we do not require the owner to sit and collect the [leftover] kernels one by one and [only after collecting them] bring ordinary grain there. Instead, he may sweep the area in the ordinary manner, and then bring ordinary grain there. Similarly, when a jug of oil that is terumah spills, we don't require [the owner] to sponge it up until [the earth] is dry. Instead, he may conduct himself as he does with ordinary [oil].

15 When a person pours out oil that is terumah from a jug, he should continue to pour until the stream [of oil] ceases and the oil begins to drip, little by little. Once three drops have dropped one after the other, it is sufficient. It is permitted to place ordinary oil in that jug. If, however, he did not place ordinary oil and leaned the jug on its side until the remnants [of the oil] collected together, those remnants are terumah.

16 A priest may fill a lamp with oil fit to be burnt and give it to an Israelite to ascend to a loft and enter a room to perform tasks on behalf of a priest, but not for the sake of an Israelite. If they were partners, it is permitted.

17 When an Israelite was a guest at a priest's [home] and the priest kindled oil fit to be burnt for him and then departed, he is not required to extinguish [the lamp] until it burns out on its own. An Israelite may dip a wick in the lamp of a priest and kindle it so that he may proceed [using] it.

18 When livestock belonging to a priest was standing next to livestock belonging to an Israelite or when garments belonging to a priest were being woven next to garments belonging to an Israelite, oil that is fit for burning may be kindled because of them without the permission of the priest.

Similarly, we can light oil that is fit to be burnt in synagogues, houses of study, and dark alleyways without the permission of a priest. And a person who does not have ordinary oil to kindle a Chanukah lamp may kindle oil that is fit to be burnt without permission of a priest. We may kindle oil that is fit to be burnt above [the bed of] a sick person with the permission of a priest.

19 When a daughter of an Israelite who is married to a priest frequently visits her father, he may light [such oil] with her permission. It is permitted for a priest to kindle oil fit to be burnt in a house of mourning or at a wedding celebration even though a multitude of people are present. We do not suspect that the people will partake of it. At a wedding celebration, [this will not take place] because they will not touch it because of their garments are clean, and in a house of mourning, the people will not feel free to do so because of their mourning.

20 When a person sows terumah unknowingly, he should turn it over. If he did so intentionally, he must maintain [the crop]. Once it reaches a third of its growth, whether he sowed it intentionally or unknowingly, he must maintain [the crop]. If it was flax, even if it reached a third of its growth and even if he sowed it intentionally, he must turn it over. This is a penalty so that he should not sow it with the intention of benefiting from its fibers.

21 Produce that grows from terumah is considered as ordinary produce with regard to all matters except that it is forbidden to non-priests. Our Sages decreed that it be forbidden to non-priests like terumah [as a safeguard], lest a priest maintain possession of impure terumah with the intent of sowing it and producing [a crop of] ordinary produce and this lead to undesirable consequences. Therefore, it is permitted to eat the products [of such plantings] with impure hands and a person who has immersed himself that day may partake of them like ordinary produce.

22 Produce grown from produce grown [from terumah] are like ordinary produce with regard to all matters. [This applies] even to types of produce whose seeds do not decompose provided the new growth exceeds the root in the second generation of produce. [In such a situation,] the new growth elevates the root even if the seed does not decompose and the entire [plant] is permitted to be eaten by non-priests.

The same applies with regard to [produce that grows from] terumah from the Diaspora, terumah mixed with ordinary produce, extra terumah, or seeds from garden vegetables that are not eaten themselves, e.g., turnips and radishes. Although the turnips and radishes themselves are terumah, [the produce] growing from their [seeds] is like ordinary produce with regard to all matters.Similarly, when a person sows flaxseed that is terumah, the plants growing from it are permitted to non-priests.

23 When a person sows terumah that is impure, even though the produce that grows is ritually pure, it is forbidden to partake of it. [The rationale is that] since the terumah that was sown was forbidden to be eaten, it was already cast off. [Hence, it remains forbidden].

24 If he cut off the leaves that grew and then another set of leaves grew and he cut them off, the produce that emerge afterwards is permitted to be eaten.

25 When plants of ordinary produce became impure and afterwards, they were sown and designated as terumah, they are permitted [to be eaten. The rationale is that] sowing them caused them to be considered pure and they did not become impure while they were terumah so that they would be forbidden.

26 When a stalk [of grain] was in the midst of a grain heap and one straightened the edges of the grain heap, this stalk is considered tevel, because it was in the grain heap when it was straightened. If [that stalk] was planted, and then it was singled out and designated as terumah, there is an unresolved question if it is terumah. Since it was planted, it is possible to say that it was released from the categorization as tevel and is considered as produce for which all the required work was not completed. If, however, it was designated as terumah before it was planted, it is terumah. Therefore if one ripped off [a portion] of it and ate it willfully, he is liable for death [at the hand of heaven]. If he did so unknowingly, he must [make restitution and add] a fifth. If he bent over and ate from the ground with his mouth, his intent is of no consequence because of the approach of people at large [and] it is not the ordinary practice for people to eat in this manner. Therefore he is not liable for death, nor for the [additional] fifth if he acted unknowingly.

27 The obligations of leket, shichichah, pe'ah, terumah the tithes and the tithe given to the poor apply with regard to a field of produce that grew from terumah. Poor Israelites and poor priests come and take these presents. The poor priests eat those that they acquire. The poor Israelites sell theirs to the priests for the price of terumah. Similarly, a Levite must sell his tithes to a priest.

28 A person who crushes such produce is praiseworthy. When a person threshes it with an animal, what should he do? He should tie a bucket around the animals neck and place the type of grain it is threshing in it. Thus he will neither be muzzling the animal, nor feeding it terumah.

1 It is forbidden to cause the terumah of Eretz Yisrael to contract ritual impurity, as [is the rule with regard to] other sacred articles. One should not bring it to a state of ritual impurity, nor should one spoil it. Instead, he should partake of pure [terumah] and kindle impure terumah.

It is permitted to cause terumah from the Diaspora to become impure, even with impurity mandated by Scriptural Law. Although it is only ritually impure because of the impurity stemming from the Diaspora which is a Rabbinic decree, [this leniency is granted] because the obligation to separate [such terumah] is also of Rabbinic origin. For this reason, a woman may separate challah while in the niddah state in the Diaspora, for she is cautioned only against eating it, not against touching it, as we explained.

2 If a doubt arose whether terumah became impure, it should not be eaten, nor should it be burnt. Instead, one should place it aside until it becomes definitely impure, [at which time,] it should be burnt. There are situations in which doubt has arisen that mandate that terumah should be burnt as will be explained with regard to [the laws of] ritual purity and impurity.

3 When a question arises whether a jug of wine has become ritually impure, one should not do anything with it. One should not move it from its place, nor reveal it. Instead, he should leave it in its place until it definitely becomes impure and must be burnt. We are not concerned that perhaps it will be eaten.

4 [The following rules apply when] a jug [of wine that is terumah which is pure] is broken in an upper vat and the lower vat [contains ordinary wine that is] impure. If it is possible for a person to save a revi'it of wine in a state of purity, he should do so. If not, he should save [the wine] with his hands without washing them even though he imparts ritual impurity [to the terumah], as will be explained [in the laws pertaining to] ritual purity.

5 When does the above apply? To a jug of wine, [and then] provided that the contents of the lower vat are less than 100 times the amount [that falls in], in which instance, the terumah wine will mix with the ordinary wine and everything will be disqualified. If, however, the lower vat contained 100 times the amount of the jug and thus [the wine that descends] will be nullified because [the mixture] is 101 times the original or the jug contains oil, he should allow it to descend and become impure instead of making it impure with his own hands. [The rationale is that] the entire quantity is fit to use as fuel and there will be no great loss.

Similarly, if a jug of oil is spilling, if it is possible for one to save a revi'it of oil in a state of purity, he should do so. If not, he should save it while ritually impure. Since the jug is broken, he is not adjured against saving it in a state of ritual impurity, because he is agitated.

6 [The following laws apply when] one was traveling from place to place, carrying loaves that are terumah, and a gentile tells him: "Give me one of them. If not, I will touch all of them and make them ritually impure." He should place one of them on a rock, but he should not place it in his hand so that he will not be a direct cause of the terumah becoming ritually impure.

7 [The following laws apply with regard to] chilbah and vetch that are terumah. Since they are not fit for human consumption, it is permitted to carry out all the actions [connected with their preparation] in a state of ritual impurity. One must be careful only when placing them in the water to soak. For if one placed them in the water to soak while ritually impure, one will have made them ritually impure directly. Once one has soaked them, however, one need not be concerned with ritual impurity at the time one crushes the vetch or when one feeds them to an animal. For this reason, one may give chilbah and vetch that are terumah to a priest who is a common person.

8 We do not entrust terumah to a priest who is an unlearned person, because he is easygoing about it and may partake of it. We may, however, entrust [terumah] to an unlearned Israelite if it is stored in an earthenware container sealed with a wrapper, provided it is not produce that is already made fit to contract ritual impurity. [This is] a decree lest it be moved by his wife while she is in the nidah state.

9 We do not separate terumah from olives in a state of ritual purity for an unlearned person. We may, however, prepare ordinary olives for him in a state of ritual purity. [This leniency was granted] so that the operator of the vat could earn his livelihood.

How should this process be carried out? He should separate an amount of produce sufficient for terumah and place it in a utensil that cannot contract ritual impurity, e.g., a stone utensil. When the unlearned person comes to take the ordinary produce and the terumah, we tell him: "Be careful not to touch the terumah. Otherwise, the produce will become tevel again."

10 When an Israelite performs the tasks associated with the preparation of his produce while ritually impure, we should not harvest grapes with him. Needless to say, we should not tread the grapes with him, because the terumah will be made ritually impure. One may, however, carry barrels to and from the vat for him.

11 When olives and grapes have become ritually impure, we may squeeze them and separate terumah [from the oil or wine]. If [grapes or the olives] became impure after they themselves were designated as terumah, they should be squeezed [using] less than an egg-sized portion at a time. In such an instance, the liquid that flows from them is permitted to be drunk by the priests. Indeed, it would be fit to be used for libations on the altar. [The rationale is that] the liquid is considered as set aside within the fruit. The reason that [our Sages] spoke of less than an egg-sized portion is that this is a decree lest one use more than an egg-sized portion and the liquid become impure because of [contact with] the egg-sized portion.

If the produce was impure to the third degree, one may tread upon it in the vat and the liquid produced from it can be used for pure terumah. [The rationale is that] ritual impurity of the third degree does not bring about ritual impurity of the fourth degree with regard to terumah, as will be explained with regard to the concept of ritual purity.

12 When a loaf of bread that is terumah becomes impure, it should be discarded among the firewood until one uses it for fuel. Similarly, if oil [that is terumah] becomes impure, it should be placed in a repugnant container until it is used as fuel so that it will not create a stumbling block for others, [lest] they partake of it.

When wheat [kernels] become impure, one should parboil them and place them in a repugnant container until they are no longer fit to be eaten and then use them as fuel for an oven or range. Liquids that are not fit to be used as fuel, e.g., wine, should be buried.

13 When wine that is terumah is left uncovered, since it is forbidden to drink it, it should be poured out. Similarly, figs, grapes, marrow, squash, watermelon, and cucumbers that are terumah that were discovered to be perforated are forbidden to be eaten because of the mortal danger involved. What should be done with them? They should be discarded in the sea or buried.

14 When a dough was kneaded with water that was left uncovered, it should be burnt even though it is terumah.

15 It is forbidden for a priest to take terumah or any other of the presents given to him until they were separated by the owners [of the produce], as [implied by the verses, Numbers 18:12]: "The first [of the produce] which they will give to God I have given to you" and [ibid.:19]: "...that the children of Israel will offer up to God are given to you." [Implied is that] the children of Israel must offer it up and then [the priests] can acquire it. [The priests] should not take [these presents] after they have been set aside except with the knowledge of the owners. For the owners have the right to give them to any priest that they desire, as [ibid. 5:10] states: "A person's sacraments will belong to him." [Nevertheless,] if [a priest] takes them without the owner's knowledge, he acquires them. For all that belongs to the owner is the right to apportion them and that right is not financially significant.

16 When terumah was given to a priest and he found other entities in it, it is forbidden for him [to take them]. This is comparable to theft, for perhaps other people placed them [in the terumah] to take them [afterwards].

17 An Israelite is not required to trouble himself with terumah and bring it from the granary until a city or from a desert until a settled area. Instead, the priests should go out to the granaries and the Israelites should give them their portions there. If they did not go out [to collect the terumah, the owner] should separate it and leave it in the granary. Our Sages ordained that if there are beasts or animals who would eat it there and it is not protected from them, [the owner] should take the trouble of dealing with it and bringing it to the city. He may collect a wage for bringing it [to the city] from the priest. [This is done,] because if he separated it and left it for the animals and beasts, God's name would be desecrated.

18 It is forbidden for the priests and the Levites to assist [farmers] in the granaries in order to receive the agricultural presents given them. Whoever renders such assistance desecrates the holiness of God's name. Concerning such people is applied [the malediction, Malachi 2:8]: "You have defiled the covenant of Levi." It is forbidden for an Israelite to allow [a priest] to help him. Instead, he should grant them their portion with honor.

19 When a person gives terumah to a priest on the condition that he returns it, he has fulfilled his obligation to give. It is, however, forbidden to do so, for [the priest] is considered like one who helps in the granaries. Similarly, it is forbidden for [the priests] to seize the terumot and the tithes. It is even forbidden for them to make a verbal request for them. Instead, they should take them with honor, for they are eating and drinking from the table of God. These presents are given to Him and He apportioned them to them, as [Numbers 18:8] states: "Behold I have given to you the safeguard of My terumah."

20 A person should not give terumah to the watchman of his vat, nor a firstborn animal to the watchman of his flock, nor the presents [given when an animal is slaughtered] to the shepherd of his animals. If he gave them [to these individuals], he desecrated [their honor] unless he gave them their wages for watching first.

One Israelite may tell another Israelite: "Here is a sela. Give terumah...", "...a firstborn...", or other presents [given to the priests] "...to so-and-so, the priest, who is my daughter's son, or "...my sister's son," or the like.

21 When does the above apply? When the owner desired to give [the presents] to one of two priests or [tithes] to one of two Levites gratis and his colleague told him: "Here is this and give to that one." If, however, an owner told a priest or a Levite: "Here is this portion. [Give me something in exchange] for my privilege to give it to whom I want," this is forbidden. Similarly, it is forbidden to sell terumah as merchandise even though he purchases it from a priest and sells it to a priest.

22 There are ten individuals to whom terumah is not given in the granaries even though they may partake of it or grant others the right to partake of it:

a deaf-mute, an intellectually or emotionally unstable person, or a child who does not know how to spread out his hands to recite the priestly blessing, these [are not given terumah], because they lack sufficient knowledge;

a tumtum and an androgynus, because they are unique types of people; a servant, lest passersby in the field [see him taking terumah] and give testimony that he is a priest;

an uncircumcised person and a ritually impure person, because they are abhorrent;
a woman [married to a priest], lest she be divorced and [to prevent her from] entering into seclusion [with someone in the granary]; and a person who marries a woman who is not appropriate for him; he was penalized in that [terumah] would not be allocated to him in the granaries until he divorces her.
In all the above instances, [terumah] may be sent to their homes and allocated to them as is the law regarding other sacramental foods dependent on the boundaries [of Eretz Yisrael] with the exception of a person who marries a woman who is not appropriate for him, an uncircumcised person and a ritually impure person, to whom [terumah] is not sent at all.

1 Terumah becomes nullified in a mixture 101 times the size of the original quantity.
What is implied? When a se'ah of terumah falls into 100 se'ah of ordinary produce and all the produce becomes mixed together, he should separate one se'ah and give it to the priest. The remainder is permitted [to be eaten by] non-priests.
[Accordingly,] whenever the terumah is a substance which the priests do not care about, e.g., terumah from wild figs, carobs, Edomite barley and the like, it is not necessary to separate [a hundredth for the priest].

Instead, since it fell into a 100 times its amount, it is nullified because of its minimal size and the entire mixture is permitted to non-priests.

2 If a se'ah of terumah fell into less than 100 [se'ah of ordinary produce], the entire mixture becomes miduma. It should be sold to a priest at the price of terumah with the exception of that se'ah.

When does the above apply? When produce becomes mixed with its own kind. If, however, produce becomes mixed with produce of another type, [the ruling is dependent on whether] the flavor [of the terumah] is recognizable or not. If the entire mixture has the flavor of terumah, it is all considered as miduma and should be sold to the priests with the exception of the value of the terumah. If the flavor of the entire mixture is that of the ordinary produce, the entire mixture is permitted to non-priests.

3 When a se'ah of terumah falls into 100 se'ah and one se'ah was removed from the mixture, if that se'ah fell into other produce, the question whether the mixture is considered as miduma is determined according to the proportion [of terumah in the first mixture].Similarly, if a se'ah of terumah fell into less than one hundred se'ah [of ordinary produce] and the entire mixture became miduma and then some of this mixture fell into other [produce], the question whether the mixture is considered as miduma is determined according to the proportion [of terumah in the first mixture].

What is implied? Ten se'ah of terumah fell into 90 se'ah of ordinary produce and the entire mixture became miduma. If ten se'ah from this mixture fell into less than 100 se'ah of ordinary produce, the mixture is considered miduma, because in the ten se'ah of the [original] mixture, there was at least one se'ah of terumah. If less than ten se'ah [of terumah] fell into [the original mixture], the [second] mixture is not considered as miduma [when one se'ah of the first mixture fell into 100 se'ah].

4 When does the above apply? With regard to substances that do not become blended together, e.g., wheat kernels with wheat kernels or flour with flour. When, however, substances blend together, e.g., oil that is terumah mixes with ordinary oil or wine that is terumah mixes with ordinary wine, we follow the majority. If the majority is terumah, should the mixture fall into other produce, the ruling is the same as if [the first mixture] was [entirely] terumah. If the majority of the [first] mixture is ordinary produce, should that mixture fall into other produce, [the entire first mixture] is considered as ordinary produce and there is never a difficulty concerning a mixture of terumah. Nevertheless, in all instances, the entire [first] mixture is forbidden to non-priests.

5 When a se'ah of terumah falls into 100 se'ah, [a se'ah of the mixture] was removed, another [se'ah of terumah] fell in, [another se'ah] was removed, and another fell in, the ordinary produce is permitted until there is a majority of terumah [in the mixture]. Thus if more than 100 se'ah of terumah fell into 100 se'ah of ordinary produce, se'ah after se'ah [in above manner], the entire mixture is considered as miduma.

6 [The following rules apply when] a se'ah of terumah fell into 100 [se'ah of ordinary produce] and before one se'ah was removed, another se'ah of terumah fell [into the mixture]. If [the owner] was aware of the first se'ah before the second se'ah fell, [the mixture] does not become miduma. Instead, he should remove two se'ah and the remainder is permitted. [The rationale is that] since it should have been taken out, we consider it as if it was taken out. If, however, he did not become aware of the first se'ah until after the second fell in, the mixture is considered miduma. It is as if both se'ah fell in at the same time.

7 The waste products of terumah are not combined with it [a mixture of it and ordinary produce] to cause the ordinary produce to be forbidden. The waste products of ordinary produce, by contrast, are combined with it to cause terumah to be nullified in a mixture.

What is implied? A se'ah of high quality wheat that is terumah fell into 100 se'ah of wheat of low quality that is ordinary produce. The owner ground the entire quantity. Even though there is much bran in the ordinary produce and a small amount in the terumah and thus the flour from the terumah is more than one hundredth of the flour from the ordinary produce, it is nullified. For we measure the flour with the bran and [together,] it is 101 times [the original amount of terumah]. If, however, a se'ah of low quality wheat that is terumah falls into [slightly] less 100 se'ah of high quality wheat that is ordinary produce and [the owner] ground the entire quantity, [the weight of] the flour that is terumah will be one hundredth of [the weight of] the flour that is ordinary produce. Hence it is nullified because the mixture is 101 times the original amount [of terumah], for the weight of the ordinary produce increased and that of the terumah decreased.

8 When a log of clear wine that is terumah fell into 100 lugin of cloudy wine that is ordinary produce, we do not remove the dregs from the wine [and only then calculate whether the ordinary wine is 100 times the terumah]. Instead, we nullify the log of terumah. Similarly, if a log of cloudy wine [that is terumah] fell into a 100 log of clear wine, we do not remove the dregs in [the wine that is terumah].

9 When a log of water fell into 99 lugim of wine and then a log of wine that is terumah fell into the mixture, the entire mixture is considered as miduma, because water does not nullify [the existence of] wine.

10 [The following rules apply when] a se'ah of terumah fell into less than 100 se'ah of ordinary produce and then other ordinary produce fell into the mixture so that there was more than 100 times [the weight of the terumah]. If [the second batch of produce was added] unknowingly, [the terumah] is nullified because there is 101 [times the original weight]. If he mixed it intentionally, the entire mixture is considered as miduma, because we do not nullify the existence of substances prohibited by Scriptural Law as an initial preference.

11 It is, however, permitted to nullify terumah from the Diaspora [by mixing it] with a majority of permitted substances and eat it during the time when one is ritually impure. Not only that, if a person possesses wine that is terumah from the Diaspora, he should take one log of this wine and mix it with two lugim of ordinary [wine]. Thus there are three lugim. Afterwards, he can add another log of the terumah wine into the three lugim and then take one log from the four and drink it. He may then add another log [of terumah wine] and take out a log and drink it. Similarly, he may continue adding a log of terumah and removing a log until all the wine that is terumah is completed. Thus he can nullify several lugim [of terumah] in two lugim of ordinary produce.

12 When one sows terumah next to ordinary produce and cannot identify which produce is terumah and which is ordinary produce, the entire batch is permitted even if there were 100 rows of terumah and [only] one row of ordinary produce.

When does the above apply? With regard to produce whose seed decomposes in the earth, e.g., wheat, barley, and the like. If, however, the seeds do not decompose, e.g., garlic and onions, even if 100 rows are ordinary produce and one row is terumah, the entire mixture is miduma. If the entire crop is harvested, terumah can be nullified in a mixture of 100 times its weight, but, as an initial and preferred option, one should not harvest the crop.

13 When there are two containers of produce, one containing terumah and one containing ordinary produce and it is not known [which contains the ordinary produce and which contains the terumah], if [the contents of] one of these containers falls into ordinary produce, [the mixture] is not considered as miduma. [This same law applies if produce that is] terumah fell into one of two containers [of ordinary produce], but one does not know which one and afterwards, one of those containers fell into ordinary produce.

Similarly, if one sowed [the grain from] one of the two containers, the produce that grows is considered as ordinary produce with regard to all matters. [The produce in] the remaining container is considered as terumah. If [the contents of] the second container fell into other produce, [the mixture] is not considered as miduma. Similarly, if another person sowed [the contents of] the second container, the produce that grows is considered as ordinary produce.

If [the contents of] both containers fall into one mixture of other produce, the mixture is considered miduma according to the amount of produce in the smaller container. If one person sowed both of them, if the produce is a species where the seed decomposes, the produce that grows is considered as ordinary produce.If the seed does not decompose, the produce that grows is miduma.

When does the above apply? When one sowed [the contents of] the second container before the first batch of produce was harvested. If, however, he harvested the first batch of produce before sowing the second, the produce that grows is considered as ordinary produce even when the seed does not decompose. [The rationale is that] produce that has been reaped and produce that is growing are not considered as indicators of each other's status.

14 When there are two containers [of produce], one containing ordinary produce and the other, containing terumah and two se'ah, one of ordinary produce and one of terumah, and both se'ah fall into these containers, [one into each], the produce is permitted. We assume that the ordinary produce fell into [the container of] ordinary produce and that the terumah fell into [the container of] terumah. [This applies] even though the weight of the ordinary produce is not greater than that of the terumah. When does the above apply? With regard to terumah in the present era, for the requirement is of Rabbinic origin. If the terumah is mandated by Scriptural Law, [the above ruling does not apply unless] the weight of the ordinary produce is greater than that of the terumah.

15 When a se'ah of terumah falls into a grainheap and [the owner] states: "The terumah of this grainheap is in its midst," the borders of the terumah are defined where the se'ah fell and the entire mixture becomes miduma because of the terumah which fell in and the terumah of the grainheap.
If he said: "The terumah of the grainheap is in its northern portion," we divide the grainheap in half, and then the northern half in half. Thus the northern most quarter of the grainheap is miduma.

16 If there were two grainheaps before a person and he said: 'The terumah for both grainheaps is in one of them," they are both considered miduma.
If there were two se'ah of grain and one grainheap before a person and he said: "One of these se'ah is considered terumah for this grainheap," one of them is terumah and he does not know which. If there were two grainheaps and one se'ah before him and he said: "This is terumah for one of the grainheaps," [the se'ah] is terumah and [terumah has been separated from] one of the grainheaps, but he does not know which one is no longer tevel.

1 [The following laws apply when] there were fifty dark figs and fifty light figs and one fig that is terumah fell among them. If it was light, the dark figs are permitted and the light figs are considered miduma. If it was dark, the dark figs are miduma and the light figs are permitted. If it is not known whether it was light or dark, it can be nullified when the mixture is 101 times [the weight of] the original fig. If he knew what type of fig it was but forgot, they are all considered miduma.

2 Similar laws apply when there are cakes of pressed figs or blocks of pressed figs and a cake or block of [figs that are] terumah falls among them. If it is not known whether the one which fell in was a block or a cake, the cakes and the blocks are combined and the terumah can be nullified if their [combined weight] is 101 times that of the terumah. [Similarly,] when there are large cakes of figs and small ones and a cake of figs [that is terumah] falls among them, but it is not known whether the cake which fell in was large or small, [the existing cakes] can nullify the one which fell in whether by weight or by number.

What is implied? A cake [of figs] fell into a mixture of 100 other cakes, both large and small. We assume that a small cake fell in and one may remove one of the small cakes. If a cake fell into 40 cakes, 20 of them weighing four litra each and 20 of them, weighing one litra each, since the combined weight is 101 litra, we assume a small one fell in and remove one of the small ones.

3 Flour and finely sifted flour cannot be combined together to nullify terumah.

4 When a se'ah of wheat which is terumah falls on the mouth of the storage vat of wheat, we do not measure it against the 101 times [its weight or ordinary grain found] in the storage vat. For we do not make such an assessment unless the terumah has been mixed with the ordinary produce or we do not know where the terumah fell.

What should be done? We consider the terumah as if it is wheat placed above barley and separate the terumah itself which fell unto the storage vat with some of the ordinary produce upon which they fell as one would be collecting wheat from barley.

5 [The following laws apply when] there are two containers or two storage vats and terumah fell into one of them. It became mixed with [the contents of the container or storage vat] and it is not known which one it fell into. If the two storage vats were in the same building, they are considered as if they were combined and the terumah is nullified if the entire quantity is 101 times its weight. It is as if they were both contained in a single storage vat. Moreover, the containers are considered as combined together even if they are in two separate buildings, for it is possible to gather the two in one building. If, however, the two containers were in two cities, they are not combined.

6 How should he remove the se'ah which fell in? If he desires to remove it from one of them, he may. If he desires to remove half from one and half from the other, he may.

[The following laws apply when] there are jugs filled with dried figs that are ordinary produce and [the owner] pressed a litra of figs that are terumah into the opening of one of them, but he does not remember which one. If there are 101 jugs, the terumah is considered nullified. He should take one jug and sell it to a priest except for the worth of the litra [of terumah] and the remainder [of the jugs] are permitted. If there are less than 100 jugs, [the figs at] the openings [of the jugs] are considered miduma and those at the bottom are permitted.

7 Similar laws apply if one pressed [a litra of] figs into the opening of a *kaveret*or into the top of a cake. If he pressed them onto the top of a cake, but does not know whether he pressed them onto the northern portion [of the cake] or its southern portion, nor does he know which cake he pressed them onto, we look at all the figs as if they were separate entities and [the figs that are terumah] should be nullified based on weight. If all the cakes weigh 100 litra, the terumah is nullified provided each of the cakes weighs more than two litra so that in each cake, the terumah is nullified because there is a majority of ordinary produce. The rationale is that when there is a doubt concerning the presence of terumah, it is nullified when there is a majority of ordinary produce.

8 When terumah is definitely [present in a mixture], it is forbidden if the mixture is 100 [or less times its weight]. If there is merely a doubt concerning the presence of terumah, it is forbidden if there are only fifty. It is permitted only if one adds a majority [of the new mixture]. If there are more than fifty, one need not add such a majority.
What is implied? One fig that is terumah fell into 99 figs and they are all present. They are all forbidden to non-priests, as explained.

9 If, [after a fig that is terumah fell into 50 other figs, and then] one of the mixture becomes lost, it is possible that one of the ordinary figs was the one that was lost, but it is possible that it was the fig that fell in. Hence, the mixture is forbidden until one adds ordinary produce to it from another source, adding 51 figs to the entire quantity. If one fig fell into 51 figs and one of the mixture was lost, the remainder is permitted to non-priests.

10 [The following rules apply when] a se'ah of terumah fell into less than 100 se'ah of the first tithe from which terumat ma'aser was not separated or into [produce from] the second tithe or consecrated property that was not redeemed and the entire mixture became miduma. If [the terumah] fell into the first tithe, the terumat ma'aser should be designated, and the entire mixture sold to the priests with the exception of the worth of the terumah that fell into it and the worth of the terumat ma'aser. If it fell into [produce from] the second tithe or consecrated property that was not redeemed, they should be redeemed and then sold to a priest with the exception of the worth of the terumah.

11 When a se'ah of impure terumah falls into less than 100 se'ah of ordinary produce or into produce that is from the first tithe, or from the second tithe, or from consecrated property - whether [the latter three] are ritually pure or ritually impure - [the mixture] is miduma. Hence, the entire mixture is like impure terumah which is forbidden to everyone. Thus it is all forbidden and must be left until it rots.

When does the above apply? With regard to an entity that is not eaten raw. When, by contrast, it is normal practice to partake of a type of produce uncooked, one should not set them aside lest someone encounter them and partake of it. Instead, the entire mixture should be used as fuel, like impure terumah is used as fuel.

12 When a se'ah of pure terumah falls into less than 100 se'ah of ordinary produce that is impure, the entire mixture should be sold to a priest with the exception of the worth of the terumah. The priest should eat this mixture which is miduma as roasted kernels or he should make them into a dough using fruit juice which does not render produce fit to contract impurity, so that [contact with] the impure ordinary produce will not render the terumah as impure.

Alternatively, he should make this mixture that is miduma into a dough that is less than the size of an egg. [This is beneficial], because impure food does not cause other food to become impure until [the impure food] is the size of an egg. Or he may divide the mixture that is miduma and place a portion of it that is less than the size of an egg in each dough so that the terumah in it will not become impure.

13 When a se'ah of impure terumah falls into 100 se'ah of ordinary produce that is pure or a se'ah of pure terumah falls into 100 se'ah of ordinary produce that is impure, it should be removed and the terumah is nullified, because the new mixture is 101 times [the size of the terumah that fell in. That se'ah] should be eaten as roasted kernels, or it should be made into dough with fruit juice, or into dough that is less than the size of an egg. [The rationale is that] the se'ah which fell in is not [necessarily] the se'ah

14 When a se'ah of impure terumah falls into 100 se'ah of pure terumah, it is nullified because of the insignificant amount and the entire mixture should be eaten in a state of ritual purity. If it fell into less than 100, he should leave the entire mixture until it rots.

15 There were two containers [of grain, each containing less than 100 se'ah]. A se'ah of terumah fell into one of them and it was known into which one it fell. Afterwards, a second se'ah of terumah fell into one of them, but it was not known into which it fell. [The rationale is that] we assume that the second se'ah fell into the same place as the first se'ah, for we associate the problematic issue with the [previous] problem.

If, however, the first se'ah fell into one of the containers, but it was not known into which it fell and afterwards, a second se'ah fell into one and it was known into which one it fell, we do not say that the first one fell into the same place as the second. Instead, both are considered to be problematic.

16 If there were two containers [of grain], one ritually pure and one ritually impure, and a se'ah of terumah fell into one and it was not known into which, we assume that it fell into the impure one.

17 When there are two containers, one containing pure terumah and one containing impure ordinary produce, should a se'ah of pure terumah fall into one of them, we assume that it fell into the one containing terumah. The ordinary produce should, however, be eaten in a state of ritual purity like terumah.

18 [18-19] When a se'ah of impure terumah falls into one of the above mentioned containers, we say that it fell into the terumah. The ordinary produce should, however, be eaten as roasted kernels or made into dough with fruit juice.

20 When there are two containers, one containing impure terumah and the other ordinary produce that is pure, and a se'ah of pure terumah falls into one of them, we assume that it fell into the terumah, but the ordinary produce should be eaten as roasted kernels.

21 If a se'ah of impure terumah fell into one of these containers, both of them are forbidden. [The rationale is that when] there is a doubt [whether produce is] impure terumah, it is forbidden to be eaten, while when there is a doubt whether it is miduma, it is permitted. For the prohibition against partaking of impure terumah is Scriptural in origin, while the prohibition against partaking of a mixture that is miduma is Rabbinic in origin based on the principles explained in Hilchot Ma'achalot Assurot.

1 A sealed barrel [of wine that is terumah] makes a mixture miduma whatever the ratio [between it and the other barrels].
What is implied? When a sealed barrel [of wine] that is terumah becomes mixed with several thousand sealed barrels [of ordinary wine], the entire mixture becomes miduma. If the barrels are opened, [the presence of the terumah] is nullified when 101 times its contents are present.

2 When a sealed barrel [that contains terumah] becomes mixed with 100 barrels and then one falls into the Mediterranean Sea, they are all permitted. We assume that it is the one that is terumah that fell in. This is not the case when a fig falls into 100 figs. In the latter instance, it is necessary to set aside one [fig]. [The rationale for the distinction is] that a barrel that falls into the sea is noticeable. A fig and the like which fall are not noticeable.

3 When a sealed barrel [that contains terumah] becomes mixed with 100 barrels and one of them is opened, he should remove one hundredth of it, and then he may drink the barrel. The other barrels are, however, forbidden until they are opened. Whenever any one of them is opened, he should remove the percentage that causes the mixture to be miduma and drink the remaining hundred portions.

If a barrel [containing terumah] became mixed with 150 barrels and 100 of them were opened, one should remove the percentage that causes the mixture to be miduma, i.e., one barrel and drink [the remaining barrels]. The remaining 50 are still forbidden; we do not presume that the barrel that was terumah was among the majority [that were opened]. Even if there are several thousand barrels, they are all considered miduma. Whenever any one is opened, he should remove one hundredth of it and then he may drink the remainder [of that barrel]. The other barrels,

4 We have already explained in Hilchot Ma'achalot Assurot that a leavening agent or a spice causes a mixture to be forbidden regardless of how small the amount is mixed in. Therefore if a person pureed an apple that was terumah and put it in a dough and it caused [the dough] to leaven, the entire dough becomes miduma and is forbidden to non-priests.

5 When an egg, even its yolk, was flavored with spices that are terumah, it is forbidden, because it absorbs.

6 When yeast that is terumah fell into a dough and it was removed and afterwards, the mixture became leavened, [the dough] is permitted.

7 We have already explained that if terumah becomes mixed with a substance of a different type, [the mixture is forbidden if the terumah] imparts its flavor [to the mixture]. Therefore, [the following laws apply when] a diced onion is cooked together with other food. If the onion is terumah and the other food is ordinary produce and it is flavored by the onion, the other food is forbidden to non-priests. If the onion is ordinary produce and the cooked food is terumah and the flavor of the cooked food was imparted to the onion, the onion is forbidden [to non-priests].

8 [The following laws apply if] lentils were cooked and then a dry onion was placed among them: If the onion was whole, it is permitted. If it was diced, [the ruling depends on whether] its flavor was imparted. If he cooked the onion with the lentils, whether it is whole or diced, we estimate whether it imparted its flavor. With regard to the remainder of the cooked food, regardless of whether the onion was placed upon it after it was cooked or cooked with it, or whether it was whole or diced, we estimate whether it imparted its flavor.

Why do we not estimate [whether flavor was imparted] when a whole onion was placed among cooked lentils? Because it does not absorb from them, for it is whole, nor does it impart [flavor] to them, because they have already been cooked. If the onions were soft, it is considered as if they were diced. Similarly, if its tip or its outer shell was removed or it was moist, it is considered as if it was diced. Wild onions, whether moist or dry, whether whole or diced, we see if they have imparted their flavor.

9 When one pickles vegetables that are ordinary produce with those of terumah, they are permitted to non-priests with the exception of onions, scallions, and garlic. [With regard to these species,] if one pickled vegetables that are ordinary produce with onions that are terumah or onions that are ordinary produce with onions that are terumah, they are forbidden to non-priests. If one pickled vegetables that are terumah with an onion that is ordinary produce, the onion is permitted to non-priests.

10 [The following rules apply when] olives that are ordinary produce were pickled together with olives that are terumah. If they were both crushed, or the ordinary olives were crushed, but those which were terumah were whole, or they were pickled in brine that was terumah, they are forbidden to non-priests. If, however, they were both whole or the olives that were terumah were crushed and those that were ordinary produce were whole, they are permitted, because those that are crushed absorb from those which are whole.

11 Water in which terumah was pickled or cooked is forbidden to non-priests.

12 The laws governing terumah apply to anise as long as it has not yet flavored a dish [of food]. Once it has flavored a dish, the laws of terumah no longer apply.

13 [The following laws apply when a person] removes a warm loaf of bread [from the oven] and places it over a barrel of wine that is terumah. If the loaf is from wheat, it is permitted. If it is from barley, it is forbidden, because it draws forth [the wine itself].

14 When an oven has been heated with cumin that is terumah, the bread is permitted. For it does not have the flavor of the cumin, only its fragrance and fragrance does not create a prohibition.

15 When barley that is terumah falls into a cistern of water, the water is permitted even if [the barley] spoils the flavor of the water, for food that imparts an undesirable flavor does not bring about a prohibition.

16 [The following law applies when] chilba that is terumah and its plant fall into a cistern of wine. If the chilba seed itself is of sufficient quantity to impart its flavor to the wine, the wine is forbidden to non-priests.

17 When there are two cups of wine: one of terumah and one of ordinary wine and they were each mixed with water and then combined, we consider it as if the ordinary wine was not present and as if the wine that was *terumah*was mixed with the water alone, for water is not of its type. If that water is sufficient to nullify the taste of the terumah wine in the mixture, the entire mixture is permitted to non-priests. If not, it is forbidden, for as we have explained, water does not nullify wine.

18 When wine that is terumah falls on produce, one may wash the fruits and they are permitted. Similarly, when oil that is terumah falls on produce, one may wash the fruits and they are permitted.

When oil [that is terumah] falls on [ordinary] wine, one should make it coagulate and the wine is then permitted to non-priests. If [oil that is terumah] mixes with brine, it should be made to coagulate, then the upper layer of the brine should be removed so that all the brine that has the taste of oil will be removed.

19 A pot in which terumah was cooked should not be used to cook ordinary produce. If it was cooked in it, it causes it to be forbidden if its flavor is recognizable. If he washes out the pot with wine or with water, it is permitted to cook in it. If he cooked [terumah] in part of the pot, it is not necessary to wash out the entire pot, only the place where it was cooked.

20 The great terumah, terumat ma'aser, challah, and the first fruits are all referred to as terumah. With regard to terumat ma'aser, [Numbers 18:26] states: "And you shall remove the terumah of G-d from it" and [ibid. 15:20] states that it should be "like the terumah of your grain heap."

With regard to challah, [ibid.] states: "You shall separate challah as terumah." And [Deuteronomy 12:17]: "You may not eat in your gates the tithes of your grain, your wine, and your oil,... and the terumah of your hand." Now there are no substances that are required to be brought [to Jerusalem to be eaten] that are not explicitly mentioned in the verse except the first fruits. Thus the phrase "the terumah of your hand" can be applied to them. Thus we see that they are [also] called terumah.

21 Therefore the laws regarding partaking of all four types of substances and mixtures of them and other substances are the same. All can be nullified in a mixture of 101 times the original substance. They are also all combined with each other. If they become impure, they should all be burnt. The laws that apply to terumat ma'aser that is demai, are the same that apply to terumat ma'aser separated from produce [from which the tithes were] definitely [not separated]. It is only that its violation is not punishable by lashes.

22 Anyone who partakes of terumah should recite the blessing for that particular food and then recite the blessing: "[Blessed are You... who has sanctified us with the holiness of Aaron and commanded us to partake of terumah." We have received the tradition and observed that people would recite this blessing even when partaking of challah separated in the Diaspora. For even partaking of sacred foods from the boundaries [of our Holy Land] is like service [in the Temple], as [Numbers 18:7] states: "I have granted you your priestly service as a gift."

Mishneh Torah, Tithes

Trans. by Eliyahu Touger, Moznaim Publishing

Chapter 1

1 After separating the great terumah, one should separate one tenth of the remaining produce and this is called the first tithe. Concerning it [Numbers 18:24] states: "For the tithes of the children of Israel that they will separate to God."

These tithes are given to Levites, males and females, as [ibid.] states: "And I gave the Levites all of the tithes of the children of Israel as an inheritance."

2 An Israelite is permitted to partake of the first tithe, and it may be eaten in a state of ritual impurity, because it is not holy. Whenever the term "holy" or "redemption" is used with regard to the tithes, the intent is the second tithe.

What is the source from which we learn that the first tithe is ordinary produce? [Ibid.:27] states: "And your terumah will be considered for you as grain from your grainheap and the fullness of the vat." Just as a grainheap and a vat [contain] ordinary produce, so, too, once terumat ma'aser has been separated from the first tithe, it is ordinary produce in all regards. For this reason, when the daughter of a Levite has been taken captive or she engaged in forbidden relations, she can be given tithes and she may partake of it. When, however, there was a report that a woman's husband died or one witness testified that he died, she married and then her husband appeared, our Sages penalized her and ruled that she is forbidden to partake of the tithes.

3 The Levites and the priests should separate the first tithe so that they can separate terumat ma'aser from it. Similarly, the priests must separate other types of terumah and tithes for themselves. Since the priests receive all types of agricultural gifts, is it possible for them to partake of the produce without these separations having been made? [Numbers 18:28] states: "And so shall you separate, also you...." "You" includes the Levites. "Also you" includes the priests.

4 We do not expropriate the tithes from the priests, as [ibid.:26] states: "When you take from the children of Israel...." Similarly, none of the presents given to the priests must be given from one priest to another priest.

Ezra penalized the Levites in his time because they did not ascend to Jerusalem with him and ordained that the first tithe should be given solely to the priests.

5 When a person partakes of his produce while it is tevel or a Levite partakes of the tithes while they are tevel, although they are liable for death at the hand of Heaven, they are not liable to make reimbursement to the owners. [This is derived from ibid.:24:] "...that they will separate to God." [Implied is that the recipients] do not have any share in them until they have been separated.

In the Diaspora, it is permitted for a person to continue eating and afterwards, separate terumah and the tithes.

6 We can separate tithes from produce in one place for produce in another place. They need not be grouped together. We do not, however, separate tithes from one species for another species, nor from produce for which we are obligated to separate tithes for produce from which we are exempt from separating, nor from produce for which we are exempt from separating tithes for produce from which such a separation is required. If one made a separation in any of the above instances, [the produce separated] is not considered as tithes.

7 Whenever we said with regard to terumah, that terumah may not be separated from one type of produce for another, tithes may not be separated from one such type of produce for another such type. And whenever we said that the separation of terumah from [one type of produce] is acceptable [after the fact], if one separated tithes from such produce, it is acceptable. Whenever produce is exempt from the obligation to have terumah separated, it is also exempt from the obligation to have tithes separated. All those individuals who may separate terumah may separate the tithes. And all those concerning whom it was said that they should not separate terumah, but if they did separate it, the separation is effective, so too, if they separate the tithes, the separation is effective. And whenever a person's separation of terumah is not effective, his separation of tithes is also not effective.

8 When a person tells a colleague: "I will tithe through your agency," he does not have to stand with him to see whether he tithed or did not tithe. If [the agent] tells a colleague: "Tithe using me as an agent," he must stand with him.

9 The obligation to tithe carobs is only Rabbinic in origin, for they are not eaten by most people. Bitter almonds, whether large or small, are exempt, for they are not considered food.

10 A tree that is planted inside a house is exempt from the obligations of the tithes, as [indicated by Deuteronomy 14:22]: "You shall certainly tithe all the produce of your crops that grow in the field." It appears to me that tithes must be separated from this produce according to Rabbinic Law, for one is required to tithe the fruit of a fig tree that stands in a courtyard if it was harvested at one time.

11 When onions [stored in a home] grew roots next to each other, even if they grew roots in the earth of a loft, they are exempt from tithes. If a landslide covered them, and they are thus open [to the skies], it is as if they have been planted in the field and one is obligated to tithe them.

12 [The following laws apply when someone is] protecting his field because of grapes and another person comes and collects the figs that remain in that field or he was guarding his field because of the zucchini and squash and another person came and gathered the grapes which were scattered in the field. When [it is known] that the owner of the field is concerned with the leftover produce, it is forbidden to take it; [doing so] is stealing. Hence, tithes and terumah must be separated from the crops. If the owner of the field is not concerned with it, it is permitted [to take it; it is not] theft. Hence, they are exempt from the tithes.

13 Only the most choice produce should be separated as tithes, as [Numbers 18:30] states: "When you separate the choice portion from it, and it will be considered for the Levites as the produce of the grainheap and the produce of the vat." Just as the Levites must separate the choicest portions of the tithes, the Israelites who separate from the grainheap and the vat separate the choicest portions.

14 We may not separate tithes by estimation. Instead, one must do so through measuring, weight, or number. One who is precise in the measurement is praiseworthy. When one gives an extra amount as the tithes, his tithes are flawed, because untithed produce is mixed with them. [The remainder of] his produce has, however, been made fit for use.

15 When a person separates a portion of the tithes, they are not considered as tithes. Instead, it is as if someone divided the grainheap. He must, however, separate from the portion set aside the tithes that are appropriate for it.

What is implied? A person had 100 se'ah. He set aside five se'ah as the tithes. [These five se'ah] are not considered as tithes. He cannot separate tithes for [these five se'ah] from another source. Instead, he should separate half a se'ah from them. It is their tithes.

16 When a person separates the [first] tithe, he should recite a blessing first, as one recites a blessing [before observing] any of the mitzvot. Similarly, he should recite a blessing [before separating] the second tithe, the tithe given to the poor, and the tithe of a tithe. He should recite a blessing for each one individually. If he made all the separations one directly after the other without speaking in between, he should include them all in one blessing, [praising God who commanded us] "to separate the terumot and the tithes."

1 A person is not obligated to tithe his produce by Scriptural Law unless he completes [the work associated with its preparation with the intent of] partaking of it himself. If, however, he completes those tasks with the intent of selling it, he is exempt according to Scriptural Law. He is, however, obligated by Rabbinic decree. [This is derived from Deuteronomy 14:22:] "And you shall certainly tithe... and you shall partake...." One is obligated only when he completes the tasks with the intent of partaking.

2 Similarly, one who purchases such produce is exempt according to Scriptural Law, [for ibid. states]: "the produce of your crops." He is, however, obligated according to Rabbinic Law.

When does the above apply? When he purchased it after the work necessary to prepare it was completed while it was in the possession of the seller. If, however, these tasks were completed while it was in the possession of the purchaser, he is obligated to tithe according to Scriptural Law.

3 Produce which is not fit to be eaten because it is too small, e.g., unripened produce and the like, is not required to be tithed until it grows and becomes food, as [implied by Leviticus 27:30 which states that we must tithe:] "From the crops of the earth, from the fruit of the trees," i.e., [there is no requirement to tithe the crops] until they grow and become fruit. Similar concepts apply with regard to grain and legumes, as [implied by Deuteronomy 14:22:] "the produce of your crops," i.e., [there is no obligation] until it becomes produce.

This refers to the "phase of tithing." Before grain and fruit reach this phase, one is permitted to eat as much as one wants from them, in any manner he desires.

4 Produce that is fit to be eaten when it is small, e.g., zucchini or cucumbers, but is left [to grow] only in order to increase its bulk, is required to be tithed while it is small, [for] they are fit to be eaten at the outset. As soon as they emerge, they are considered to have reached the "phase of tithing."

5 When is "the phase of tithing"? When the produce will reach a stage that it produces seed [that could] grow, each species according to its nature.

What is implied? For figs, it is when they become soft enough to be fit to be eaten within 24 hours after they have been harvested. For grapes and biushim, i.e., thin wild grapes, it is when their seeds can be seen from the outside. For pomegranates, it is when their seed will be crushed easily between one's fingers and produce liquid. For dates, it is when they swell like yeast.

For peaches, it is when red strands appear within them. For nuts, it is when the fruit becomes distinct from its outer shell. For sweet almonds, it is when their external shell becomes distinct. Bitter [almonds] are always exempt. For other fruits with shells, e.g., acorns, chestnuts, and pistachios, it is when the lower shell that is next to the fruit forms.

For olives, when they produce one ninth of the amount of oil that they will produce when they are entirely ripe; this is one third of their growth. For apples and esrogim, it is when they become round, for they are fit to be eaten when they are small. For berries and sumac, it is when they become red. Similarly, for every fruit that becomes red, it is when it becomes red.

For carobs, it is when black spots begin to appear. Similarly, for any fruit that becomes black, it is when spots begin to appear. For pears, small pears, quince, and thorn apples, it is when their hairs begin to fall off. Similarly, for any fruit that becomes light-colored, it is when white lines appear.

For grain, it is when it reaches a third of its growth. For chilba, it is when its seed is fit to grow if it would be planted. With regard to vegetables, we are required [to tithe] zucchini, squash, watermelon, cucumbers and the like when they are small, as we explained. Other vegetables which are not fit to be eaten until they grow large and are not required [to be tithed] until they are fit to be eaten.

When even one grape on a cluster has reached the stage when it must be tithed, because of their connection, the entire [cluster is required to be] tithed. It is as if the entire cluster reached that stage of development. [Indeed,] not only that cluster, but the entire side of the vine on which that cluster grew [is considered to have reached the stage when the tithes must be separated]. Similarly, when even one seed of a pomegranate reaches the appropriate stage, the entire [side of the tree] is considered as connected to it.

6 After produce has reached the "phase of tithing," a person should not sell it to someone who is not trusted with regard to tithes. If [a portion of] the produce ripened, he should remove that [portion] which ripened. It is then permitted to sell the remainder that has not reached the "phase of tithing."

Similarly, a person should not sell olive dregs and grape dregs to someone who is not trusted with regard to tithes to extract [oil or wine] from them, for the liquids extracted from these dregs must be tithed. Nor should he sell straw so that grain can be picked from it to someone who is not trusted, for the grain picked from the straw must be tithed.

7 [The following laws apply when a person] mixed water with wine dregs and filtered the mixture. If he mixed in three measures of water and received four measures, [the mixture is considered wine] and he must separate tithes for this extra measure from another source. He does not have to separate terumah, for when one separates terumah, he has the intent to separate terumah for the entire amount, as stated above with regard to terumah. If he received less than four measures, he is exempt, even if he received more than he mixed in and even if the mixture has the flavor of wine.

8 When a person consecrated his produce when it was attached to the ground, before they reached the "phase of tithing," and then redeemed them, and after he redeemed them, it reached that stage of development, he is obligated to tithe them. If the produce reached the "phase of tithing" while it was in the domain of the Temple treasurer and he redeemed it afterwards, he is exempt.

1 When produce has reached the "phase of tithing," it was detached [from the earth], but the work preparing it was not completed, e.g., grain that he harvested and threshed, but [the reaper] did not winnow it or straighten the grain pile, he may partake of it as a snack [without tithing] until those tasks are completed. Once those tasks are completed, it is forbidden to partake of it as a snack [without tithing].

2 When does the above apply? When one is completing the work [necessary to prepare] the produce to be sold in the market place. If, however, his intent was to bring it to his home, he may partake of it as a snack [even] after the work involving it is completed until a situation occurs which obligates the separation of tithes.

3 Six situations obligate the separation of tithes from produce: [bringing it into] a courtyard, a transaction, [subjecting it to] fire, salting it, separating terumah, and [the commencement of] the Sabbath. These situations require the separation of tithes only when the work necessary to prepare the produce has been completed.

4 What is implied? One may eat a snack from produce which he intends to bring home [without tithing], even though the work necessary to prepare it has been completed until he enters his home. Once he enters his home, the obligation to separate tithes takes effect and he is forbidden to partake of it until he tithes it.

Similarly, if he sold it, cooked it by fire, pickled it in salt, separated terumah from it, or the Sabbath commenced, he may not partake of it until he separates the tithes even though it has not reached the house.

If he brought the produce into his home before he completed the work associated with it, he may continue to snack from it. If he began to complete the work associated with its completion, he is obligated to tithe the entire amount.

What is implied? A person brought zucchini and squash home before he rubbed them [to remove the hairs on their surface]. Once he begins rubbing one of them, he is obligated to tithe all of them. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

Similarly, when one separates terumah from produce for which all the tasks necessary to prepare it have not been completed, it is permitted to snack from them with the exception of a basket of figs. If one separates terumah from them before the work associated with preparing them is finished, the obligation to tithe takes effect.

5 [The following laws apply if] fig-branches to which figs were still attached or date fronds to which dates were still attached were brought home. If children or workers brought them [to a person's home], the obligation to tithe does not yet take effect. If the owner of the home brought them, he is obligated to tithe them.

If he brought in stalks of grain to make dough, the obligation to tithe does not take effect. If he intended to eat them as kernels, it does take effect. When does the above apply? With regard to grain. With regard to legumes, the obligation to tithe does not take effect [in that instance].

6 It is permitted to be crafty and bring [grain that has been harvested] into one's home while it still has its outer shell so that one's livestock can partake of it and thus it is exempt from tithes. One may then winnow a small portion of it after it has been brought into one's home. He is thus exempt from [the obligation to separate] terumah and tithes forever, since he has not begun to complete [the tasks necessary to prepare] the entire [harvest].

7 When a person completes the task necessary to process a colleague's produce without his knowledge or he brings the produce to one of the six situations that establish an obligation to tithe without [the owner's] knowledge, [this produce] incurs the obligation to be tithed.

8 What is meant by completing the work associated with produce? For zucchini, squash, and watermelon, it is when one rubs them with his hands and removes the golden hairs upon them. If he does not rub them, it is when he makes a pile. For a watermelon, it is when he arranges them in a designated place, one watermelon next to another. If one rubs the fruit one by one, when he completed [rubbing] all that he needed, that [specific produce] is considered as if the tasks necessary to prepare it were completed. We may separate terumah from zucchini and squash even though the hairs have not been removed from it.

9 For vegetables that are [sold while] bound together, it is when they are bound together. If the vegetables are not bound together, it is when the container is full. If he does not fill the container, he may snack from the produce until he gathers all that he needs.

10 For a basket [of produce], it is when the produce will be covered by leaves, straw, and the like. If he does not cover it, it is when the container is full. If he does not fill the container, it is when he gathers all that he needs.

11 [When a person is gathering produce] in a large container, but he desires to fill only a portion of it, once he fills that portion, [the produce] must be tithed. If he intends to fill the entire container, [the produce is] not required to be tithed until he fills the entire container. If he has two containers and desires to fill both of them, [the produce is] not required to be tithed until he fills both of them.

12 When a person made a large weave of vegetables in the field, the obligation to tithe takes effect even though he intended to [undo the larger weave and] make a smaller weave for the marketplace.

Dried pomegranate seeds, raisins, and carobs, [become obligated to be tithed] when a person sets up a pile on top of his roof. Onions [become obligated] when one removes the leaves and shells that he would generally discard. If he does not remove them, [there is no obligation to tithe the onions], until one stores them in a pile.

13 Grain [becomes obligated] when one is mimareach it. What is meant by mimareach? When one straightens the surface of the grainheap with a pitchfork at the conclusion of the entire process, as one would do when he concludes all his work. If a person is not mimareach, [the obligation takes effect], when he makes a pile.

Legumes [become obligated] when one sifts them and takes them from under the sifter and partakes of them. If he does not sift them, [the obligation takes effect when] he is mimareach.

Even though he is mimareach, it is permitted to take from the scattered stalks, those on the side, and the kernels that are in the straw, and partake of them.

14 Wine [becomes obligated] when it is stored in a barrel and the peels and seeds are removed from the top of the barrel. When, however, it is in the vat and one takes out some to put it in a barrel, one may drink from it casually. Similarly, he may collect [wine] from the upper vat, from a conduit, or from any place and drink it [without tithing].

15 Oil [becomes obligated] when it descends to the vat. Even though it has descended, one may take from the rope basket, the stone [used to grind the olives], the boards or stones of the olive press. One may place [untithed] oil into cooked food in a small dish or a large pot even though [the food] is hot, because it will not cook in a secondary vessel. If [the food] was very hot, so much so that one's hand would burn, he should not put [untithed oil] into it, because it will be cooked.

16 A cake of dried figs [becomes obligated] when it is smoothed. Dried figs [become obligated] when they become crushed [into the container in which they will be stored]. If they were placed in a storage container, [they become obligated] when one smoothes out the surface of the storage container by hand. If one was crushing dried figs into a jug or into a cake at the opening of a storage container and the jug becomes broken or the storage container is opened, he should not partake of [the figs] until they are tithed.

17 When figs and grapes have been set aside [to dry], it is permitted to snack from them in the place where they were set aside. If, however, he took some from the place where they were set aside, he should not snack from them, because the tasks involved [in their preparation] have been completed, even though they have not dried out totally.

18 Carobs [become obligated] when he collects them on top of the roof to dry. He may take some down [from the roof] for fodder for his livestock. He is exempt [from tithing], because he will put back what is left over. He is thus using it as fodder as a temporary measure.

19 When a person separated the first tithe while the produce was still in stalks, it is forbidden to partake of it until terumat ma'aser is separated from it. If he partook of it, he is given stripes for rebellious conduct.
What is meant by partaking of food as a snack? If a person was peeling barley kernels and eating them, he may peel them one by one. If he peeled several and held them in his hand, he is required to tithe them. If he was crushing the shells of wheat kernels, he may sift the chaff from hand to hand and partake of them. If he sifted them into his bosom, he is required to tithe them. Needless to say, if he sifted them with a utensil, [he is required to tithe them], for this is not a temporary measure.

Similarly, one may take wine and put it into a cold cooked dish in a bowl and partake of it. One may not, by contrast, put it into a pot even if it was cold, because it is considered like a small cistern. Similarly, one may squeeze olives onto his skin [without tithing], but not into his hand. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

20 Just as it is permitted to partake of produce as a snack when the work [involved in its preparation] has not been completed, so too, it is permitted to feed such produce to animals, livestock, and fowl as one desires. Similarly, one may declare as much of this produce ownerless as he desires.

If he completed those tasks, even when the obligation to tithe was not established, he may not declare the produce ownerless, nor may he feed it to livestock, animals, and fowl in a significant manner until he tithes it. It is permitted to feed an animal tevel in an insignificant manner, even in one's home. One can feed [an animal] rolls of chilba until one bundles them as packages.

21 When a person discovers fruits on the road - even if he finds them next to an orchard of that fruit - they are exempt from the tithes. When one found dried figs, if most people already crushed their dried figs [into larger masses], he is obligated to tithe [what he found], for we assume that it came from produce for which the work involved in its preparation was completed. Similarly, if he found broken pieces of cakes of dried figs, it should be considered as if they came from produce for which the work involved in its preparation was completed.

22 When a person finds sheaves of wheat in a private domain, he is obligated to tithe them. [If he finds them] in the public domain, they are exempt. Larger sheaves are required to be tithed wherever they are found.

If one finds [bundles of] grain that have been straightened, one may separate them as terumah and tithes for other produce. One need not be concerned [that the owners separated tithes for this produce already].

[If one finds a] basket [of fruit] that is covered, he is required to tithe it. If he finds a basket [of fruit] in a place where most people take it to the marketplace, he is forbidden to snack from it and he should make the appropriate separations as if it were demai. [In a place where] most people bring it home, he may snack from it and he must certainly make the appropriate separations. If half [bring home] and half [bring to the marketplace], it is considered as demai. If he brings it home, he must certainly make the appropriate separations.

When does the above apply? With regard to a type of produce that does not have a specific phase at which the tasks associated with its preparation are completed. If, however, the produce does have a phase when the tasks associated with its preparation are completed, even though he must certainly separate tithes, he does not have to separate terumah. For we can assume that terumah was separated when those tasks were completed.

23 When there are ant holes that existed overnight next to a pile of grain that is required to be tithed, the kernels found there are required to be tithed. For it is obvious that the ants have been taking from produce that was completely prepared throughout the night.

24 When a person finds olives under an olive tree or carobs under a carob tree, he is required to tithe them, for we assume that they fell from this tree. If he found figs under a fig tree, there is a doubt whether they fell from this tree or from figs that are already tithed, because their appearance changes and they become soiled with the dust.

25 When a person consecrates produce that has been detached and redeems it before the tasks associated with its preparation are completed, one is obligated to tithe it. If [these tasks] were completed while [the crops] were in the domain of the Temple treasury and then he redeemed them, they are exempt from tithes. When a person consecrated standing grain for meal offerings, it is exempt from the tithes.

1 The obligation to tithe is not established for tevel according to Scriptural Law until one brings it into his home, as [implied by Deuteronomy 26:13]: "I removed the sacred produce from the home." [This applies] provided he brings the produce in through the gate, as [ibid.:12] states: "And you shall eat in your gates." If, however, he brought produce in from the roof or from the yard, he is exempt [from the obligation] to separate terumah and tithes.

2 It appears to me that lashes are not administered as required by Scriptural Law for eating tevel unless [the obligation to tithe] was established by bringing it into one's home as we explained according to the Oral Tradition. If, however, the obligation was established through one of the six ways that we mentioned, he is given only stripes for rebellious conduct as mandated by Rabbinic Law.

Similarly, a person who partakes of produce which he desires to bring to the market place after the tasks necessary to prepare it have been completed receives only stripes for rebellious conduct, as we explained. For a person who completes [the tasks necessary to prepare his produce] for sale is obligated to tithe only according to Rabbinic Law.

3 When a house is less than four cubits by four cubits in area, [bringing produce into it] does not establish an obligation. Similarly, [bringing produce onto] a roof does not establish an obligation even though [bringing it into] the house below would. If, however, the roof was not four cubits by four cubits in area, e.g., the house ascended on a slant, bringing [the produce] there does not absolve it from the obligation to tithe it. Instead, [the roof] is considered as part of the domain of the home.

4 Leantos, guardhouses, summer shelters - i.e., four pillars with a roof on top of them without walls, and sukkot built by workers who dwell in the vineyard and the gardens in the summer, even though they dwell in them throughout the summer and [the sukkot] contain mills and chickens do not establish an obligation to tithe. Similarly, the outer sukkot built by potters and the sukkot for the holiday [of Sukkot] during that festival do not establish an obligation. For none of these are permanent dwellings.

5 Leantos and guardhouses establish an obligation to tithe for their owners, even though they do not create such an obligation for all people. Similarly, [bringing produce into] a school or a house of study creates an obligation to tithe for a person who abides there and teaches, because they are comparable to his home. They do not create an obligation for others.

6 When a synagogue or a house of study have a dwelling, [bringing produce there] establishes [an obligation to tithe]. If not, no [such obligation] is established.

[Bringing produce to] stables and storehouses in the fields that are built to store produce does not establish an obligation to tithe. If [these structures] were also intended as dwellings, an obligation is established.

7 Just as [bringing produce into] a home establishes an obligation to tithe, so too, [bringing produce into] a courtyard establishes such an obligation. When produce is brought into a courtyard through the gate, an obligation is established even though it was not brought into the home.

8 [Into] which type of courtyard must [produce be brought] for an obligation [to tithe] to be established? Any one in which utensils are protected within, one in which a person will not be embarrassed to eat there, or one in which were a person to enter, he would be asked: "What are you looking for?" The above also applies to a courtyard which has two inhabitants or is owned by two partners when one opens it and enters and then the other comes and enters or leaves and locks it. Since they open it and lock it, [bringing produce into] it establishes an obligation to tithe.

9 A gatehouse to a courtyard, an excedra, and a porch are governed by the same laws as a courtyard. If [bringing produce into] a courtyard would establish an obligation to tithe, [bringing produce into these] establishes an obligation. If not, an obligation is not established in these instances as well.

10 When there are two courtyards, one inside the other, [bringing produce into] either of them establishes an obligation to tithe. When a potter has [two] sukkot one leading to the other, [bringing produce into] the inner sukkah establishes an obligation to tithe. [Bringing it into] the outer one does not. [Bringing produce into] a store establishes an obligation like a home does.

11 When a person transports his produce from one place to another, an obligation to tithe is not established even though he brings it into homes and courtyards while on his journey. He may snack from it until he reaches his ultimate destination. [These laws] also [apply] when he returns.

12 Traveling salesmen who journey through villages and pass from one courtyard to another may snack from their produce until they reach the home where they will spend the night.

13 When a person brings figs from a field to partake of them in a courtyard which is exempt from the obligation to tithe, but then he forgot and brought them into his home, he is permitted to take them out from the home and snack from them. Similarly, if he forget [and after taking them into his home], took them up to the roof, he may snack from them on the roof.

If he brought them to partake of them on his roof and brought them into a friend's courtyard, an obligation to tithe is established and he should not partake of them until he tithes them.

14 When a courtyard has been plowed, it is considered like a garden and one may snack in it. [This applies] provided he plowed the majority [of the courtyard]. If he sowed the majority of it, he may not snack in it. The same law applies if he planted trees in it. If he planted trees in the courtyard to make it attractive, since the field has been plowed, he may snack from those trees [without tithing].

15 When a fig tree is growing in a courtyard, one may eat figs from it one by one while exempt [from tithing]. If he gathers them together, he is obligated to tithe.

When does the above apply? When he is standing on the ground. If, however, he climbs to the top of the fig tree, he may fill his bosom with them and eat them there. For the open space of a courtyard does not create an obligation to tithe.

16 [If a fruit tree] was standing in a courtyard and leaning into a garden, one may partake of the tree while standing in the garden in his ordinary manner, as if the tree was planted in the garden. If [the tree] was planted in a garden and leaning into a courtyard, it is considered as if it was planted in the courtyard and one may only partake of them one at a time.

17 When a vine is planted in a courtyard, one should not pick an entire cluster and partake of it. Instead, one should pick the grapes one by one. Similarly, with regard to pomegranates, one should not take the entire pomegranate, but instead should divide the pomegranate while it is on the tree and partake of the seeds from it. Similarly, with regard to a watermelon, one should bend it over to the ground and partake of it there.

If one was eating a cluster [of grapes] in a garden and brought it into a courtyard, one should not continue eating until he tithes even if he departs from the courtyard.

18 When coriander is planted in a courtyard, one may pick it leaf by leaf and partake of it. If one gathers them together, he is obligated to tithe. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

Chapter 5

1 When a person purchases detached produce to partake of it, he is obligated to tithe it according to Rabbinic decree as we explained.

When is the obligation [to tithe] established? When [the purchaser] pays

[for the produce], even if he has not drawn it [into his domain]. If [a potential purchaser] was selecting and setting aside, selecting and setting aside, even if he did so the entire day and even if he made up his mind to purchase the produce, he is not obligated to tithe it. If he is a God-fearing person, from the time he made up his mind, he should tithe it. Afterwards, if he desires to return it to the seller, he may return it.

2 When a person purchases produce that is attached to the ground or purchases detached produce to send to a colleague, [an obligation to tithe] is not established and he may snack from them.

3 When a person tells a colleague: "Here is an isar and give me five figs for it," he may eat them one by one and he is exempt [from the obligation to tithe]. If [the seller] gathers them together, he is obligated to tithe them.
[If he says:] "Here is an isar for 20 figs that I will select," he may select them one by one and eat them. "...For a cluster of grapes that I will select," he may pick them individually from the tree and partake of them. "...For a pomegranate that I will select," he may remove the seeds while on the tree and partake of them. "...For a watermelon that I will select," he may bend it over to the ground and partake of it.
If he cut off the figs and gathered them together or cut off the cluster of grapes or the watermelon, he is obligated to tithe, because he purchased the produce in its detached state. If, however, he told him: "Here is an isar for these 20 figs," "...for these two clusters of grapes," "...for these two pomegranates," or "...for these two watermelons," he may harvest the produce in an ordinary manner and snack on it," for the obligation to tithe was not established, for he purchased the produce while it was attached.

4 When a person exchanges [produce] with a colleague and each have the intent of eating, an obligation has been established to tithe both lots of produce, for they have been purchased while detached. [If they are exchanged while attached, with] each one having to reap the other's crops, an obligation has not been established for either of them, for a sale does not establish an obligation [to tithe] unless the work associated with its preparation is completed as we explained.

If one purchased produce to eat in an exchange and the other purchased produce to reap in the same exchange, the one who purchased produce to eat is obligated to tithe, while the obligation to tithe has not been established for the one who purchased produce to reap.

5 When a person tells a colleague: "Go out and gather 20 figs of mine for yourself and I will fill my gut with your produce," both are exempt. This is not considered as an exchange that is comparable to a sale. If he gathers [the produce] together and partakes of it, he is liable.

6 [Giving produce as] a present does not establish an obligation to tithe as a sale does. When a common person is passing through the marketplace and saying: "Take figs," one may partake of them and one is exempt [from the obligation to tithe], for a present does not establish such an obligation.

[Different rules apply when the recipients] brings the produce home. If the majority of the people [who harvest] bring their produce home [before taking it to the marketplace], one must certainly separate the tithes. If most of the people take the produce directly to the market place, he should only make the separations as one does for demai, for perhaps he tithed it and then brought it to the marketplace.

If [the common person] said: "Take them and bring them to your homes," when one takes them home, he must tithe them as one tithes demai. If [the common person] gave him a large amount of produce - even if he told him: "Take it and eat it," - it is as if he told him, "Take it and bring it home." He may not partake of it until he makes the separations as one does for demai. Similarly, if he gave him produce that is not usually eaten uncooked or the recipient was a person of stature who would not ordinarily eat in the marketplace, he should make the separations as one does for demai.

7 If there were two [prospective recipients] and [the common person] said to one: "Take it and partake of it [here in the marketplace]," and he told the other: "Take it and bring it home," the first may partake of it and be exempt [from the obligation to tithe], while the second is obligated if he eats.

8 Similarly, if there were people sitting at the gate [of a courtyard] or in a store and [the common person] told them: "Take [this produce] and partake of it," they may partake of it and are exempt [from the obligation to tithe]. The owner of the gate or the owner of the store may not partake of it until he makes the separations as one does for demai. For it is as if [the common person] told these people: "Take it and bring it home," for [these places] are considered like their homes. As we already explained, having produce pass through a house that is not one's own does not establish [an obligation to tithe].

9 [The following rules apply when one] hires workers to perform work with him concerning produce, whether produce that has been detached or that which is attached. Since [the workers] have the right to partake of the produce with which they are working according to Scriptural Law, they may partake of it and are exempt from tithing.

[Different rules apply if the employer] agreed to a condition that allowed them to partake of produce to which the Torah did not entitle them, e.g., the worker stipulated that his son could partake of the produce with him, his son could partake of the produce as payment of his wages, or that he would be able to [continue] partaking of the produce which was harvested after the work [involved in its preparation] was completed, he is forbidden to partake of the produce until he tithes it. [The rationale is that] since he is partaking of the produce because of the condition, he is like a purchaser.

10 If [an employer] hired [a worker] to hoe around olive trees and the worker stipulated that he could partake of the olives, he may eat them one by one from the tree and he is exempt [from the obligation to tithe]. If he gathers them together, he is obligated.

11 If one hired [a worker] to hoe around onions and he stipulated that he could partake of the green onions, he can cut off leaf by leaf and partake of them [without tithing], if he gathered them together, he is obligated. If a worker stipulated that he could eat a litra of olives, he may eat them one by one [without having to tithe them]. If he gathered them together, he is obligated to tithe. [The rationale is that] since he is eating a fixed measure, he is considered as a purchaser and [in such an instance,] if the produce is gathered together, his obligation to tithe is established. If he did not make a stipulation and instead, was eating as authorized by Torah Law, he may gather together and eat as much as he desires, provided he does not dip them in salt. If he dips them in salt, he is permitted [to eat them] one by one [without tithing]. [To eat them] two by two is forbidden, for the obligation to tithe is established by dipping them in salt.

12 When a worker was performing work with lower quality figs, he should not partake of higher quality figs. If he was performing work with higher quality figs, he should not partake of lower quality figs unless he tithes them. He is permitted, however, to refrain from eating until he reaches the higher quality figs.

13 When a person takes workers out to his field to perform work for him there, if he is not required to provide them with food, they may partake of the produce of the field [when granted permission by the owner], and they are exempt from the tithes, provided the tasks associated with [the preparation of the produce] are not completed. If, however, he is required to provide them with food, they should not eat [of the produce of the field] even though they have not completed their tasks. [The rationale is that] we do not pay a debt from tevel. [Even in such a situation, the workers] should partake of the figs one by one. They may not, however, [partake of those] in a basket or in a container or those set aside.

14 When one cooks produce, boils it, or pickles it, one establishes an obligation to tithe. If, however, one smokes produce until it is prepared [to be eaten], there is a doubt [whether there is an obligation to tithe].

15 When a person buries his produce in the ground, in straw, or in fertilizer before preparing them to be eaten, the obligation to tithe them is not established.

16 When a person places wine into a cooked dish that is hot or he places oil in a pot or a baking dish when they are boiling, he establishes an obligation to tithe. If he mixes wine with hot water, he establishes an obligation to tithe. Needless to say, that if he cooks wine, even in the wine press, it is forbidden to drink from it unless he tithes it.

17 When garlic, cress, or mustard seed were crushed in the field and mixed with oil, an obligation to tithe was established. Similarly, if one squeezes a cluster [of grapes] into a cup, an obligation to tithe was established. [If he squeezes it] into a pot, an obligation was not established.

18 When a person salts produce in the field, an obligation to tithe is established. If, however, he dips olives into salt one by one and eats them, he is exempt. A person who opens olives so their fluid will flow out, is exempt. A person who removes olives from the storage vat, may dip them in salt one by one and eat them. If, however, he salted [several] and served them, he is obligated [to tithe]. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

19 [Even though] a person separates terumah from his produce in a manner that requires him to make a second separation, the obligation to tithe is established. He should not [even] snack from it until he separates terumah a second time and tithes.

20 When the work associated with the preparation of produce has been completed and nightfall arrives on Friday, the obligation to tithe takes effect. One may not partake of them even after the Sabbath until they are tithed.

21 When children hid figs for the Sabbath and forgot to tithe them, one should not partake of them Saturday night until they are tithed.

22 If there was a fig tree that was designated for one to partake of its produce on the Sabbath and one gathered a basket [of these figs], one may not partake of them until he tithes them. [This stringency was established,] because these figs are designated for the Sabbath and the Sabbath establishes an obligation to tithe.

23 If a person was eating a cluster of grapes and nightfall arrived on Friday, he should not finish eating them on the Sabbath unless he tithes them. If he sets them aside until after the Sabbath, he may finish them.

1 One may rub the surface of figs and grapes [of tevel]; this does not cause a [significant] loss. Whatever is forbidden for non-priests to partake of with regard to terumah, e.g., the seeds or the like, may not be eaten from tevel, from the tithes from which terumat ma'aser has not been separated, or from the second tithe and consecrated property that were not redeemed. Whatever non-priests may partake of with regard to terumah is also permitted to be eaten from tevel, from the tithes from which terumat ma'aser has not been separated, and from the second tithe and consecrated property that were not redeemed.

2 We may not kindle impure tevel, even during the week. Needless to say, this applies on Sabbath. [This is implied by Numbers 18:8]: "the watch of My terumah." Just as pure terumah may not be used until after it has been separated, so too, we may not benefit from impure terumah until after it was separated.

3 We may not cover tevel with earth, nor may we sow it. It is forbidden to sow even produce for which the work associated with their preparation has not been completed until it has been tithed.

When does the above apply? With regard to grains, legumes, and the like. If, however, one uproots saplings that contain fruit and replants them in another place in his field, it is permitted. It is not considered as sowing tevel, for he did not gather the fruit.

Similarly, when one uproots turnips and radishes and replants them elsewhere, if he intends to add to their bulk, it is permitted. If one plants them so that they will produce stalks so that he can take their seed, it is forbidden [to plant them without tithing], because it is like sowing wheat or barley that is tevel.

4 [The following laws apply when a person] sows a litra of produce that was separated as tithes, but terumat ma'aser had not been separated from it. If it increased and it is now 10 litra, [the entire new crop] is required to be tithed. A tenth should be separated for the [original] litra from other produce according to the appropriate reckoning.

If one separated [terumah and tithes] from a litra of onions and sowed them, one should not separate the tithes according to the reckoning of the increase, but according to the entire sum of the crop.

5 There is an unresolved doubt regarding the ruling when stalks of produce whose seed does not decompose that reached a third of their growth, were [gathered,] their stack was straightened, and he tithed them, he subsequently sowed them, and they increased in size. [One might say that] there is a Rabbinic obligation to tithe them, because they increased in size. [But one might say] that there is no obligation since the seed which continues to exist and did not decompose was tithed. [The laws governing these species] do not resemble [those that apply to] onions, because it is not common practice to sow onions.

6 [The following laws apply when one] sows tevel, whether a crop whose seed decomposes or a crop whose seed does not decompose. If it is possible for him to gather it [before it takes root in the ground], we penalize him and [require him to] gather it. [If the seed decomposes], should it grow, we do not require him to uproot [the plants]. [The growths] are considered as ordinary produce.

If the produce is of a type whose seed does not decompose, even the produce that grows from the growths - indeed, even until the third generation - is forbidden. The fourth generation is permitted. Why are the growths forbidden? Because of the terumat ma'aser and the terumah within them. These same laws apply when one sows produce separated as the tithes from which terumat ma'aser was not separated.

It is forbidden to sell tevel except when there is a necessity to do so and [then,] only to a Torah scholar. It is forbidden to send [presents] of tevel, even from one Torah scholar to another, perhaps one will rely on the other and thus cause tevel to be eaten.

7 [The following rules apply when a person] sells produce to a colleague, but then remembers that it is tevel and although he afterwards runs to pursue him to make the appropriate separations, he cannot find him. If he knows that the produce no longer exists - it was already lost or consumed - he does not have to separate tithes for it. If there is a doubt whether it exists or do not exists, he should separate tithes for it from other produce.

8 [The following rule applies when there is a dispute when] a person sells produce to a purchaser.] The seller says: "I sold them with the stipulation that they were tevel." The purchaser said: "I purchased tithed produce from you." We compel the seller to make the appropriate separations.

9 One may not pay a debt from tevel, for this resembles a sale.

10 [The following laws apply when a person's] crops were seized by the king's authorities while they were tevel. If [they were taken] because he owed this amount, he must separate the tithes for this produce. If they were taken from him by force, he does not have to separate tithes for them.

11 When a person purchases tevel from two sources, he may separate the tithes from one for the other. When a person receives a field from a Jew or from a gentile as part of a sharecropping agreement, he should make the division [of the produce] in the presence of the owner of the field and give him his share then, so that he knows that he received tevel.
[Different rules apply, however, when a person] rents a field from a Jew on the condition that he pay the owner a specific amount of produce. If he pays him with produce from the field he rented, [the renter] must separate terumah. Afterwards, he gives him the measure he stipulated he would give him and the owner of the field must separate the tithe himself. If, however, [the renter] pays the owner from the produce of another field or with another type of produce, [the renter] must first separate the tithes and then pay [the owner].

12 When a person rents a field from a gentile on the condition that he pay him a specific amount of produce, he must tithe the produce before giving it to him. This is a penalty imposed upon him so that he will not rent the field from the gentile. In this way, the field will lie fallow [before the gentile] and, of necessity, he will sell it to a Jew.

Similarly, when a person accepts his ancestral field from a gentile as a sharecropper, he was penalized and required to tithe the produce before giving the gentile his share of produce after it was tithed. [This measure was instituted] so that a person should not jump at the opportunity to receive it because it was his ancestral field. In this manner, it will remain fallow before the gentile so that he will sell it to a Jew.

13 What is meant by a chokar and what is meant by a mekabel? A chokar hires the field for a specific amount of produce - these-and-these many se'ah - whether the field produced a lot or a little. A mekabel hires the field for a percentage of its yield, half, a third, or whichever amount they agree on. A sochar is one who rents the land for [a sum of] money.

14 When two people receive a field as sharecroppers together, they inherit the field, or join as partners with regard to it, one may tell the other: "Take the wheat in this-and-this place and I will take the wheat from that-and-that place. You [take] the wine in this-and-this place and I will take the wine from that-and-that place." He should not say: "You take the wheat and I will take the barley. You take the wine and I will take the oil," for that constitutes selling tevel.

15 When a priest or a Levite purchased produce from an Israelite after the tasks [associated with their preparation] were completed, we expropriate the terumah and tithes from their possession and give them to other priests and Levites. This is a penalty imposed on them so that they will not hurry to the grainheaps and winepresses and purchase tevel to grab the presents of their priestly brethren. If, however, they purchase [the produce] before [these] tasks are completed, we do not expropriate [the presents] from their possession.

16 When a priest or Levite sold produce that was detached to an Israelite before the tasks [associated with their preparation] were completed - and certainly, if they sold the produce while it was attached - the terumah or the tithes belong to [the priest or Levite]. If they sold it after these tasks were completed, the terumah and the tithes belong to the purchaser. He must separate them and may give them to the priest or Levite of his choice.

17 When a priest or Levite receive a field from an Israelite under a sharecropping agreement, they should divide the terumah and the tithes, as they divide up the ordinary produce. The Israelite should take his portion and give it to the priest or Levite of his choice. When, however, an Israelite receives a field from a priest or a Levite under a sharecropping agreement, the terumah and/or the tithes belong to the owner of the field. The remainder of the presents should be divided.

18 When a person - whether an Israelite from a priest or Levite or a priest or Levite from an Israelite - receive olives to produce oil, they should divide the terumah and the tithes, as they divide up the ordinary produce. [The rationale is that] oil is an important [commodity].

19 When a priest sells a field to an Israelite and tells him: "[I am selling it] on the condition that the tithes from it belong to me forever," they belong to him. [The rationale is that] saying "on the condition that" is tantamount to setting aside for himself [the portion of the field] where the tithes [grow].

If the priest [who sold the land] dies, his son is like all other priests. If [the priest] told [the purchaser]: "[I am selling it] on the condition that the tithes from it belong to me and my son," [when] he dies, his son should take [the tithes]. If he sold it "...on the condition throughout the time it is in your possession," should the purchaser sell it to another person - even if he later buys it back, the priest is no longer entitled to those tithes.

20 When an Israelite received a field under a sharecropping agreement from a priest or Levite and stipulated that [the agreement is being made] "on the condition that the tithes are mine for four or five years," this is permitted. "...On the condition that they are mine forever," this is forbidden. [The rationale is that] one priest cannot make another priest.

Similarly, if a Levite owed money to an Israelite, the Israelite may not collect produce from others and set aside the tithes for himself until he repays his debt. For a Levite cannot make his creditor a Levite so that he can collect the tithes from others.

21 When an Israelite inherits tevel that was found in a grainheap whose edges had been straightened from his maternal grandfather who was a priest who in turn inherited it from his maternal grandfather who was an Israelite, [the Israelite who was the heir] may separate the tithes and keep them as his own. [The rationale is that] presents which are fit to be separated are considered as if they have already been separated although in actual fact they were not separated.

22 When a person gives his field to a gentile or to someone upon whom we cannot rely with regard to the tithes in a sharecropping arrangement, he must separate the tithes in lieu of them even though [the produce] had not reached the "phase of tithing" [when the arrangement was made].
If he entered into such an arrangement with a common person [different rules apply]. If [the arrangement began] before the crops reached the "phase of tithing," he does not have to tithe in lieu of him. [If it began] after they reached the "phase of tithing," he must tithe in lieu of him.
What must he do? He should stand over the grainheap and take [the produce that must be separated]. He need not be concerned with what they ate, for we are not responsible for their actions.

1 [The following laws apply when a person has a 100 log of wine that are tevel according to Scriptural Law. If he says: "The two lugim that I will separate are terumah; the ten are the first tithe, and the nine are the second tithe," he should not begin drinking and leave over the quantity designated as terumah and the tithes at the end. Instead, he should make the separations and then drink. We do not say that the wine he left over at the end is retroactively considered as if it was set aside in the beginning. [The rationale for this stringency is that] the obligation [to separate] terumah and the tithes is Scriptural in origin, and with regard to [matters of] Scriptural Law, we do not say that we will consider it as if a separation has been made unless it actually has been made.

2 When a person specifies that his tithes were located at the opening of a jug [of wine], he should not drink from the bottom of the barrel. If he specifies that they are at the bottom, he should not drink from the top. [The rationale is that] the liquids intermingle. If, by contrast, one specified [that the tithes for produce] were at the opening of a storage container, one may eat from the bottom. If one specified that they were located at the bottom, one may eat from the top.

3 A person can designate certain produce as the second tithe and then redeem it. [Afterwards,] he may designate that same produce as the first tithe for this batch of produce or terumat ma'aser for other produce.

4 When a person sets aside produce to use them for the separation of tithes, he may continue to separate tithes relying on this produce on the assumption that it is intact, eating and drinking [from the produce from which he intended to separate tithes] until the entire quantity that was set aside has become tithes. He then gives that to a Levite. [If later] he discovers that the produce that he set aside [for tithes] has been lost, he must show concern for all the tithes that he set aside. He should not, however, tithe [the second time] with certainty.

5 When a person lends money to a priest, a Levite, or a poor person, so that he can separate [produce] for the money [they owe] from the portions due them, he may continue to separate tithes on their behalf on the assumption that they are alive. He need not show concern that the priest or Levite died or the poor man became wealthy.

6 How should he make these separations on their behalf? He should separate terumah, the first tithe, or the tithe for the poor and give it to another person for the sake of the priest, Levite, or poor person to whom he lent money. If [the debtors] would frequently take these separations from him or if he was accustomed to give these separations to them alone, he need not give them to another person on their behalf.
After [the lender] makes these separations, he calculates the worth of the produce he separated and deducts it from the loan. [He continues doing this] until he repays the entire debt. He may sell the terumah to any priest of his choice and may partake of the tithes [himself].

7 When he calculates the worth of the produce that he set aside, he has the right to consider their value according to the lower market price. This is not considered as interest. The Sabbatical year does not remit such a debt.
If the lender desires to nullify this arrangement, he may not. But if [the borrowers] seek to do so, they may. If the owner despaired of receiving payment from them, he can no longer make these separations on their behalf. For we may not make separations because of [a debt that] was lost.
If the priest, Levite, or poor person who borrowed money dies, he cannot continue to separate on their behalf unless he receives permission from the heirs. [Moreover, even if permission is granted,] it is effective only when [the deceased] left the heirs [a tract of] land at least the size of a needle. If, however, he left them only money, permission from the heir is not effective. If he made the loan in court on the condition that he will make the separations on their behalf for this money, it is not necessary for him to receive permission from the heirs.

If the poor person became wealthy, he may no longer separate [the tithe for the poor] on his behalf. Even though he made the loan in court, [the recipient] may retain the funds in his possession.

8 When an Israelite tells a Levite: "I am in possession of a kor of tithes for you," the Levite has the right to designate that produce as terumat ma'aser for other produce even if he did not draw it into his possession. If the Israelite gives it to another Levite, the first individual has nothing more than complaints against him.

9 When a person has produce in a silo and gives a se'ah to a Leviteand a se'ah to a poor person, he should not set aside eight se'ah from the silo and partake of it unless he knows with certainty that the two se'ah of the tithes are still intact. If, however, the Levite and/or the poor person partook of them, he may set aside only an amount of grain proportionate to what remains from the two se'ah.

10 [The following laws apply when] poor people exchange the presents given them with the owner of the field, i.e., they gave him a se'ah of leket, shichachah, peah or the tithes for the poor and they took a se'ah of grain from the grain pile. [The grain] he takes from them is exempt from the tithes, even though it was prepared in the domain of the owner. [Tithes] must be separated from [the grain] they take from him even though it was given in exchange for their presents that are exempt.

11 [The following laws apply when] there are two baskets of tevel from which terumah was separated in front of a person and he says: "Let the tithes from this one be in the other one." The tithing of the first basket is effective. If he says, "Let the tithes from this one be in the other one and [the tithes for] the second one be in this one," the tithing of the first basket is effective, for he has established its tithes within the second basket. The tithing of the second basket is not effective because tithes cannot be set aside from the first basket because the obligation to tithe has already been discharged for the second basket from which the tithes from both must be separated.

12 If one says: "With regard to the tithes for these two baskets. The tithes for each one are established in the other," he has designated the tithes by name and has established the tithes within them. He therefore separates the tithes from them. He may not separate the tithes from another source.

13 How are the tithes separated [in the above situation]? One may separate the tithes for both of them from one of them or he should separate the tithes from each one of them from itself if they were of equal [size]. If one of them was larger than the other, one should separate the tithes for the larger one from the smaller one and the tithes for the smaller one from the larger one.

1 Produce from which the great terumah and terumat ma'aser have been separated are referred to as "ordinary produce." When the other tithes have been separated from it, it is universally called "ordinary produce that has been made acceptable."

2 [The following laws apply when] tevel becomes mixed together with the same species of ordinary produce that has been made acceptable in which instance, [the tevel cannot be considered insignificant] because its flavor [cannot be detected]. If he has other produce, he should separate the terumat [ma'aser] and the tithes for the tevel according to the appropriate reckoning. If he does not have other produce from which to make the separations for that tevel, the entire mixture is forbidden until he makes separations from it. When he makes these separations, he forfeits a portion from the ordinary produce that has been made acceptable that is equivalent to the terumat ma'aser that must be separated from the tevel.

3 What is implied? If 100 se'ah of tevel is mixed with 100 se'ah of ordinary produce that has been made acceptable, he should separate 101 [se'ah] from the entire mixture. Everything that he sets aside is considered as tevel. Thus 99 se'ah of ordinary produce that has been made acceptable remain. He has thus lost a se'ah [of the ordinary produce]. Similarly, if terumah had also not been separated from the tevel, he must forfeit an amount from the ordinary produce that has been made acceptable that is equivalent to the terumah and terumat ma'aser [to be separated from the tevel].

Why must he forfeit this se'ah? So that he will not say: "The 100 se'ah that I set aside are ordinary produce and the 100 that remain are tevel." Similarly, if the amount of the tevel exceeded or was less than ordinary produce, one should separate [an amount equivalent] to the tevel and [an amount] from the ordinary produce [equivalent] to the terumat ma'aser [to be separated from the tevel] or equivalent to the terumah and terumat ma'aser [to be separated] if it was tevel from which terumah was not separated.

4 Similarly, if tithes that were tevel became mixed with ordinary produce that has been made acceptable, even the slightest amount causes the mixture to be prohibited. If the person has other tithes, he should make a separation for the terumat ma'aser for the tithes that require this according to the appropriate proportion. If he does not have other tithes, he should remove the tithes and forfeit from the ordinary produce that has been made acceptable an amount equal to the terumat ma'aser in the tithes.

5 What is implied? 100 [se'ah of] tithes become mixed with 100 [se'ah of] ordinary produce that has been made acceptable. He should separate 110 se'ah from the entire mixture. Everything that he separates is considered as the tithes. The 90 [se'ah] that remain are ordinary produce as before. Similarly, if the amount of the ordinary produce exceeds or is less than that of these tithes, he should separate the tithes and from the ordinary produce, an amount equivalent to the terumat ma'aser in the tithes.

6 [The following laws apply when] tevel becomes mixed together with tithes that were tevel. If the amount of tevel was equivalent to the amount of the tithes, he must forfeit from the tevel an amount equivalent to the terumat ma'aser it contains.

What is implied? There were 100 se'ah of tevel that became mixed with 100 se'ah of tithes. He should separate 101 [se'ah]; they are considered as tithes. The 99 remaining are considered as tevel.

If there was more tevel than tithes, he should separate the tithes alone and he does not forfeit anything from the tevel. For if he would designate the terumat ma'aser of the tevel, the tithes would be meduma, a mixture of [the tithes] and the terumat ma'aser from the tithes which are separated together.

If there were more tithes than tevel, he should designate the terumat ma'aser in the tevel, setting aside the tevel and an amount equivalent to the terumat ma'aser for the tevel, i.e., one one-hundredth of the tithe. The tevel should be considered as if it is all meduma and sold to a priest with the exception of the worth of the two [portions of] terumah in it. Thus he will forfeit one hundredth of the tithes which is equivalent to the terumat ma'aser in the tevel.

What is implied? If there were 100 [se'ah] tevel with 200 [se'ah] of the tithes, he should set aside 103. The three [se'ah] are the terumat ma'aser of the 100 [se'ah] of tevel and the measure of terumat ma'aser for the 200 [se'ah of the tithes]. [This separation is necessary] so that people will not come to err if [the tithes] became mixed with an equivalent amount [of tevel]. Therefore he should leave 197 [se'ah] which will remain tithes as they were.

7 [The following laws apply when a person] has [a stack with] ten lines, each containing ten barrels of wine and [the owner] allocated one barrel of the outer line as tithes for other wine, but he does not know which outer line [he intended]. He should take two barrels from [the corners] on a diagonal, mix them, and separate [the tithes] from them.

8 If he allocated [one barrel from] the half of an outer row [as tithes], but does not know from which [outer] half a row, he should take four barrels, [one] from each of the corners. If he allocated [a barrel from] one row, but does not know which row, he should take [a barrel] from a diagonal row. If he allocated [a barrel from] half a row, but does not know which half a row, he should take [a barrel] from two diagonal rows. Thus he will be taking a barrel from each half row. He should then mix them together and separate [the tithes].

9 If he allocated one barrel as tithes but does not know which barrel it is, he should take [some wine] from each of the 100 barrels, mix it together, and separate enough for one barrel as tithes.

1 In the age of Yochanan the High Priest who served after Shimon the Just, the High Court sent emissaries who searched throughout the entire territory of Israel. They discovered that everyone was careful with regard to the great terumah and would separate it. But with regard to the first tithe, the second tithe, and the tithe for the poor, the common people among Israel would be lax and would not separate it. Therefore [the Sages] decreed that only the word of trustworthy people would be relied upon with regard to tithes. [The status of the produce of] the common people, by contrast is doubtful. We do not rely on them if they say that they separated the tithes. This is called demai.

2 They ordained that a person should separate only terumat ma'aser from the demai, for it is a transgression punishable by death and the second tithe, for there is no loss in doing so since the owner partakes of it. One need not, however, separate the first tithe or the tithe for the poor from demai because [the obligation] is doubtful and [whenever one desires] to expropriate property from a colleague, the burden of proof is on him. Therefore he tells the Levite or the poor person: "Bring proof that it is not tithed," and then take the tithes.

3 Even though one does not separate the tithe for the poor from demai, it is necessary to designate it without separating it. One says: "A tenth of what is here is the tithe for the poor. [This is done] to firmly establish [the obligation of] the second tithe. For the tithe for the poor is given in the third and sixth years instead of the second tithe given in the other years of the Sabbatical cycle.

4 When terumat ma'aser and the second tithe are separated from demai, a blessing is not recited, because [the obligation was instituted because] of a doubt. Therefore it is permitted to separate it when one is naked.

5 How should tithes be separated from demai? One should set aside an amount equivalent to the measure of terumat ma'aser, i.e., one hundredth of the entire amount, and place it next to the produce and say: "This is the tithe as is the remainder of the tithes that are adjacent to it." He then says: "This [portion] which I [first] set aside as the tithes, is terumat ma'aser for the remainder of the tithes that are adjacent to it." He then takes it and gives it to a priest. This order is required, because idealy, it is forbidden to separate terumat ma'aser before the tithes themselves. Afterwards, he should separate the second tithe.

6 It is permissible to set aside the second tithe before the first tithe [when tithing] demai. If one desires, he should say: "The second tithe of this produce is located in the northern portion - or the southern portion - of the produce and its [holiness] is transferred to this money."
Similarly, a person who purchases a loaf of bread from a baker should separate from it the amount to be separated as terumat ma'aser and as challah, and say: "The one hundredth of [the total] that is here is [part of] the tithes as well as the remainder of the tithes that are next to it. May this portion that I set aside as tithes, serve as terumat ma'aser for the remainder of the tithes that are next to it. The remainder of what I set aside that exceeds one hundredth of the total is challah and the second tithe in its northern - or southern - portion, and its [holiness] is transferred to this money." He may then partake [of the bread].

7 Similarly, if a person invites a colleague to dine with him [on the Sabbath] and [the guest] does not trust [the host] with regard to the separation of the tithes, [the guest should do the following]: On Friday, he should say: "[The produce] that I will separate tomorrow is [part of] the tithes, as is the remainder of the tithes which are adjacent to it. That portion which I [first] designated as the tithes is terumat ma'aser for the remainder which is adjacent to it. The second tithe in its northern - or southern - portion, and its [holiness] is transferred to [this] money."

[This is permitted,] because a person may make such stipulations with regard to demai even though it is not in his possession. When, however, we are certain [that the tithes have not been separated,] he may make stipulations only concerning produce that is in his possession.

8 What is implied? If, [on Friday,] he had 100 figs that were tevel in his home and he is in the house of study or in the field and he is afraid that night will fall and he will not be able to tithe the produce on the Sabbath, he should say: "The two figs that I will separate are terumah. The ten that I will separate after them are the first tithe. And the nine that I will separate after them are the second tithe." On the morrow, he makes these separations and may then partake [of the figs].

9 He must whisper inaudibly [the appropriate statements] when he is making these separations one after the other. He is not considered as making an article fit for use on the Sabbath, because he made the stipulation previously.

When such a stipulation has been made concerning tevel, it is permitted to move it on the Sabbath, [even] before the separations were made. He should focus his attention on [a portion of the produce, designating it as terumah and tithes] and partake of the remainder.

10 If a common person gave him a cup [of wine] to drink [on the Sabbath], he should say: "What I will leave in the bottom of the cup is [part of] the tithes, as is the remainder of the tithes which are adjacent to it. That portion which I [first] designated as the tithes is terumat ma'aser for the remainder which is adjacent to it. The second tithe is located at the brim of the cup and its [holiness] is transferred to the money." He may then [drink] the cup, leaving a portion equivalent to [the amount to be separated as] terumat ma'aser in the bottom of the cup.

11 Similarly, if a colleague invites him to drink on the Sabbath, he should make such a stipulation on Friday with regard to everything that he will desire to partake of at his [home].

Similarly, when a worker does not trust his employer [with regard to the tithing of the food that he is given], he should take one fig and say: "This and the nine which follow are considered as tithes for the 100 that I will eat. This one is considered as terumat ma'aser for the ten that follow. The ten that follow after that are considered as the second tithe and their [holiness] is transferred to [this] money." He then takes the fig that he set aside and gives it to the priest.

The worker should separate the money for the second tithe from his own [funds]. For it is a condition of the court that the terumat ma'aser should come from the employer and the second tithe from the worker.

12 [Our Sages] did not obligate bakers to separate the second tithe [from grain] that is demai, only terumat ma'aser. It is separated in a state of ritual purity together with the challah. The purchaser must separate the second tithe.

When does the above apply? To one who sells in his store or at the entrance to his store. If, however, he sells it to a wholesale baker or to a store adjacent to a wholesale baker, he is obligated to separate the second tithe as well.

13 [The following rules apply when] two people harvested their vineyards into a common vat, and one of them is not trusted with regard to the tithes. Even though the one who is trusted [with regard to the tithes] already tithed his own produce, when he takes his portion of the wine, he is obligated to separate tithes as one does for demai for the portion of the common person.

What is implied? If they were equal partners and one takes 200 log as his portion, he should separate one log as *terumat ma'aser*and ten log as the second tithe for the 100 log [of the common person]. [This is all that is required,] for he already separated the tithes for the produce that was definitely not tithed for half of the entire quantity in the vat. Similarly, if his share was a third or a fourth, he must separate [the tithes from the produce he takes] proportionately.

1 When a person makes a commitment to be considered trustworthy with regard to the tithes [so that] his produce will not be considered as demai, he must tithe [the produce] he eats, that which he sells, and that which he purchases, and he must not accept the hospitality of a common person.

He must make these commitments in public. When trustworthy witnesses [testify] that he made these commitments in public and that he continually observe these practices, he is considered trustworthy [and his word is accepted if] he says that his produce has been tithed.

2 Every Torah scholar is always considered trustworthy. There is no necessity to investigate his [conduct]. His children, the members of his household, his servants, and his wife, are given the same status. When a Torah scholar dies and leaves produce, even if it was gathered on the day of his death, we assume that [the appropriate separations were made].

3 When the daughter of a common person or his wife marries a chavair or the servant [of a common person] was sold to a chavair, they must accept the [above] requirements as at the outset. When the daughter of a chavair or his wife marries a common person or the servant [of a chavair] was sold to a common person, we assume that they maintain their observance until they act in a manner that arouses suspicion. A son or a servant of a chavair who would frequently visit a common person must formally accept [the above requirements]. When a son or a servant of a common person would frequently visit a chavair, as long as he is in his domain, he is considered like a chavair. When he departs, he is considered as a common person.

4 When a person himself is not considered as trustworthy, but one of his sons or servants or another member of his family is, food may be taken from him based on their statements. We do not harbor suspicions concerning the matter.

5 If a person was considered trustworthy, but his wife was not considered trustworthy, we may purchase produce from him, but we do not accept his hospitality. If his wife is trustworthy and he is not, we may accept his hospitality, but we do not purchase produce from him. May a curse be visited on one whose wife is trustworthy, but he is not.

6 A chavair should not serve as a waiter at a drinking party or a feast of a common person unless all [the food and drink] have been tithed and the appropriate separations made under his supervision. Therefore if one sees a chavair serving at a drinking party or a feast of a common person, he can operate under the presumption that the tithes and other separations have been made.

If we see such a person eating together with a common person, we cannot assume that the food served at the feast has been tithed. Perhaps the chavair is relying on the stipulations made in his heart.

7 Just as a person may eat with a common person and rely on the conditions in his heart, so too, he must make a stipulation with regard to what his son eats. [This applies] even if his son is in another place. He does not have to make a stipulation with regard to another person aside from his son even if that person was together with him at the feast.

Therefore if the son of a chavair is present at a feast with a common person, we cannot assume that the food was tithed, for perhaps [the chavair] made a stipulation for [the food] his son ate.

8 When a common person gives a meah to a chavair and tells him: "Buy me a bunch of vegetables or a cake," he may purchase it for him without any qualification and is not obligated to tithe it. If [the agent] exchanged the meah, he is obligated to tithe [the produce he purchased].

If the chavair was explicit and did not buy the produce without explanation, but instead said: "This bunch of produce that I am purchasing from you is being bought for my colleague and this bunch is being bought for myself," he is obligated to tithe [only] the produce that he took for himself. He does not have to tithe [the bunch he purchased for his colleague]. If these [two batches of produce] became intermingled, even if one measure [belonging to the chavair] becomes mixed with 100 [belonging to the common person], he must make the separations as if the entire quantity was demai. [Only] afterwards may he give the produce to the colleague who sent him to purchase them for him.

9 When five people tell one person: "Bring us five bunches of vegetables," and [the agent] brings each person one bunch individually, the chavairim among [the recipients] are required to tithe only their portions. If [the agent] brought [the entire quantity] mixed together, the chavairim among [the recipients] are required to separate tithes for the entire amount.

10 When a common person tells a chavair: "Collect figs for me from my fig tree," the chavair may snack from them and tithe them as one tithes demai.

If a chavair told a common person to gather figs for him and another chavair heard him, the latter may partake [of the figs] without tithing them. [The rationale is that] a chavair will not release produce from his domain unless the appropriate separations were made. [Thus] we can assume that [the owner] separated [terumah and the tithes for this produce] from other [produce]. Although [generally] we do not suspect that a chavair will separate terumah from produce that is not in the same place as the terumah, he may do so to prevent the common person from confronting a spiritual stumbling block.

11 It is permitted to feed demai to the poor and to guests. They must, however, be notified of such. If the poor person or the guest desire to make the appropriate separations, they should.

12 The collectors of charity collect from all people without clarifying [whether separations have been made] and they divide the donations without specifications. If one desires to make the appropriate separations, he should.

13 When a doctor who is a chavair is feeding a common person who is sick from the produce of a common person, he should place [the food] in his hand, but not in his mouth. If the demai belonged to the doctor, he should not even place it in his hand. And similarly, if he knows that it is definitely tevel, it is forbidden to place it in his hand.

1 It is forbidden to sell demai to a common person or to send demai [as a present to a common person], because one assists him in partaking of forbidden food. It can, however, be sold or sent to a Torah scholar, for a

Torah scholar will not partake of it until he tithes it or until a trustworthy person tells him that it has been tithed.

2 All of those who add to the measure when they sell in large quantities, e.g., wholesalers and grain merchants are permitted to sell and send demai [as a present]. Since they add to the measure, our Sages ordained that the purchaser or the recipient be the one who separates the tithes from the demai. When, by contrast, people measure with a small measure, since the seller is the one who profits, he should make the separations. [Hence,] he should not sell or send [produce] unless the appropriate separations have been made.

3 What is meant by a large measure? With regard to dry measure, half a se'ah; with regard to liquid measure, something that holds a dinar's worth of the said liquid.

4 Even though a person sells baskets of olives and grapes or containers of vegetables by estimation, he is forbidden to sell them as demai.

5 If one of them, [either the seller or the buyer] - whether the sale is made with a small measure or a large measure - says: "Come let us make the separations for this produce," the seller should separate terumat ma'aser and the purchaser should separate the second tithe. This is an edict of the court.

6 When a chavair and a common person inherit [the estate] of their father who was a common person, [the chavair] may say: "Take the wheat in this-and-this place and I will take the wheat in this-and-that place. Take the wine in this-and-this place and I will take the wine in this-and-that place." He should not say: "Take wheat and I will take the barley. Take the produce that is fresh and I will take what is dry," for this is considered as selling demai.

7 When a person is carrying [a load of] vegetables, his load becomes heavy for him and he desires to cast some vegetables on the road to lessen his burden, he should not cast them away until he tithes them. [This is necessary] so that it shall not create a stumbling block for the common people who consume demai.

8 When a person purchases vegetables from the market and draws them into his possession, even though he did not weigh them, measure them, or pay for them, if he changes his mind and returns them to the owner of the store, he should not return them until he tithes them.

9 [The following laws apply when a person] discovers produce on the way. If the majority [of the local populace] bring the produce to their homes, he is not required to tithe it, for the obligation to tithe has not yet taken effect. If, however, the majority bring it to sell in the marketplace, it is considered as demai. If the ratio is half and half, it is considered as demai.

10 If a person took [the produce] with the intent of partaking of it and changed his mind [and decided to] store it, he should not keep it until he tithes it, so that it will not present a stumbling block to others. If he took it originally only so that it would not perish, he can store it until he desires to partake of it, send it [as a present], or sell it. At that point, he should tithe it as demai.

11 The extremities of vegetables that are found in a garden are exempt from [the laws of] demai. Those that belong to a homeowner and found in his home are obligated [to be tithed]. Those on a dung heap - wherever it is found - are permitted.

12 When a person gives [produce] to a female inn-keeper to cook or bake for him, he must tithe what he gives her - lest it present a stumbling block to others - and what he receives from her, for she is suspect to exchange produce belonging to one person for that belonging to another. He may, by contrast, give produce to his mother-in-law - whether her daughter is his arusah or his wife - or to his neighbor to cook or bake for him and he need not show concern, neither for tithes, nor for produce of the Sabbatical year, because [these individuals] are not suspect to exchange produce.

When does the above apply? When he [also] gave her yeast for a dough and spices for a cooked dish. If he did not, we must show concern because of the tithes and because of [produce of] the Sabbatical year. Therefore in the Sabbatical year, [the bread] is forbidden, for perhaps the yeast came from produce that grew in the Sabbatical year.

13 When a person brings wheat to a miller who is a common person, he may assume that their status is unchanged. He is not suspect to exchange it [for other wheat]. If he brought them to a gentile miller, they are demai; [we suspect] that he exchanged it for the wheat of a common person. Similarly, if one entrusts [produce] to a common person for safe-keeping, it is permitted. He is not suspect to exchange the produce entrusted to him.

14 When a common person is managing a store belonging to a chavair, it is permitted [to partake of the produce]. We do not suspect that he exchanged it. [This applies] even if the chavair [only] goes in and out [of the store from time to time].

15 When produce was entrusted to a gentile for safekeeping, [the produce one receives is] considered as the gentile's produce, for we assume that he exchanged it for his own produce.

What are laws that govern it? If the tasks necessary to prepare the produce were not completed as of yet and they were completed by the Jew after he took back the produce he entrusted, he must separate the tithes as we explained. If the produce that he entrusted was tevel and the tasks necessary for its preparation were completed, he is obligated to separate the tithes, for perhaps the gentile did not exchange it. For this reason, it appears to me, that the status of the tithes he separates is doubtful.

If he entrusted ordinary produce from which the required separations were made, he is not obligated to separate anything, for even if the gentile exchanged [it for his own], it is exempt. As we explained in Hilchot Terumot, [the obligation to tithe] is on "your grain," and not the grain of a gentile.

1 When a person purchases produce from a person upon whom we do not rely with regard to the tithes and forgot to tithe it before the commencement of the Sabbath or a festival - upon which he may not tithe it - he should ask that person regarding their status. If he tells him that it is tithed, he may rely on his word on [that] Sabbath.
Similarly, if another person upon whom we cannot rely tells him that it was tithed, he may partake of it because of his word on that Sabbath. [This applies] even if he possesses other produce of that type from which the separations have been made. [The rationale is that] the awe of Sabbath affects the common people and they will not violate a transgression on that day.

2 Even though one relies on the word of a common person to eat on the Sabbath, he should not partake of that produce after the conclusion of the Sabbath until he separates the tithes as appropriate for demai for the entire amount, what he ate on the Sabbath and what remains. For the leniency [to] trust him was granted only out of necessity for that Sabbath.
If the Sabbath and a festival followed in succession, if one asked [a common person concerning produce] on one, he may partake of it on the other, because he did not have the opportunity to tithe in the interim. Similar laws apply with regard to the two days [for each festival celebrated] in the Diaspora.

3 When a person takes an oath that a colleague partake of his hospitality on the Sabbath, but [the guest] does not trust [the host] with regard to tithes, he may ask him and eat based on his statements the first Sabbath. On the second Sabbath, even though he took an oath not to benefit from him unless he accepts his hospitality, he should not eat until he tithes as one does for demai.

4 When we see a person who is not trustworthy [with regard to the separation of tithes] separate terumat ma'aser from produce belonging to him that is demai and we saw that it later fell back in, whether to that [store of produce] or another and he said: "I separated it," we accept his word - even during the week - and may partake of the produce on that basis. Just as the common people are in dread of the Sabbath, so too, they are in dread of dimua, and they are not suspect to cause others to partake of such produce.

5 When we see that a person who is not trustworthy separates the first tithes from such produce and he says that he separated the second tithes, his word is accepted. If he separated the second tithe in our presence and said that he separated the first tithe, his word is not accepted, because the second tithe belongs to him. [Thus] one who is trusted with regard to the second tithe is not trusted with regard to the first, but one who is trusted with regard to the first is trusted with regard to the second.

Accordingly, when a person who is not trusted brings produce from his home and says: "This is the first tithe," his word is accepted and there is no need to separate terumot and tithes from [the produce separated]. If he says: "This is the second tithe," his word is not accepted. [The produce separated] is considered as demai and we must separate terumat ma'aser from it. It appears to me that he must redeem the entire amount.

6 When one tells a person whose word is not accepted with regard to the tithes: "Purchase [produce] for me from someone who tithes." And that person went and brought him produce, his word is not accepted. If he told him: "Purchase [produce] for me from so-and-so," the other person's word is accepted if he says that he purchased it from him, for he will fear [to lie], lest [the principal] ask that person. If he went to purchase [the produce] from the person who was named, but said: "I could not find him, so I purchased it for you from another person who is trustworthy," his word is not accepted.

7 [The following rules apply when a person] enters a city where he does not know anyone and asks: "Who is trustworthy? Who tithes?" If someone answers: "I am," his word is not accepted. If he says: "So-and-so," his word is accepted and [the wayfarer] may purchase [produce] from that person and eat on that basis. If [the wayfarer] went and purchased from that person and asked him: "Who here sells vintage wine?" and the person answers: "The one who sent you," his word is accepted even though it appears that they are in collusion.

8 When does the above apply? When [the wayfarer] is not familiar with any person in that place. If, however, he is familiar with people there, he should purchase only from a person [with an established reputation] for observance. If he stays in that place for 30 days, even if he is not familiar with anyone there, he should purchase produce only from an expert.

9 These leniencies were granted only with regard to terumot and the tithes, but with regard to produce of the Sabbatical year and questions of ritual purity, one should purchase only from a person [with an established reputation] for observance.

10 When donkey-drivers enter a city and one says: "The appropriate separations have not been made from my produce, but they have been made from my colleague's produce," his word is not accepted. [We fear that] perhaps they are colluding in deception.

11 When a person sells produce in Syria and says that it comes from Eretz Yisrael, the purchaser is required to tithe it. If he says that it has been tithed, his word is accepted. [The rationale is that] the same person whose words aroused our suspicion also allayed it.

If he says: "They are mine," [the purchaser] is obligated to tithe it. If he says that it has been tithed, his word is accepted. [The rationale is that] the same statement that aroused our suspicion also allayed it. If it is known that [the seller] owns land in Syria and most [of the produce] he sells is from his own field, one who purchases from him is obligated to tithe, for we assume that he brought the produce from his own field.

12 When poor people say: "This produce is from leket, shichachah, and pe'ah, their word is accepted as long as there are granaries in which leket, shichachah, and pe'ah can be found and provided [a poor person] is close enough to the granary so that he can go [to it] and return on the same day.

If they said: "They are from the tithes given to the poor," their word is accepted throughout those years. The word of these individuals is accepted only with regard to objects which people would ordinarily give [to the poor].

13 What is implied? [Poor people say:] "This wheat is from leket, shichachah, and pe'ah," their word is accepted. [If they say:] "This flour from leket, shichachah, and pe'ah," their word is not accepted. Needless to say, their word is not accepted when they say that bread comes from presents to the poor. Instead, [such articles] should be tithed as demai is.

14 Similarly, their word is accepted with regard to kernels of rice [while in their husks]. Their word is not accepted, however, with regard to husked kernels or cooked ones. Their word is accepted with regard to beans [in their kernels]. Their word is not accepted, however, with regard to raw, husked beans or cooked beans.

Their word is accepted when they say that oil was from the tithe for the poor. Their word is not accepted, however, if they say it comes from leftover olives. Their word is accepted with regard to raw vegetables, but not with regard to cooked vegetables unless we are speaking about a small quantity. For it is customary for homeowners to give a poor person some vegetables from their pot. And since he can say: "A homeowner gave it to me," he can say: "I cooked it from the presents given me."

15 Similarly, the word of a Levite who says: "This produce is from the first tithe from which terumah was separated" is always accepted with regard to terumat ma'aser, just as the word of an Israelite is always accepted with regard to the great terumah. [The Levite's word] is not accepted, however, with regard to exempting [the grain] from the second tithe.

16 All of the above applies with regard to a common person who is neither suspect [to violate these prohibitions], nor trustworthy [in their observance]. If, however, someone is suspected of selling terumah as ordinary produce, it is forbidden to purchase anything from him that has a connection to terumah and the tithes. Even the intestines of fish [may not be purchased from him] because oil is mixed with them. It is, however, only forbidden to purchase the produce that is being sold by such a person at that time. It is, by contrast, permitted to purchase from his storehouse, because he will fear to mix terumah into his stores [of produce], lest the matter become known and he lose everything.
Similarly, it is forbidden to purchase anything that has a connection to tithes from a person who is suspect of selling the second tithe as ordinary produce. All of this is a penalty [imposed] by Rabbinic decree.

17 When a person who is suspect to transgress attests [to the tithes being separated from produce] belonging to another person, his word is accepted. [The rationale is that we operate] under the presumption that a person will not sin without receiving any benefit. Needless to say, this applies with regard to a common person. Therefore, if a common person says: "[This produce] is tevel and this is terumah. This is definitely untithed and this is demai," his word is accepted, even with regard to his own produce. If he said: "The required separations have been made from this produce," his word is accepted with regard to the produce of others provided it does not appear that they are acting in collusion, as we explained.

18 When a person sells produce to a colleague and, after the produce leaves his hand, he tells the purchaser: "The produce I sold you is tevel. The meat is meat from a firstborn animal. And the wine is wine that was poured as a libation to a false deity. The letter of the law dictates that the seller's word should not be accepted, even if he is a chavair. A person who is eager should be stringent with himself. If he accepts his word, [his conduct] is praiseworthy, even if [the seller] is a common person.

1 Fruits that we can assume to be ownerless: e.g., wild figs, brush berries, thorn apples, white figs, other species of wild figs, anise, dates that fall of the tree before they have swelled, capers, coriander, and the like are free from the stringency of demai. One who purchases them from a common person does not have to separate terumat ma'aser or the second tithe from them for we assume that they grew ownerless. Even if a common person told him that they have not been tithed, they are exempt from the tithes until it is known that they grew from produce that was guarded.

2 Produce that ripens first and last in a valley are exempt from the obligations of demai. Similar produce in a garden is liable, because it is watched.

What is meant by produce that ripens first? All the produce that ripens before [the owner] employs a guard for the valley to protect his produce.

What is meant by produce that ripens last? The produce that remains after the reapers have folded away their nets in the field and left them without a guard. Similarly, vinegar made from wine dregs is exempt from the obligations of demai.

3 When decrees were enacted concerning demai, they were enacted only with regard to produce from the land that was inhabited by the Jews who returned from Babylonia, i.e., from Kziv inward. Kziv itself is considered as outside these boundaries. All produce from Kziv and further are exempt from the obligations of demai for we operate under the assumption that the produce came from the place where it is found.

4 When we know that produce was grown in the land that was inhabited by the Jews who ascended from Babylonia, the laws of demai apply with regard to it even though it is presently found in Syria or in the land that was inhabited only by the Jews who ascended from Egypt. [Thus] terumat ma'aser and the second tithe must be separated from it.

Therefore a fat fig whose species is found only in the land inhabited by the Jews who ascended from Babylon - and similarly, large dates, straight carobs, rice that is exceedingly white, and oversized cumin - must be tithed like demai in the entirety of Eretz Yisrael and in Syria. Similar laws apply with regard to all produce that is comparable to these species.

5 When donkey-drivers bring produce to Tyre, the laws governing demai apply to it, for we assume that it came from the nearby land inhabited by the Jews who ascended from Babylonia. We do not harbor any suspicions with regard to rice. Instead, all the rice that is found in the Diaspora that neighbors the land which was inhabited by the Jews who ascended from Babylonia is exempt from demai unless it was obvious that it grew [only in Eretz Yisrael] as we explained.

6 When a person purchases [produce] from the owners of storehouses in Tyre, he is exempt from [the obligations of] demai. We do not say that they stored produce from Eretz Yisrael. Similarly, if one donkey enters Tyre laden with produce, it is exempt from [the obligations of] demai, for we assume that [the produce comes] from the fields around the city.

7 When a person purchases [produce] from the owners of storehouses in Tzidon, he is obligated in [the laws of] demai, because it is closer to Eretz Yisrael than Tyre and we operate under the assumption that they store produce from the land inhabited by the Jews who ascended from Babylonia. If, however, one purchases [produce] from donkey-drivers in Tzidon, it is exempt from [the obligations of] demai, for we assume that they are bringing [the produce] from the Diaspora.

8 [The following rules apply when a person] purchases [produce] from a gentile in the land inhabited by the Jews who ascended from Babylonia. If the gentile was a merchant who purchases produce from Jews, the produce is [considered as] demai. Therefore at the outset, when the majority of Eretz Yisrael was in the hands of Jews, when a person purchased produce from a gentile merchant, he would separate tithes as one does for demai just like one does when [purchasing] from a [Jewish] common person.

9 Who is a merchant? One who brings [produce to the market] two or three times. If, however, he brings once - even if he brings three loads at once, or even if he, his son, and his servant each brings loads - he is not presumed to be a merchant.

10 When [our Sages] issued a decree concerning demai, the decree did not apply to produce from the Diaspora that was brought into Eretz Yisrael.

11 When the majority of the produce [in a mixture] is from Eretz Yisrael and not from the Diaspora, [the laws of] demai apply. If the majority of the mixture is produce from the Diaspora, it is exempt from demai. [This law applies] also to species that we can presume that most frequently come from the Diaspora, e.g., nuts and plums.

12 [When there was a doubt whether] produce came from the Diaspora or not, our Sages [maintained that the ruling] is not dependent on the appearance [of the produce], its flavor, or its fragrance, but rather where the majority [of produce in the marketplace originated]. If produce [from the Diaspora] constitutes the majority, it is permitted. If not, it is forbidden.

What is implied? When there is a majority [of produce from the Diaspora] in a city, but not in its outlying areas, or in the outlying areas and not in the city, in the mountain, but not in the valley, in the valley, but not in the mountain, for a storekeeper, but not for a private homeowner, for a private homeowner and not for a storekeeper, for those where [produce from the Diaspora] is the majority, they are permitted. For those where it is not in the majority, they are obligated [to heed the restrictions of] demai.

13 If, at first, there was a majority of produce from the Diaspora in the market place and then, that quantity was reduced, the market place returns to its original status, and one who purchases [produce] is obligated in [the restrictions of] demai.

14 At the time the decree concerning demai was issued, it was not applied in the following situations. All of the [following] instances are exempt from the obligations of demai: One who purchases: produce for seed or as animal fodder, flour for the processing of hides or for a compress or a bandage, oil to kindle a lamp or to apply to utensils, wine for an eye ointment. [This ruling also applies to] challah separated by a common person, a mixture of terumah and ordinary produce, produce purchased with money from the second tithes, flour left over from a meal offering, and produce added to the bikkurim offerings. If a common person tells him that the appropriate separations have been made, there is no obligation to tithe it.

15 When a person purchases produce to eat and changed his mind and thought to use it as animal fodder, he should not sell them to a gentile or feed them to an animal - even an animal belonging to others - until he makes the separations associated with demai.

16 Fragrant oil is exempt from [the obligations of] demai for we assume it will not be eaten. When a comber of wool purchases oil to put it in the wool, it is exempt from [the obligations of] demai, because it is absorbed by the wool. When, however, a weaver purchases oil to apply between his fingers, it is obligated in [the laws of] demai. The rationale is that it is absorbed in his body and the application of oil is considered as drinking in all instances.

17 When a gentile asks a Jew to place oil on his wound, he is forbidden to use oil from which he is certain the appropriate separations have not been made. He is, however, permitted to use demai for this purpose. If a gentile places oil on a tablet to twist around, after he arises, it is permitted for a Jew to sit on it afterwards.

18 When oil that is demai falls on a person's flesh, he may rub it without concern. When a person purchases wine for fishbrine or a mixture of wine and water or legumes to crush and mix with honey, he is obligated in the restrictions of demai. If, however, he purchased fishbrine that contains wine, a mixture of wine and oil, or a mixture of crushed legumes and honey, he is exempt from the restrictions of demai, for [our Sages] did not apply their decree to a mixture of demai and other substances. If the entity that was demai that became mixed with other substances was something like spices or yeast, since its flavor is evident, the restrictions involving demai must be observed for the entire mixture.

19 In all those situations where one is exempt from demai because [our Sages] did not apply their decree in these instances, if one corrected [the produce as one does] demai, separating terumat ma'aser and the second tithe, his actions are considered of consequence. If, however, he sought to correct [produce that is] demai like one does produce from which we are certain that no separations were made, separating the great terumah and the tithes from it or he sought to correct produce from which we are certain that no separations were made by making separations like one does demai, his deeds are of no consequence.

20 [The following laws apply when] all [of the individuals in] a town sell produce that is definitely [tevel], one person sells demai , and one purchases [produce] from a person without knowing from whom he purchased. How should he correct the produce? He should separate terumah and terumat ma'aser and give it to the priest. And then he should separate the second tithe and it is considered as the second tithe of demai.

21 Similar [concepts apply] if there were two containers [of produce] before a person: one containing tevel and one containing produce from which the separations were made. If one of them is lost, one must separate terumah and terumat ma'aser from the other one and give it to any priest he desires. And he should separate the second tithe and it is considered as the second tithe of demai.

1 When a person purchases [produce] from a wholesaler and then purchases [produce] from him a second time, he should not separate tithes from one batch for another. [This applies] even if they are of one species, and even from one container, and even if he himself recognized the barrel [from which the produce was taken]. [The rationale is that] a wholesaler purchases from many different people and sells [it]. Perhaps the produce he first sold was from a common person whose produce is demai and the batch he sold later was from a chavair who made the appropriate separations. As we already explained, we do not separate tithes from produce that is obligated to be tithed for produce that is exempt or from produce that is exempt for produce that is obligated. If the wholesaler said that [both batches] are from one person, we rely on his word.

2 When [a wholesaler] sells hops or vegetables and they are being brought and collected before him, a purchaser should tithe each bunch of hops, each bundle [of vegetables], and each date individually.

3 When a person purchases [produce] from a private individual and then purchases [the same species] from him a second time, he may separate the tithes from one batch for the other. [This applies] even when he purchases [produce] from two containers, and even from two cities. [The rationale is that] we operate under the presumption that a private person sells only his own produce.

4 [Different rules apply when] a private person sells vegetables in the market place. When [produce] is brought to him from his gardens, [a purchaser] may tithe from one batch for the entire quantity. If, however, he is also brought [produce] from other gardens, should one purchase a batch from him and then purchase a second batch, he should not tithe from one for the other.

5 When a person purchases bread from a baker, he should not tithe from the warm bread for the cool bread, for one might say that the wheat [used for] yesterday's [bread] was from one person and that [used] for today's is from another.

6 When a person purchases [bread] from a bakery he may tithe from one loaf for all the others even if [the loaves] are from different molds. For a baker who sells to a bakery bakes his dough in different molds. If, however, one purchases [bread] from a distributor, one should tithe each mold individually, for a distributor purchases from two [or more] bakers.

7 When nine distributors purchase [bread] from ten bakers, since one of them purchases from two [bakers], anyone who purchases [bread] from one of the nine must tithe each mold individually.

8 When a person purchases [bread] from a poor person and similarly, if a poor person was given slices of bread or slices of a cake of dried figs, he should tithe each one individually. For dates and dried figs, he should group the entire quantity together and tithe them.
When does the above apply? When he was given a large present. If he was given a small present, he should tithe each present individually.

9 If a person ground a loaf of bread [into] crumbs or ground dried figs and made them into a cake, he should separate tithes for the entire quantity.

10 When workers or guests were reclining and eating and they left over slices [of bread], one should tithe each one individually.

Mishneh Torah, Second Tithes and Fourth Year's Fruit

1 After separating the first tithe every year, we separate the second tithe,as [Deuteronomy 14:22] states: "You shall certainly tithe the produce of your crops." In the third and sixth years [of the seven year agricultural cycle], we separate the tithe for the poor instead of the second tithe, as we explained.

2 The first of Tishrei is the beginning of the year with regard to the reckoning of the tithes for grain, legumes, and vegetables. Whenever the term Rosh HaShanah is used [with regard to crops], the intent is the first of Tishrei. The fifteenth of Shvat is the beginning of the year with regard to reckoning the tithes for fruit-trees.

What is implied? If grain or legumes reach "the phase of tithing" before Rosh HaShanah of the third year, the second tithe should be separated from them even though they became fully developed and were gathered in the third year. If, however, they did not reach "the phase of tithing" until after Rosh HaShanah of the third year, the tithe for the poor should be separated from them. Similarly, if fruit from trees reaches "the phase of tithing" before the fifteenth of Shvat in the third year, it should be tithed according to the previous year and the second tithe should be separated from it even though it became fully developed and was gathered at the end of the third year. Similarly, if it reaches "the phase of tithing" before the fifteenth of Shvat in the fourth year, the tithe for the poor should be separated from it even though it became fully developed and was gathered at the end of the fourth year. If it reaches "the phase of tithing" after the fifteenth of Shvat, it should be tithed like the produce of the coming year.

3 Even though the fruit of carob trees begin to ripen before the fifteenth of Shvat, they should be tithed according to the coming year, since [the obligation to] tithe them is of Rabbinic origin.

It appears to me that this applies only with regard to the carobs that grow in Tzalmona or other similar species that are not fit to be eaten by most people. [Hence,] the obligation to partake of them is Rabbinic in origin. It appears to me that other carobs are similar to the rest of the fruit of the trees.

4 Vegetables should be tithed according to the year when they are harvested. What is implied? If they are harvested on the day of Rosh HaShanah of the third year, the tithe for the poor should be separated from them even though they reached "the phase of tithing" and [indeed,] fully matured in the second year. If they were harvested in the fourth year, the second tithe should be separated from them.

5 Similarly, among fruit from trees, only an esrog is like a vegetable, [i.e., the laws governing it] whether for tithes or the Sabbatical year are dependent on when it is harvested.

What is implied? If it was harvested in the third year after the fifteenth of Shvat, the tithe for the poor should be separated from it even though its growth was completed in the second year. Similarly, if it was gathered in the fourth year before the fifteenth of Shvat, the tithe for the poor should be separated from it. If it was harvested in the fourth year after the fifteenth of Shvat, the second tithe should be separated from it.

6 Although the laws governing an esrog depend on when it was reaped, when an esrog that grew in the sixth year entered the seventh year, tithes must be separated from it. [This applies] even though it was only an olive size [at the beginning of the Sabbatical year] and became the size of a loaf of bread [during that year].

7 We apply both the stringencies that apply to trees and those that apply to vegetables to caper berries. Thus if they grew from the second year and then they entered into the third year and were harvested before the fifteenth of Shvat, the first tithe should be separated. Afterwards, another tithe should be separated. Afterwards, it should be redeemed and then given to the poor. The proceeds of the redemption [should be used to purchase food that] is eaten according to the laws of the second tithe. Thus it is as if he separated both the second tithe and the tithe for the poor.

8 With regard to rice, millet, poppy seed, and sesame seeds, even if the plants took root before Rosh HaShanah, we are concerned only with the completion of [the maturity of] the fruit and thus the tithes are separated as is the produce of the coming year. Similarly, with regard to Egyptian beans, even though a portion of the crop took root before Rosh HaShanah and a portion afterwards, he should gather the entire crop together and separate terumah and tithes from the entire crop as one. For everything depends on the produce reaching maturity.

9 When one withheld water from onions that do not produce sprouts for 30 days or when one withheld water from onions that are irrigated from three periods before Rosh HaShanah, they should be tithed as produce of the previous year. If water was withheld from them for less than this - and thus they began to dry up before Rosh HaShanah - they should be tithed like produce of the coming year.

10 [The following rules apply when] Egyptian beans reached a third of their growth before Rosh HaShanah. If they were sown to produce seed, they should be tithed as produce of the previous year. If they were sown to produce vegetables, they should be tithed as produce of the coming year. If they were sown to produce seed and vegetables or they were sown to produce seed and then [the owner changed his mind and] thought to use them for vegetables [as well], he should tithe from the seeds for the vegetables and from the vegetables as seeds.

[Different rules apply if the beans] did not reach one third of their growth before Rosh HaShanah. If they were sown to produce seed, they should be tithed as produce of the previous year, but the vegetables that grow should be tithed as they are harvested, provided they are harvested before Rosh HaShanah. If they were harvested after Rosh HaShanah, both the vegetables and the seeds should be tithed as produce of the coming year.

If they were sown to produce seed and then [the owner changed his mind and] thought to use them for vegetables [only], the ruling follows his thought. If they were sown to produce vegetables and then [the owner changed his mind and] thought to use them for seed, the thought to use it as seed has no effect on the ruling unless he withholds water from it for three periods when [the plants] would be ordinarily be watered, and [then,] only when [the plants] reached a third of their growth before Rosh HaShanah.

[They are, however, governed by different rules] if they did not reach a third of their growth before Rosh HaShanah even though he withheld water from it for three periods when [the plants] would be ordinarily be watered. If he sowed it for the purpose of seed and the entire crop grew into fully grown plants before Rosh HaShanah, the seed is tithed as produce of the previous year and the vegetables are tithed according to when they are harvested. If some of the plants reached their full growth and some did not, to this situation, we apply our Sages' statement: "He should gather the entire crop together." [Thus he should separate tithes from the entire crop as one,] separating tithes from the seed for the vegetables and from the vegetables as seed.

11 When produce from the second year becomes mixed with produce from the third year or produce from the third year becomes mixed with that of the fourth year, we follow the majority. If it is half and half, we separate the second tithe from the entire quantity, but not the tithe for the poor. [The rationale is that] the second tithe is a more severe obligation, because it is sacred, while the tithe for the poor is ordinary produce. Similarly, when there is a doubt whether produce is from the second year or from the third year, the second tithe should be separated from it.

12 Whenever [produce] is exempt from the first tithe, it is also exempt from the second tithe and the tithe for the poor. Whenever produce is obligated in the first tithe, it is also obligated in these two. All of the individuals who may separate terumah may also separate [these] tithes and those who are not entitled to separate terumah may not separate these tithes. When any of the individuals with regard to whom it is said that [they should not separate terumah,] but if they separate terumah, the separation is effective separate these tithes, their separation is effective. When any of the individuals with regard to whom it is said that their separation of terumah is ineffective separate these tithes, their separation is ineffective.

13 When a person separated the first tithe from produce before the obligation to tithe was established, he may snack from it before separating the second tithe. For [separating] the first [tithe] does not create an obligation to separate the second. If, however, an obligation to tithe was established, it is forbidden to snack from it until he separates the second tithe or the tithe for the poor even though he has already separated the first tithe.

14 Since the second tithe must be brought [to Jerusalem], it should not be brought from the Diaspora, like the firstborn of animals. For this reason, our Sages did not obligate the separation of the second tithe in Syria.
It appears to me that the second tithe that is separated in Babylonia and in Egypt should be redeemed and the proceeds taken to Jerusalem. Similarly, it appears to me that the obligation to separate the second tithe in these places was established only so that there would be an obligation to separate the tithe for the poor, so that the poor of the Jewish people could rely on it.

1 The second tithe should be eaten by its owners within the walls of Jerusalem, as [Deuteronomy 14:23] states: "And you shall eat before God, your Lord, in the place He chooses to cause His name to dwell."
It must be observed whether the Temple is standing or it is not standing. Nevertheless, we partake of it only while the Temple is standing, for [the verse states]: "the tithe of your grain, your wine, your oil, and the firstborn of your cattle or your sheep." According to the Oral Tradition, it was taught: Just as a firstborn is not eaten except while the Temple is standing, so too, the second tithe is not eaten except when the Temple is standing.

2 It is pious behavior to redeem the second tithe for its full value in the same manner as it should be redeemed while the Temple is standing. Our Sages, [however,] ruled that, in the present age, if one desires, he may redeem a maneh's worth of produce for a p'rutah as an initial and preferable measure, [for this produce] need not be considered more stringently than consecrated property. That p'rutah should be discarded in the Mediterranean Sea.

3 Similarly, if one transferred the holiness of a maneh's worth of produce that is the second tithe for a p'rutah's worth of other produce, the holiness is transferred. He should then burn the produce to which he transferred the holiness so that it will not present an obstacle to others, [following the same procedure] as the redemption of neta rivai'i in the present age, as we explained in Hilchot Ma'achalot Assurot.

4 Just as we do not partake of the second tithe in the present era in Jerusalem, so too, we do not redeem it there, nor transfer its holiness, or sell it. If [produce which is the second tithe] is brought into Jerusalem in the present era, it should not be removed from there. Instead, we leave it there until it rots. Similarly, if one transgressed and removed it from there, he should leave it until it rots.

For this reason, we do not separate the second tithe in the present era in Jerusalem. Instead, we remove the produce from the city while it is tevel and redeem it. If it was separated there in the present era, it should be left to rot.

5 Anyone who eats an olive-sized portion of [produce from] the second tithe or who drinks a revi'it of wine [from such produce] outside the walls of Jerusalem is liable for lashes, as [Deuteronomy 12:17] states: "In your gates, you may not partake of the tithe of your grain, your wine, and your oil."

He is liable for lashes for each one individually. Therefore if he partakes of the three outside the walls [of Jerusalem], he is liable for three sets of lashes, for it is stated: And you shall eat before God in the place He chooses to cause His name to dwell."

It must be observed whether the Temple is standing or it is not standing. Nevertheless, we partake of it only while the Temple is standing, for [the Torah states]: "And you shall eat before God... the tithe of your grain, your wine, your oil," and "You may not partake of the tithe of your grain, your wine, and your oil." Why does [the Torah] mention them individually instead of saying: "Do not partake of them in your gates?" To make one liable for each one individually.

6 According to Scriptural Law, one is not liable for lashes unless he partakes of produce [from the second tithe] after it had entered the walls of Jerusalem [and was removed], as it is written: "You may not partake... in your gates" and "And you shall eat before God." [Implied is that] since the produce enters the place where it should be eaten and then it was eaten outside [that place], one is liable for lashes. If, however, one ate such produce before it entered Jerusalem, he should be given stripes for rebellious conduct.

7 [The following rules apply if] a portion of [produce from the second] tithe is inside [Jerusalem] and a portion is outside. One who eats from the portion that has not entered [the city] should be given stripes for rebellious conduct. If one eats the portion that entered outside [the city], he is liable for lashes.

8 We do not redeem the second tithe in Jerusalem unless it became impure,

9 Once produce from the second tithe - even if it is demai - is brought into Jerusalem, it is forbidden to remove it from there, for it has already been taken in by [the city's] barriers. Similar concepts apply with regard to produce purchased with money [from the redemption of] the second tithe, as [implied by] the verse: "And you shall eat before God your Lord." If a person transgressed and took [such produce] out of Jerusalem or it was taken out inadvertently, it should be returned and eaten in Jerusalem. [The concept that produce from the second tithe that was brought into Jerusalem is] taken in by its partitions is a Rabbinic decree. Even produce from [the redemption of] the second tithe whose fifth is not worth a p'rutah which is [observed] by virtue of Rabbinic decree [alone] is taken in by [the city's] partitions and it is forbidden to remove it. Money from [the redemption of] the second tithe, by contrast, may be brought into Jerusalem and then removed.

10 When produce for which the tasks involved in its preparation have been completed is taken through Jerusalem and then removed, [its owner] cannot separate tithes from it from other produce which has not been brought into Jerusalem yet. Instead, the second tithe from this produce should be [separated,] and returned and eaten in Jerusalem. It cannot be redeemed outside the city. Even if one designates the entire quantity of produce which was removed as the second tithe for produce that was not yet brought [to Jerusalem], it must be returned and eaten in [that city]. This is a stringency associated with the walls of Jerusalem. Once [produce] is taken in by them, it has been taken in.

11 When produce for which the tasks involved in its preparation have not been completed, e.g., baskets of grapes that are being taking to the vat or baskets of figs that are being taken to dry, is taken through Jerusalem and then removed, it is permitted to redeem the second tithe from them outside Jerusalem. Similarly, the second tithe from produce that is demai may be redeemed outside [of Jerusalem] even though the tasks involved in its preparation have been completed and it passed through the city.

12 [The following laws apply when] produce from the second tithe which became impure in Jerusalem was redeemed. If it became impure through contact with a secondary source of impurity, it is forbidden to remove it. [Instead,] it should be eaten within [the city]. If it became impure as a result of contact with a primary source of impurity or it became impure outside [the city] even through contact with a secondary source of impurity, it may be redeemed and eaten in any place, even though it was brought into Jerusalem.

13 When does the above apply? When it was brought in with the intent that the barriers of [the city] would not take it in. If, however, he did not make such a stipulation, since it entered the city and it is ritually pure according to Scriptural Law, it is taken in by [the city's] barriers and should not be removed. For a secondary source of ritual impurity does not impart impurity to another entity according to Scriptural Law.

14 It is permitted to partake of chilba from the second tithe while it is in its fresh state, for then it is fit to be eaten. Similarly, vetch from the second tithe may be eaten while it is fresh. If one made a dough from them, it is permitted to take it into Jerusalem and remove it, because vetch is not considered as [ordinary] produce. If it became impure in Jerusalem, it may be redeemed and eaten outside [the city].

15 When a tree is standing within the walls of Jerusalem and its branches extend outside the wall, produce from the second tithe should not be eaten under [those] branches. If, however, produce from the second tithe was brought under its branches, it can no longer be redeemed, because it is considered as if it was brought into Jerusalem.

16 [The following rules apply when] houses positioned at the side of the wall with their entrances within the wall, but the length of the house extends outside the wall. [The portions of the house that] are within the wall are considered as being within the city with regard to all matters. In those which are outside the wall, we may not eat [the produce of the second tithe] and as a stringency, produce from the second tithe should not be redeemed there. If the length of the house extends within [the wall] and the entrance is outside, [the portion that are] outside the wall are considered as outside the city. We may re redeem [produce from the tithes] there and may not partake of it there. [In the portion that is within the wall], we may not eat [such produce] there and as a stringency, we may not redeem it. The windows and the breadth of the walls are considered within the city.

1 A person who partakes of produce from the second tithe in a state of ritual impurity is liable for lashes, as [implied by Deuteronomy 26:14]: "I did not consume it in a state of impurity." [This applies] whether the produce is impure and the person partaking of it is pure or the produce is pure and the person partaking of it is impure, provided he partakes of it in Jerusalem before it is redeemed. For one is liable for lashes for partaking of such produce in a state of ritual impurity in a place where it is fit to partake of it. If, however, one partakes of it in a state of ritual impurity outside of Jerusalem, he is liable for stripes for rebellious conduct.

2 Once it has become impure, it even forbidden to use such produce [as fuel] to kindle a lamp until it is redeemed, as [implied by]: "I did not consume it in a state of impurity."

3 We already explained, that when produce from the second tithe becomes impure, it should be redeemed and eaten- even in Jerusalem. The proceeds [from its redemption] should [be used to purchase food that is] eaten in a state of ritual purity according to the laws governing produce from the second tithe, as will be explained. Even if all the produce became impure while it was tevel, one should separate the second tithe in a state of ritual impurity and redeem it.

4 An uncircumcised person is considered as if he is ritually impure. If he partakes of produce from the second tithe, he is liable for lashes according to Scriptural Law as he is liable for lashes for partaking of terumah. [This equivalence is established, because] terumah is referred to as "holy," and produce from the second tithe is referred as "holy," for [Leviticus 27:30] describes it as being "holy unto God."

When a person who was impure immerses himself [in a mikveh], he may partake of produce from the second tithe even though the sun has not set that day.

5 When a person partakes of produce from the second tithe in a Scripturally defined state of aninut, he is liable for lashes as [implied by Deuteronomy 26:14]: "I did not consume it in a state of aninut." [This applies,] provided he partakes of it in the place we are commanded to partake of it, [i.e.,] in Jerusalem. If, however, he partook of such produce outside Jerusalem in a state of aninut or partook of it in Jerusalem in a Rabbinically defined state of aninut, he is given stripes for rebellious conduct.

6 Who is an onain? One is mourning for one of the relatives for whom he is obligated to mourn on the day of their death is an onain according to Scriptural law. At night, he is an onain according to Rabbinic decree. [This is derived from Leviticus 10:19]: "If I would partake of a sin offering today, would it find favor in the eyes of God?" [Implied is that the day is forbidden, but the night is permitted.

If the deceased remains [unburied] for several days and is not buried until afterwards, [his relatives are] onanim according to Rabbinic decree throughout the days from the day of death until the day of the burial. [The status of] the day of burial is not extended until [the following] night.

7 [This restriction does not apply] to the second tithe alone, [but also] to all sacrificial foods. If one partakes of them in a Scriptural state of aninut, he is liable for lashes. In a Rabbinic state of aninut, he is liable for stripes for rebellious conduct.

8 Produce from the second tithe, nor produce purchased with money from the second tithe, nor money from the redemption of the second tithe should not be given to a common person, because we operate under the assumption that he is impure.

It is permitted to partake of produce from the second tithe that was separated from demai in a state of aninut and it may be given to a common person, provided he eats [an equivalent amount of produce] in place of them.

Produce from the second tithe should not be entrusted [to a colleague for safekeeping], not even to a chavair, lest he die and the produce will continue in the possession of his son, who is a common person. One may, however, entrust produce from the second tithe separated from demai to a common person.

9 It is forbidden to cause the loss of even a small amount of produce from the second tithe on the journey [to Jerusalem]. Instead, one must transport it in its entirety or the proceeds [from its redemption] to Jerusalem. It is, however, permitted, to cause the loss of a small amount of produce from the second tithe separate from demai on the journey.

What is meant by a small portion? Less than the size of a dried fig, whether it is eaten whole or sliced. We may not, however, cause the loss of a portion the size of a dried fig.

When a person separates a portion less than the size of a dried fig from produce from the second tithe separated from demai, he may give it to a common person provided he eats [a comparable portion in Jerusalem] in exchange for it. At the outset, he should not set it aside to be lost, for produce should not be set aside to be lost.

10 The produce of the second tithe may be used to eat and to drink, as [implied by Deuteronomy 14:23]: "And you shall eat before God, your Lord." Smearing oneself is considered as drinking.

It is forbidden to use [this produce] for any of one's other needs, to purchase utensils, clothes, or servants, as [ibid. 26:14] states: "I did not give from it to a corpse," i.e., I did not use it [to purchase] an object that does not maintain the body. If a person uses this produce for other purposes, even for a mitzvah, e.g., he uses it to purchase a coffin and shrouds for an abandoned corpse, he must eat other food in place of it, according to the laws governing the second tithe.

11 [With regard to produce from the second] tithe: One should eat produce that is normally eaten, drink what is normally drunk, and smear on oneself what is normally smeared. He should not smear wine or vinegar, but he may smear oil. He should not squeeze fruit to extract its juice with the exception of olives and grapes. We do not mix spices with oil, but do so with wine.

We do not require a person to eat bread that has become moldy or oil that has become rancid. Instead, as soon as it has become spoiled to the point that it is not fit for human consumption, its holiness has departed from it.

12 Whatever parts of produce from terumah that non-priests are permitted to eat may also be eaten from produce of the second tithe like ordinary produce. When [grape] dregs from the second tithe were placed in water, the first [quantity of drink produce] is forbidden like the produce from the second tithe. The second is permitted, like ordinary produce. [If the produce of the second tithe was] from demai, even the first quantity is permitted.

13 When honey and spices fell into wine from the second tithe and improved its flavor, the improvement is judged proportionately. Similarly, if fish were cooked with leek from the second tithe and their flavor was improved, the improvement is judged proportionately.

14 When a dough made with flour from the second tithe was baked and improved, the improvement is accredited to the second tithe. This is the general principle: Whenever the improvement is obvious, if the volume of the produce is increased, the improvement is judged proportionately. If the volume of the produce is not increased, the improvement is accredited to the second tithe alone. Whenever the improvement is not obvious, the improvement is attributed to the second tithe alone even when the volume is not increased.

15 What is meant by the phrase "the improvement is judged proportionately"? Honey and spices worth a zuz fall into wine from the second tithe that is worth three [zuz], increasing its volume and improving its flavor. The combined worth is now five zuz, we consider the worth [for the tithes] as four and a fourth. Similar rules apply with regard to other substances.

16 Although produce from the second tithe may be used for smearing, it should not be placed on a foot infection or on boils, nor may it be used as an amulet or the like, because it was not intended to be used as medication.

17 The second tithe is considered the property of the Most High, as [Leviticus 27:30] states: "It is God's." Therefore it cannot be acquired [when given] as a present, unless one gives a colleague tevel and he separates the second tithe from it.

It may not be used to consecrate a woman, nor may it be sold, nor may it be taken as security. It may not be exchanged, nor may it be given as surety.

18 What is meant by the prohibition against taking it as security? One should not enter [the debtor's] home and take produce from the second tithe of his as security. If one transgressed and took such produce as security, it is expropriated from him.

What is meant by the prohibition against giving it as surety? One should not tell a colleague: "Take this produce from the second tithe. Keep it in your possession and lend me money because of it."

What is meant by the prohibition against exchanging it? A person should not tell a colleague: "Here is wine from the second tithe for you and give me oil from the second tithe." He may, however, tell a colleague: "Here is wine from [the second tithe] for you, but I don't have oil." If his colleague desires to give him oil, it is permitted, because he did not exchange it with him. He merely notified him that he lacked it. Thus, if that person desired to give him, he may.

19 We do not use produce from the second tithe as a weight for anything, even for golden dinarim. [This is forbidden] even to [weigh coins] onto which the holiness from other produce will be transferred. [This is] a decree, [enacted] lest he balance his scales on this basis and the produce be lacking in weight. Thus if he uses them to weigh coins upon which to transfer the holiness of other produce from the second tithe, he will be redeeming such produce for less than its worth.

20 When brothers divide produce from the second tithe [left them in an estate], they should not weigh them against each other. Similarly, coins [upon which the holiness of] the second tithe [has been transferred] should not be weighed against each other. [Such coins] should not be sold, nor exchanged, nor given as surety. One may not give them to a moneychanger to use to create an impression. One may not lend them to boost his image. It is, however, permitted to lend them so that they will not rust.

21 We may not use [this money] to repay loans. They may not be used as wedding gifts, nor may they be used to repay favors. They may not be used to pay for charity levied upon him in the synagogue. One may, however, send them [as gifts] for charitable purposes. One must, however, [notify the recipient].

22 A person should not tell a colleague: "Bring this produce to Jerusalem and take your wages from it," for such an arrangement is equivalent to taking his wages for transporting the produce to Jerusalem. He may, however, tell him: "Bring it to Jerusalem so that we can eat it and drink it there."

23 In Jerusalem, a person may ask a colleague to smear oil from the second tithe upon him even though the oil also becomes smeared on the colleague's hand. This is not considered as a wage for smearing it upon him.

24 We have already explained that the produce from the second tithe belongs to the Most High. Therefore we say that one who steals produce from the second tithe is not obligated to make a double payment, nor is one who robs it obligated to add a fifth.

25 When a person consecrates produce from the second tithe to the Temple treasury, the one who redeems it should redeem it with the intent of giving what is due to the Temple treasury to it and what is due to the second tithe to it.

1 A person who desires to redeem produce from the second tithe should redeem it according to its worth and say: "These coins take the place of this produce" or "The holiness of this produce is transferred to these coins."

If he did not make such an explicit statement, but merely set aside the coins equivalent to [the value of] the produce, it is sufficient. He need not make an explicit statement.

The produce then is considered ordinary produce and the coins must be taken to Jerusalem and spent there, as [Deuteronomy 14:24] states: "When the journey will be too great for you, because you cannot transport it...."

2 Similarly, if a person desires to transfer the holiness of produce from the second tithe to other produce, he should bring the other produce to Jerusalem and eat it there. He should not transfer the holiness of produce from one species to produce from another species, nor from high quality produce from one species to lower quality produce even if it is of the same species. If, however, he transferred the holiness of produce in these instances, the transfer is effective.

3 A person who redeems produce from the second tithe should recite a blessing: "[Blessed are You...] who sanctified us with His commandments and commanded us concerning the redemption of the second tithe." If he transferred the holiness to other produce or he transferred the holiness of money to produce, he should recite the blessing: "...concerning the transfer of the holiness of the second tithe." A person who redeems or transfers the holiness of demai need not recite a blessing.

4 When one redeems produce from the second tithe, he should not redeem

it as the second tithe, but rather as ordinary produce. He should say: "How much is this ordinary produce worth." [This applies] even if everyone knows that the produce is from the second tithe, so that it will not be disgraced.

5 The holiness of coins [used to redeem produce from] the second tithe should not be transferred to other coins. [This applies] whether both sets of coins were silver or both were brass, the first set was silver and the second brass, or the first set was brass and the second silver. If one transgressed and transferred the holiness, the transfer is effective.

6 [Outside of Jerusalem,] the holiness of money of the second tithe should not be transferred to produce. If such a transfer was made, the produce should be brought to Jerusalem and eaten there. [Similarly, the holiness of money from the second tithe] should not be transferred to living domesticated animals, beasts, or fowl. If one [attempted to] make such a transfer, the holiness of the second tithe is not transferred. [This is a decree,] lest one raise them in herds. If one transferred the [holiness of such funds] to animals that were slaughtered, they are considered as produce. They must be brought to Jerusalem and eaten there and the money is considered as ordinary funds.

7 In a pressing situation, it is permitted to transfer the holiness of silver coins to brass ones. One should not maintain this situation, however. Instead, [when he has] a respite he should transfer the holiness of the brass back to silver coins.

8 As an initial preference, one may transfer the holiness of coins of the second tithe from demai, transferring the holiness from silver to silver, from silver to brass, from brass to brass, and from brass to produce. That produce should be brought to Jerusalem and eaten there.

9 The produce from the second tithe may only be redeemed for silver, as [implied by Deuteronomy 14:25]: "And you shall bundle the silver." Similarly, if a person redeems the silver for himself and adds a fifth, that fifth must be silver like the principal.

One should not use uncoined silver for the redemption [of the second tithe]. Instead, one must use silver imprinted with an image or with writing. If one [attempted to] redeem [produce from the second tithe] with silver bullion or the like - this is referred as an asimon - his actions are of no consequence. We may not redeem [produce from the second tithe] with [a coin less valuable] than a p'rutah, because this is considered as redeeming with an asimon.

10 We may not redeem [produce from the second tithe] with a coin that is not legal tender in that place and at that time, as [implied by ibid.:26]: "And you shall exchange the silver for anything your heart desires." [Implied is that the silver] must be fit for exchange. A coin minted by kings of an earlier era may be used for redemption if it is still circulated as currency.

11 We may not redeem [produce from the second tithe] with coins that are not in one's possession, as [implied by] the verse: "And you shall bundle the silver in your hand." If a person's pouch fell into a cistern, but it is possible for him to remove it from there, he may use [the coins in] it for redemption, for it is [still] in his domain.

12 [The following rules apply when] one was traveling on the road, carrying money, and a man of force was approaching him. If he could save [his money, even] with difficulty, he can use it to redeem produce of the second tithe in his home. If he cannot, and he says: "The holiness of the produce that is in my house is transferred to this money," his statements are of no consequence.

13 When a person sets aside money upon which to transfer the holiness of produce from the second tithe, he may [continue to] redeem his produce under the assumption that the money exists in his possession. If he discovers that the money has been lost, he must be concerned about all the produce that he redeemed with that money.

14 When a person located in Tiberias has money in Babylonian coinage in Babylon, he may not transfer the holiness [of the produce of the second tithe] to them. If, by contrast, [although he is in Tiberias,] he possesses money of Tiberian coinage in Babylon, he may transfer the holiness [of the produce of the second tithe] to them. Similarly laws apply in all analogous situations.

15 When a person says: "The holiness of produce from the second tithe is transferred to the first sela that I will take out of this wallet," "...on the sela I will receive when I exchange this golden dinar," "...on the pundiyon I will receive when I exchange this sela, the transfer is effective. The sela that he will take out or receive in exchange is money of the second tithe.

16 When a person says: "The holiness of the produce of the second tithe is transferred to the sela in my son's possession, the holiness is not transferred. Perhaps the sela was not in his possession at that time.

17 When a person redeems the produce from the second tithe before he separates it, e.g., he says: "The second tithe of this produce is redeemed with this money," his statements are of no consequence and the tithes have not been defined. If, however, he says: "The second tithe from this produce is in its northern portion" or "...in its southern portion and its holiness is transferred to this money," the redemption is effective.

18 When the produce of the second tithe is redeemed, it should be redeemed for its fair value. One may, however, value it at the buying price, i.e., what the storekeeper would pay if he purchased it and not the price he would charge if he sold it. Similarly, he may pay money according to the rate that a moneychanger would pay and not according to the rate he would charge. If a person transgresses and redeemed [produce] worth a maneh with [a coin] worth a p'rutah, the holiness [of the produce] is transferred.

19 [The following laws apply if] a sela was lacking a sixth or less [than its weight]. If it would be accepted [in business dealings even] with difficulty, one may transfer the holiness a sela's worth [of produce of the second tithe] to it without concern. If one redeemed [produce] with a sela and it was discovered to be unacceptable, he should exchange it.

20 One should not redeem produce from the second tithe by estimation. Instead, one should be precise concerning its volume or its weight and give their value. If the value [of the produce] was known, he may redeem it in the presence of only one person. If its value was not known, e.g., wine that had begun turning into vinegar, produce that spoiled, or coins that corroded, he should redeem them according to the appraisal of three merchants. [It is acceptable] even if one of them is a gentile or the owner of the produce of the second tithe. It is even acceptable to redeem [produce] based on the appraisal of a man and his two wives. We compel the owner to make the first bid [to redeem the produce]. This is a stringency applied with regard to produce from the second tithe over consecrated property.

21 We should not transport produce from the second tithe from one place to another to redeem it there. When a person transports produce from a place where it is expensive to a place where it is inexpensive, he should redeem it according to its value in the place he is redeeming it. If it is demai, we may redeem it at the inexpensive price, since it was possible to sell it at that price.

22 If a person possessed produce from the second tithe in his granary and spent money to transport them from his house to the town, thus causing the value of the produce to increase, he should redeem it according to the price in the city. He forfeits the expenses he undertook.

1 When a man redeems his produce for the second tithe for himself - whether it is from his own crops, he acquired it as an inheritance, or it was given to him while tevel as we explained, he must add a fifth [of the new total]. [Thus] if it was worth four, he should give five, as [Leviticus 27:31] states: "If a man will redeem from his tithes, he shall add a fifth to it."

2 When a woman redeems produce for the second tithe that she separated, she is not required to add a fifth. According to the Oral Tradition, we have learned: "If a man [will redeem from] his tithes," excluding a woman. Similarly, if a man redeems [money used to] redeem produce from the second tithe for himself, he must add a fifth.

3 When a person redeems the produce of his second tithe and adds a fifth, and then redeems the money itself a second time, he must add a second fifth of the principal alone. He need not add a fifth for the original fifth.

4 When the fifth of the produce of the second tithe is not worth a p'rutah, [the person redeeming it] need not add a fifth. Similarly, when the worth of the produce of the second tithe is unknown, it is sufficient for him to say: "The holiness of the produce and its fifth are transferred to this sela." Whenever a person does not redeem produce from the second tithe with his own money, he need not add a fifth. [When one redeems] produce from the second tithe that is demai, he need not add a fifth.

5 When a person is redeeming produce of the second tithe and he has other produce from the second tithe that was not redeemed whose fifth is not worth a p'rutah, it is sufficient for him to say: "The holiness of it and its fifth are transferred to the money [set aside] originally." [This leniency is granted,] because it is impossible to require a person to be precise with his money.

6 When a person redeems produce from the second tithe for more than its worth, that additional value is not considered as money from the second tithe.

7 When the owner of the produce bids a sela to redeem it and another person also bids a sela, the owner is given precedence, because he is required to add a fifth. If, however, the owner bids a sela and another person bids a sela and a p'rutah, that other person is given precedence, because he increases the principal.

8 It is permitted to act "guilefully" with regard to the redemption of produce of the second tithe. What is implied? A person may tell his son or daughter who are beyond majority or his Hebrew servant: "Here is this money. Use it to redeem this produce from the second tithe," so that they will not have to add a fifth. He should not say, however: "Use them to redeem it for me." Similarly, he is not required to add a fifth if he tells them: "Redeem it for me using your money."

9 He should not, however, give money to redeem [the produce] to one of his sons or daughters who are below majority or to his Canaanite servants or maid-servants, because they do not have an independent financial capacity. If he gave the money to his Hebrew maidservant, his words are effective if [the obligation to separate] the second tithe from this produce is Rabbinic in origin, e.g., produce grew in a flowerpot without a hole. [The rationale is that] a Hebrew maidservant is a minor and a minor can acquire property for others only with regard to matters of Rabbinic Law.

10 Similarly, a person may act with guile and give produce from the second tithe as a present while it is still tevel and while giving it say: "The holiness from [the second tithe of] this produce is transferred to the money I have at home."

11 Two brothers, two partners, a father and his son, may redeem produce from the second tithe for each other so that they will not have to add a fifth. When a woman brings produce from the second tithe to her husband's home, the husband does not acquire it as his own, since it belongs to the Most High, as we explained. Therefore, if he redeems it, he need not add a fifth.

12 A person who redeems produce from the second tithe for himself, who paid the principal, but did not pay the additional fifth, should not partake of [the produce] until he pays the fifth. [This applies] even on the Sabbath. [And it applies] even though the payment of the fifth does not hold back the transfer of holiness [from the produce to the coins]. Indeed, that transfer takes place. [This restriction is] a decree, lest the person be negligent and fail to pay.

13 If a person desires to exchange money from the redemption of the second tithe for golden dinarim, so that his burden will be lighter, he may. Even if he exchanged [the two] with his own money, he need not add a fifth, for this is not considered as redemption.

14 When a person exchanges a sela of money from the second tithe - whether in Jerusalem or outside the city - he should not exchange it entirely for brass coins. Instead, it should be divided into a shekel's worth of silver coins and a shekel's worth of brass coins.

15 It is permissible to transfer the holiness of money of the second tithe together with produce from the second tithe to money, provided the produce is worth less than a dinar. If, however, [the produce] is worth a dinar, its holiness should not be transferred together with that of money. Instead, [it should be transferred] by itself. What is implied? A person possessed produce that was worth a dinar and three dinarim that were of the second tithe, he may not transfer the holiness of the entire amount to one sela. If, however, he has a half a dinar of produce and a half a dinar of money, he may transfer the holiness of both to one dinar.

1 [The following rules apply when] ordinary money and money from the second tithe become scattered [in the same place]. If he gathered from both sides, what he gathers belongs to the second tithe until he reaches the original amount and then the remainder is ordinary produce. If he mixed the coins together and grabbed a handful or gathered only from one side, he should calculate the percentage proportionately.

What is implied? There were 200 coins of the second tithe and 100 ordinary coins. They became scattered. He mixed them and picked them all up, but found only 270, 180 are the second tithe and 90 are ordinary coins. This is the general principle. Those that are gathered are considered as the second tithe. Those that are mixed together are divided according to the percentage.

He should make a stipulation and say: "If those in my hand are from the second tithe, the remainder are ordinary money and if they are ordinary money, the holiness from the coins from the second tithe wherever they are is transferred to them."

2 When a sela of the second tithe becomes mixed with a sela of ordinary money, one should bring coins - even brass coins - worth a sela and say: "Wherever the sela of the second tithe is, its holiness is transferred to these coins." Afterwards, he should chose the better of the two [selaim] and transfer the holiness of the brass coins to it. Thus the better sela has been become the money of the second tithe.

3 When [a father] tells his son: "Produce from the second tithe is found in this corner," and is found in another corner, it is ordinary produce. If he told him: "A maneh there," and 200 were discovered, the remainder is ordinary money. "There are 200," and only a maneh was discovered, it is ordinary money. If he left a maneh and discovered 200 or 200 and discovered a maneh, the entire amount is ordinary money. [This applies] even if the money is found in two wallets.

4 If his father told him: "I have a pouch [with produce] from the second tithe at home," and [the son] found three pouches, the greater one is [considered as containing produce from] the second tithe and the remainder are [considered as containing produce containing] ordinary produce. Nevertheless, he should not make use of [the produce from] the smaller pouches until he transfers their holiness to the greater one.

5 [The following laws apply when] a person loses his power of speech. If he was asked: "Is your produce from the second tithe in this-and-this place?" and he nodded his head, he should be tested three times like he is tested with regard to a bill of divorce. [If it is proven that he understands what he is being told,] his message has consequences.

6 If one was told in a dream: "The produce from the second tithe of your father that you are seeking is in this-and-this place," [the statements are of no consequence. This applies even] if he found the produce there like he was told. For words communicated in a dream are of no significance at all.

7 Although a person tells his sons: "Even if you are dying, do not touch [what is in] that corner," if money is found there, it is considered as ordinary money. [Different laws apply if] he buried money in their presence and told them: "It belongs to so-and-so" or "It is from the second tithe." If it appears that he is speaking with guile, we do not pay attention to his words. If it appears that he is serious, his words are given weight.

8 When a person finds a container with the letter mem written on it, its contents [are considered as] the second tithe. When there is a dalet written on it, its contents are considered demai; a tet, tevel; kuf, for a sacrifice. If the container was metal, the container and its contents were consecrated for a sacrifice. For in dangerous times, they would write one letter from the name [as a sign].

9 When coins - even golden dinarim, together with silver, and [brass] coins - are found in Jerusalem, they are considered as ordinary money. [The rationale is that] the streets of Jerusalem are swept every day. If a shard upon which was written ma'aser, it is considered as the second tithe.
When does the above apply? During the majority of the days of the year. On the pilgrimage festivals, by contrast, all [the money found] is considered as from the second tithe.

10 Money which is found in front of a seller of livestock in Jerusalem is always considered as from the second tithe. We operate under the assumption that the majority of the clients are bringing money from the second tithe and using it to purchase animals. [Money] which is found on the Temple Mount is always considered as ordinary funds. We operate under the assumption that it came from the Temple treasury and the treasurers had already transferred its holiness to an animal.

11 [The following rules apply when] money is found in a chest that had been used for both ordinary produce and the second tithe. If the majority of the people who placed money [in the chest placed money] from the second tithe, the money is considered as from the second tithe. If the majority placed ordinary money, the money is considered as ordinary money. If the ratio is half and half, the money is considered as ordinary money.

12 When one find produce between produce of the second tithe and produce that is terumah, it should be included among the type to which it is closest. If it is equidistant [from both], it should be eaten according to the stringencies that apply to both. Thus it is forbidden to non-priests; one must wash his hands [before partaking of it], and must wait until sunset [on the day of one's purification before partaking of it] like terumah. [Similarly,] it is forbidden to one in an acute state of mourning and must be brought [to Jerusalem] as required of the second tithe.
Similar principles apply with regard to coins that are found between ordinary coins and coins from the second tithe.

13 When produce that is from the second tithe of demai and produce that is definitely from the second tithe are mixed together, [the mixture] must be eaten according to the more stringent requirements.

14 When produce from the second tithe becomes mixed with ordinary produce, [the mixture] should be eaten in a state of ritual purity in Jerusalem or the second tithe should be redeemed. Therefore if such a mixture takes place in Jerusalem, even the smallest amount of the same species becomes forbidden [to be eaten as ordinary produce]. Since the produce is in Jerusalem, it is considered as an entity that can be permitted and should be eaten in a state of ritual purity.

15 When a person sows produce from the second tithe after it had entered

Jerusalem, the produce which grows is considered as produce from the second tithe. If he sows it before it enters Jerusalem, the produce which grows is considered as ordinary produce even if its seed does not decompose. [Preferably, however,] it should be redeemed at the time it was sown.

16 When produce from the second tithe is mixed with other substances, it is considered as nullified when mixed with a simple majority.
To which produce from the second tithe does this apply? To produce that entered Jerusalem and then departed from there and afterwards, the walls of the city fell. Thus it is impossible to return it to [the holy city] and it is impossible to redeem since it has already entered that place. [This applies] even though [its fifth] is not worth a p'rutah. It is a substance that has no way to be permitted and is therefore nullified by a simple majority, as stated in Hilchot Issurei Ma'achalot.

1 Produce that was purchased with money from the second tithe should not be redeemed outside Jerusalem unless they contracted ritual impurity from a primary source of ritual impurity. Instead, they should be brought to Jerusalem and eaten there.

2 This is the stringency of produce purchased with money from the second tithe over the produce of the second tithe itself. If, however, it contracted ritual impurity from a secondary source of ritual impurity, it should be redeemed and eaten in Jerusalem.

3 Money from the second tithe should be used only to purchase food for humans that grows from the earth or grows from the products of the earth, e.g., those entities explicitly mentioned in the Torah [Deuteronomy 14:26]: "Cattle, sheep, wine, and strong drink."

4 For this reason, we do not purchase water, salt, truffles, and mushrooms with money from the second tithes, because they are not products of the earth. Similarly, one should not purchase produce that is attached to the earth or produce that cannot be brought to Jerusalem, because this does not resemble cattle and sheep.

5 Honey, eggs, and milk are considered like cattle and sheep. Even though they are not products of the earth, they are the products of its products.

6 A mixture of water and grapes that has not turned to vinegar should not be purchased with money from the second tithe, because it is like water. Once it turns to vinegar, it can be purchased [with these funds] like wine or strong drink. If one purchased it before it fermented and then it fermented, it is acquired by the second tithe.

7 When does the above apply? When one mixed three units of water and received less than a fourth unit of the mixture. If, however, one mixed three units and received four, the mixture is considered as diluted wine and may be purchased with money from the second tithe.

8 Buds from branches and carob trees before they become sweet may not be purchased [with money from the second tithe]. After they become sweet, they may be purchased [with those funds]. But luf, mustard, vetch, and other produce that is pickled may be purchased [with these funds], whether they have already become sweet or not. Date hearts may be purchased with money from the second tithe.

9 Safron may not be purchased [with these funds], for it serves only as a coloring. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations involving herbs that provide an aroma, color, or taste. Since these herbs are not [included] in foods to be eaten for their substance, only for their flavor, they should not be purchased with money from the second tithe. Therefore spices, pepper, costus, chiltit, safflower, and the like may not be purchased with money from the second tithes.

10 Anise, when used to flavor a cooked dish, should not be purchased with money from the second tithe. If it is used for a dip or the like, in which instance, it is part of the food itself, it can be purchased with money from the second tithe. If one mixed water and salt and put oil into it, it is considered as brine and may be purchased with money from the second tithe. The cost of the water and the salt should be included in the cost of the oil.

11 One may not use money of Maaser Sheni to purchase produce that is terumah, because by doing so, one limits the consumption of both [the terumah] and [the second tithe]. For terumah may only be eaten by priests on the evening [after they immersed themselves]. It is permitted to those in the acute state of onein mourning and can be eaten in any place. The second tithe, by contrast, is permitted to non-priests and those who immersed themselves that day. It is forbidden to one in the acute state of onein mourning and must be eaten in Jerusalem. Thus, [by purchasing terumah with such funds,] one restricts the consumption of the second tithe and the consumption of terumah.

12 A domesticated animal to be offered as a peace offering may be purchased from the money of the second tithes, since peace offerings may be eaten by non-priests. At the outset, [pilgrims] would purchase animals with the money of the second tithe to partake of them as ordinary meat so that they would not be offered on the altar. [Hence,] the court decreed that one could not use these funds to purchase a domesticated animal unless it was brought as a peace offering. One may, however, use these funds to purchase non-domesticated animals or fowl, for these are unfit for peace offerings.

13 The produce of the Sabbatical year may not be purchased with money from the second tithes, because there is an obligation to destroy it, as will be explained.

14 When a person purchases salt, produce that is still attached [to the ground], or produce that cannot be brought to Jerusalem, they are not acquired by the second tithe even though the money is now considered as ordinary funds.

15 When a person inadvertently purchases produce outside of Jerusalem with money from the second tithe, the seller is compelled to return the money to the owner and it is considered as the second tithe as it was originally. If he makes the purchase intentionally, the produce he purchased must be taken to Jerusalem and eaten there. [In the age when] the Temple no longer exists, they should be put aside until they rot.

16 Similarly, a domesticated animal should not be purchased with money from the second tithe outside of Jerusalem. If one purchased it unknowingly, the money should be returned to its [owner]. If it was done intentionally, it should be brought to Jerusalem and eaten there. [In the age when] the Temple no longer exists, [the animal] and its hide should be buried.

17 [The following laws apply when] one purchases servants, land, or an unkosher animal, whether intentionally or unintentionally, [with money from the second tithe]. If the seller fled, [the purchaser] should [purchase food] with the amount of money he spent and eat it in Jerusalem under the restrictions applying to the second tithe. This is the general principle: If the seller fled or died, whenever one spent the money of the second tithe on matters other than food, drink, and daubs, he must partake of an equivalent [value of food in Jerusalem]. If the seller was present, the money should be returned to [the original owner]. Similarly, if a person brought burnt offerings, sin offerings, or guilt offerings from the money of the second tithe, he must partake of an equivalent [value of food in Jerusalem].

18 When a person [used money from the second tithe to] purchase a non-domesticated animal for a peace offering or a domesticated animal to be eaten as ordinary meat, it is as if he [used it to] purchase an ox for plowing and the animal is not designated as a peace offering. If he purchased a domesticated animal to be offered as a peace offering and it became blemished, the holiness of the second tithe leaves it. It should be redeemed and the funds are not considered as money from the second tithe. Nevertheless, if he redeems it himself, he must add a fifth of its value.

19 When one consecrates money from the second tithe for [the purpose of purchasing] a peace offering, the consecration is not effective, for the sanctity of the peace offering does not encompass [an entity already] sanctified to the second tithe. For the second tithe is the property of the Most High. Needless to say, this applies if he consecrates the produce of the second tithe itself for the purpose of purchasing] a peace offering, the consecration is not effective.

20 [The following laws apply when a person] partakes of entities consecrated to the second tithe as ordinary produce [outside of Jerusalem], even intentionally. If he partook of the produce from the second tithe itself, he should cry out to heaven. If he [used] money from the second tithe [to purchase other food that] he ate, the money should be returned to its [owner] and he should bring them to Jerusalem and partake of them there. Alternatively, if the money cannot be returned, he should [purchase food] with the amount of money he spent and eat it in Jerusalem.

1 When a person [used money from the second tithe to] purchase a domesticated animal for a peace offering or a non-domesticated animal for ordinary meat from a person who is not a merchant and is not precise, the hide is considered as ordinary property. This applies even if the value of the hide is greater than the value of the meat. When, by contrast, a person purchases an animal from a merchant, the hide is not considered as ordinary property.

2 Similar laws apply when a person purchases jugs of wine that are sealed. In a place where it is customary for these jugs to be sold while sealed from a person who is not a merchant, the jugs are considered as ordinary property. Therefore the seller must open the tops of the jugs so that they will not become ordinary property. If the seller wishes to be stringent with himself and sell the wine in exact measure, the container is considered ordinary property.

3 If he purchased [the jugs of wine] while they were open or sealed in a place where it is customary to sell them open or he purchased them from a merchant who is precise in his sale, the jugs are not considered as ordinary property. If a person purchases baskets of figs and grapes together with their container, the container is not considered as ordinary property.

4 If a person purchases nuts, almonds, or the like, the shells are considered as ordinary property. If a person purchases a frond of dates, the frond is considered as ordinary property.

[The following rules apply if] one purchases containers of dates. If they are pressed, the containers are considered as ordinary property. If not, they are not considered as ordinary property.

5 When a person has wine from the second tithe and he lends his jugs for that [wine from] the second tithe, the second tithe does not acquire the jugs, even though he seals them.

[The following laws apply if] he stored the wine in them without making any statement: If he designated [certain jugs] as the second tithe before he sealed their openings, the second tithe does not acquire the jugs. If he designated [the jugs] as the second tithe after he sealed their openings, the second tithe acquires the jugs. If [the owner] stored a revi'it of ordinary wine in the jug, or put oil, vinegar, brine, or honey from the second tithe without making any statement - whether before or after he sealed [the jugs] - the second tithe does not acquire the jugs.

6 When a deer that was purchased with money from the second tithe dies, it should be buried with its hide. If it was purchased while alive and slaughtered and then it became impure, it should be redeemed like other produce that became impure.

[The following laws apply when a person] sets aside a dinar of money of the second tithe to purchase food against until he has exhausted its value and it becomes ordinary funds [and then the value of the coinage changes. For example,] the rate of exchange for a dinar was 20 me'ah. The person consumed ten me'ah's worth of food and then the value of the latter coinage decreased. Afterwards, the rate of exchange of a dinar was 40 me'ah. The person must spend another 20 me'ah on food before [the dinar] is considered as ordinary money.

If the value of a me'ah increased and the rate of exchange for a dinar was ten me'ah, he must spend another five me'ah on food. Afterwards, [the dinar] is considered ordinary money.

7 When a person purchases produce with a sela of money from the second tithe and draws the produce into his domain, but did not pay for it before the value of the produce increased and it became worth two selaim, he is required to pay only a sela for the [produce]. [This is derived from the phrase]: "And he paid the money and it was acquired by him." [Implied is that the produce] is acquired by paying money. The profit is realized by the second tithe.

8 If he drew the produce into his possession when it was worth two selaim, but did not pay for it until the value of the produce decreased and it was worth only a sela, he should pay only one sela for them from the money of the second tithe. He must add another sela from ordinary funds and give it to the seller. If the seller was a common person, it is permitted for him to give him a second sela from money from the second tithe of demai.

If [the purchaser] gave the seller a sela of money from the second tithe, but did not draw the produce into his possession until they were worth two [selaim], what he redeemed is redeemed and there is a judgment between the two of them.

9 If [the purchaser] gave the seller two selaim of money from the second tithe, but did not draw the produce into his possession until its worth decreased to a sela, what he redeemed is redeemed, and the attribute of judgment must be exercised between them. [The rationale for these laws is that] the redemption of the second tithe is like drawing it into possession.

10 If a person possessed ordinary produce in Jerusalem and money from the second tithe outside of Jerusalem, he may say: "The holiness of that money is transferred to this produce," and partake of them there in a state of ritual purity. The money then becomes ordinary funds in its location.

11 If one had money from the second tithe in Jerusalem and produce outside of Jerusalem, he may say: "The holiness of this money is transferred to that produce." The money then becomes ordinary money and the produce must be brought to Jerusalem and eaten there. For it is not necessary that the money and the produce be in the same place when the holiness of one is transferred to the other.

12 When a person possesses money from the second tithe in Jerusalem which he needs [for other purposes] and a colleague possesses ordinary produce that he desires to eat, he should tell his colleague: "The holiness of this money is transferred to your produce." Thus that produce is considered as purchased with the money of the second tithe. The colleague should then partake of them in a state of ritual purity. Thus he does not lose anything and [his] money becomes as ordinary funds.

13 When does the above apply? When his friend who owns the produce is a chavair. For produce that is definitely of the second tithe may be given only to a chavair. Therefore if the produce was [the second tithe of] demai, he may make such a stipulation with a common person as well.

It is permitted to transfer the holiness of produce from the second tithe to produce or money belonging to a common person. We are not concerned that perhaps they are from the second tithe.

14 [The following laws apply when a person] sets aside a dinar from the second tithe to [which to transfer the holiness of food that] he eats continuously. If he proceeded to do so to the extent that less than a p'rutah's worth [of its value] remained [consecrated], the coin is considered as ordinary money.
When does the above apply? With regard to [the second tithe of] demai. With regard to produce that is definitely of the second tithe, [the coin] is not considered as ordinary money until less than a p'rutah's worth [of its value] remained [consecrated] after a fifth was added to it, e.g., less than four fifths of a p'rutah's worth [of its value] remain.

15 [The following laws apply when people who are] ritually impure and others who are ritually pure were eating together in Jerusalem and those who were ritually pure desired to [use their money from] the second tithe for food. They should place a sela from the second tithe aside and say: "The holiness of this sela is transferred to everything which those who are ritually pure eat." The sela is then considered as ordinary property, for they eat and drank its value in a state of ritual purity. [This applies] provided the people who are impure do not touch the food and thus cause

1 The produce of the fourth year (neta reva'i) is holy, as [Leviticus 19:24] states: "And in its fourth year, all of its produce shall be holy, consecrated unto God." The law applying to it is that it must be eaten in Jerusalem by its owners in the same way as the second tithe. Just as the laws of the second tithe do not apply in Syria, so too, the laws of neta reva'i do not apply in Syria.

With regard to neta reva'i, [Numbers 5:10] states: "A person's consecrated property shall be his." For there is no other consecrated property about which the Torah does not inform to whom it should be given with the exception of neta reva'i.

2 A person who desires to redeem neta reva'i should redeem it in the same manner as which he redeems the produce of the second tithe. If he redeems it for his own self, he must add a fifth [to its value]. It may not be redeemed until it reaches the "phase of tithing," as [implied by Leviticus 19:25]: "To increase its produce for you," [i.e., these laws do not apply] until [the crops] have become produce.

[Neta reva'i] may not be redeemed while it is attached [to the ground], as is the law with regard to the second tithe. And it is the property of the Most High, as is the second tithe. Therefore, it cannot be acquired when given as a present unless it was given when it was not yet ripe.

With regard to other matters, e.g., eating, drinking, and redemption, the laws that apply to it are those applying to the second tithe.

3 When a person redeems a vineyard in its fourth year of growth, he may redeem it as grapes or he may redeem it as wine. Similarly, olives [may be redeemed as fruit or as oil]. Other fruits, by contrast, may only be redeemed in their natural state.

4 The laws of shichachah, pe'ah, peret, and ollelot do not apply to a vineyard that is in its fourth year. Nor should terumah and the tithes be separated from it, as they are not separated from the second tithe. Instead, it should be brought to Jerusalem in its entirety or redeemed and the money taken to Jerusalem [and used for food there] like the second tithe.

5 Our Sages ordained that grapes from a vineyard in its fourth year from a radius of a one-day journey from Jerusalem should be brought there to embellish the marketplaces of Jerusalem with fruit. After the Temple was destroyed, it may be redeemed even directly outside the city's wall. Other types of produce may be redeemed even directly outside the city's wall even during the time the Temple was standing.

6 How is neta reva'i redeemed? One should evaluate [the size of] a basket [of fruit] through the agency of three men who estimate how much produce would a person [want] for a sela that he would pay for this fruit when it is considered that [in addition] he would have to pay the cost of watchmen, donkey-drivers, and workers. After the rate is established, he should place down the money and say: "The holiness of all [the produce] gathered from this [orchard] is transferred to this money," estimating how many baskets worth a sela [the orchard] contains.

In the Sabbatical year, he should redeem [the produce of the orchard] for its worth. For in that year, there are no watchmen or workers [to pay]. If [the orchard] was declared ownerless, all that is necessary to deduct is the wages for gathering it.

7 When a person had [an orchard that was in] its fourth year of growth in the Sabbatical year when everyone is allowed equal access to it, he must mark it with mounds of earth so that [those who take the produce] will recognize [its sacred quality] and not partake of it until they redeem it. If [the produce is] within the [three] orlah years, it should be marked with baked clay so that [people] will shun it. [We use clay instead of mounds of earth], lest the latter crumble. [The rationale is that] the prohibition of orlah is more severe, because benefit from it is forbidden.

Those who are meticulous in their observance of the Torah's prohibitions would set aside money in the Sabbatical year and say: "The holiness of everything harvested from these fruits of the fourth year is transferred to this money." [The redemption must be carried out in this fashion,] because it is forbidden to redeem [the produce] while it is attached to the ground, as explained.

8 The first of Tishrei is the beginning of the year with regard to the reckoning of orlah and neta reva'i.

When do we begin counting the year with regard to these prohibitions? From the time the trees are planted. [A year does not have to be] from Rosh HaShanah to Rosh HaShanah. Instead, 30 days within a year are considered a year. [This applies] provided the planting takes root before these thirty days [begin]. How long does it take? Generally, the time for all trees to take root is two weeks.

9 Thus when a person plants a tree 44 days before Rosh HaShanah, it is considered as if the tree had been planted for an entire year. Nevertheless, due to the prohibition of orlah, in the fourth year, the fruit from this planting is not permitted until the fifteenth of Shvat, which is "the New Year of the Trees."

10 What is implied? When a person plants a fruit tree on the fifteenth of Av of the tenth year in the Jubilee cycle, it is considered as being orlah until the fifteenth of Shvat of the thirteenth year of the Jubilee cycle. Whatever fruit produced by the tree during this time is orlah, even though it did not ripen until several days after [that date]. From the fifteenth of Shvat from the thirteenth year of the Jubilee cycle until the fifteenth of Shvat of the fourteenth year, the produce is neta reva'i. Whatever fruit produced during this time is neta reva'i and must be redeemed. If the year is declared a leap year, [the produce grown in] the extra month is considered as orlah or neta reva'i.

11 If it was planted on the sixteenth of Av in the tenth year, the tenth year is not reckoned for it. Instead, it is orlah throughout the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth years. And it is neta reva'i from Rosh HaShanah of the fourteenth year until its conclusion.

12 If one planted the tree between the first of Tishrei and the fifteenth of Shvat, he should count three years from day to day for orlah and [four years] from day to day for neta reva'i. I have seen Geonim who have a different approach regarding the reckoning of orlah and neta reva'i. It is not appropriate to elaborate in rebuttal of them. Theirs is a scholarly error and we have already outlined the true path.

13 Leaves, blossoms, sap, and fruit buds, are permitted in [the years of] orlah and neta reva'i. Grapes that were devastated by the west wind and ruined, grape seeds, grape peels, water mixed with grape dregs, the peels of pomegranates, their flowers, the shells of nuts, and seeds within a fruit are forbidden with regard to orlah and permitted with regard to neta reva'i. Fruit that withers and falls from the tree are forbidden in all instances.

1 [The restrictions of] neta reva'i applies to all [plants to which] the prohibition of orlah applies. And all [plants] that are exempt from orlah are not obligated for neta reva'i, as [Leviticus 19:23-24] states: "For three years [your plants] will be orlah.... In the fourth year..."

2 When a person plants a fruit tree with the intent that it serve as a hedge for a garden or he planted it to use it as lumber and not for its fruit, it is exempt from the prohibition of orlah. If he planted it to serve as a hedge and then changed his mind and thought to use its fruit or he planted it for the sake of its fruit and then thought to use it as a hedge, since an intent that obligates it was involved, he is liable. If he planted it for three years as a hedge and afterwards, intended to use it for food, the laws of neta reva'i do not apply, because whenever the laws of orlah do not apply, the laws of neta reva'i do not apply.

3 When one planted a tree with the intent that the inner side will produce food and the outer side will serve as a hedge or the lower portion will produce food and the upper portion will serve as a hedge, the portion that was intended for food is liable in the prohibitions of orlah and the portion intended as a hedge or for lumber is exempt. For the matter is dependent on the intent of the one who plants it.

The prohibition of orlah applies to only the caper berries of the caper tree, but its leaves are permitted.

4 When a person plants trees for the sake of people at large in his own field, the prohibition of orlah applies. For the term "And you shall plant..."[used in the prooftext cited above] implies even for the sake of people at large.

When does the above apply? In Eretz Yisrael. In the Diaspora, by contrast, [such trees] are exempt.

5 When a person plants trees in the public domain or on a ship, when trees grow on their own accord in a private domain, when a gentile plants a tree whether for himself or for a Jew, or when a thief plants a tree, the laws of orlah and neta reva'i apply.

6 [Trees] that grow on their own accord in rocky terrain are exempt. Even one who plants trees in an unsettled place is exempt, provided the tree does not produce enough fruit so that it would be worthwhile for a person to care for its produce until he brings it to a settled land. If, however, the tree produces enough that it is worthwhile to maintain it, the prohibition of orlah applies to it.

7 When a person plants a tree for the sake of a mitzvah, e.g., he plants an esrog tree [to fulfill] the mitzvah of lulav [and esrog] or an olive tree [to produce oil] for the Menorah, the prohibition of orlah applies. If he consecrated [a tree] and then planted it, it is exempt. If he planted it and then consecrated it, the prohibition of orlah applies.

8 When a person plants [a tree] in a flowerpot without a hole, the prohibition of orlah applies. [Although planting in such a pot] is not considered as [planting] in the earth with regard to smaller plants, it is considered as planting in the earth with regard to trees.

9 When a tree is planted in a house, the prohibition of orlah applies. Trees planted by gentiles before our ancestors entered the [Holy] Land were exempt. After our ancestors entered the land, the prohibition applies even to [trees] planted by gentiles, as Leviticus 19:23] states: "When you enter the land and you plant...." [The prohibition begins from] the time of the entry into the land.

10 When a gentile grafts a fruit tree on a non-fruitbearing tree, the prohibition of orlah applies. If a gentile desires to observe the mitzvah of neta reva'i, its laws apply to him and it is consecrated like neta reva'i belonging to a Jew.

11 [With regard to] the prohibition of orlah, [planting a tree refers to] planting a seed, a bough from a tree, or uprooting the entire tree from one place and planting it in another. We begin counting [the three years] from the time of the planting.

[The following laws apply if] a tree was shaken from its place, but not uprooted and then one filled the surrounding area with earth. If it could live without the surroundings having been filled with earth, it is exempt. If not, it is considered as if it was uprooted and replanted, and the prohibition does apply.

12 Similarly, when a tree was uprooted and there remained a root, even one as thin as a needle over which embroiderers wind thread, if one returned it to its original place and replanted it, it is exempt [from the prohibitions of orlah], because it could live.

[The following rules apply if] the tree was uprooted entirely together with the clod of earth to which its roots were attached and he replanted it as it is, together with that earth. If it could live from that clod of earth even if it was not replanted, it is as if it was not uprooted. If not, [the laws of orlah] apply.

13 When a tree was cut down from above the earth and [a new tree grew from its roots], the prohibition of orlah applies. [The three years] are counted from the time [the first tree] was cut down.

14 Whether one plants a tree, one extends one, or grafts it, [the laws of orlah] apply. When does the above apply? When one cut off a bough from the tree and planted it in the earth or grafted it to another plant. If, however, one extended a branch of an elder plant and then implanted it in the earth or grafted it onto another tree, [leaving] the bough connected to the elder tree, [the new growth] is exempt [from the prohibition of orlah].

15 If the new growth which was originally extended grew and produced fruit and, afterwards, the source from which it was connected to the elder tree was separated, we count [the years of orlah] from the time that it was separated. The fruit [that was growing on the tree before it was separated] is, however, permitted, because it grew while permitted. If he left [the fruit on the new tree] after the connection to the original tree was severed until their growth increased by a two-hundredth, the fruit is forbidden.

16 When a young tree was grafted on to an elder tree and there were fruit on the younger tree, the fruit on the younger tree are forbidden even if the fruit increases 200 times its size. For the basic fruit that comes from a forbidden entity cannot be elevated by the new permitted substances that grow.

17 [The following rule applies when] a branch was extended from a tree and implanted in the earth and afterwards, the tree itself was entirely uprooted and it derives its nurture only from the branch implanted in the earth. The tree is considered as if it was planted at this time and the prohibition of orlah applies to it. [The three years] are counted for the tree and for whatever grew from the implanted branch from the time it was uprooted.

18 When a person extended a branch and implanted it in the earth and it grew, he then extended and implanted a branch from the new growth and it grew, and then he extended and implanted a branch from the third growth - and continued doing so even for 100 implants each connected with each other - since the connection with the primary plant has not been severed, all [of the fruit] is permitted. If [the connection to] the original plant is severed, [the orlah years] are counted from the time of the severance.

19 A tree which grows from a stump is exempt from the prohibitions of orlah. [If it grows] from the roots, the prohibition of orlah applies.

The prohibition of orlah applies to a dwarf vine which is less than a handbreadth high throughout its entire life, because it looks like a tree that is one year old. When does the above apply? To one tree or to [a group of five, planted in a pattern where] two are planted opposite another pair and a fifth is planted behind them. If, however, an entire vineyard is less than a handbreadth high, it would be a matter of common knowledge and its age is calculated in the same way as other trees.

20 We may plant a branch from a tree that is orlah, but we may not plant a nut that is orlah, because it is produce and it is forbidden to benefit from it, as we explained in Hilchot Ma'achalot Assurot. If one transgressed and planted a nut that is orlah, [the tree] that grows from it is permitted like other trees.

21 Similarly, one may not graft underdeveloped clusters of dates, that are orlah, because they are considered as food. If one transgressed and grafted them, the fruits are permitted. [The rationale is that] whenever an entity has two causes, one forbidden and one which is permitted, since it comes as a result of both of them, it is permitted. Therefore [a plant] that grows from fruit that is orlah is permitted, because its growth was caused by the forbidden fruit and the earth which is permitted.

1 It is a positive commandment to make a declaration before G-d after all the presents from the agricultural products. This is called the declaration of the tithes.

2 This declaration is made only after the year in which the tithe for the poor is separated, as [Deuteronomy 26:12-13] states: "When you complete tithing, and you shall declare before God your Lord: 'I have removed all the sacred substances from the house...'"

3 When is this declaration made? On the afternoon of the last festival of the Pesach holiday of the fourth and seventh year, as [the prooftext] states: "When you complete tithing...," i.e., on the festival when all the tithes are completed. Pesach of the fourth year will not arrive before all of the produce - both those that grow from the earth and those that grow from trees - have been tithed.

4 The declaration may only be made during the day. The entire day is appropriate for this declaration. Whether the Temple is standing or not, he is obligated to remove [all the agricultural presents from his possession] and make the declaration.

5 This declaration may be made in any language, as [indicated by the prooftext]: "You shall declare before God your Lord," i.e., in any language in which you declare.
Each person should make this declaration individually. If many desire to recite it together, they may.

6 [The proper way of performing] the mitzvah is to recite the declaration in the Temple, as [implied by] the phrase: "before God." [Nevertheless,] if he made the declaration in any other place, he fulfilled his obligation.

7 A person may not make this declaration until he has disposed of all the agricultural presents in his possession. For in the declaration he states: "I have removed all the sacred substances from the house." On the day before the final day of the Pesach festival, one must remove [the last of the presents] and on the following day, the declaration is made.

8 What must one do? If he has terumah or terumat ma'aser in his possession, he should give them to a priest. The first tithe should be given to a Levite and tithe of the poor to the poor. If produce that was definitely from the second tithe or neta reva'i or money from their redemption remained in his possession, he must destroy it and cast it in the sea or burn it. If the second tithe of demai remains in his possession, he is not obligated to destroy it. If the first fruits remain in his possession, they may be destroyed in any place.

9 When does the obligation to burn and remove apply? When there remains in his possession [fresh] produce that one cannot consume before the commencement of the holiday. If, however, cooked food from the second tithe or neta reva'i remain, it need not be removed, for cooked food is considered as if it was removed. Similarly, wine and spices are considered as if they were removed.

10 Produce that has not reached the "phase of tithing" by the time the removal [of the agricultural presence] arrives does not prevent a person from making a declaration, nor is he obligated to remove them from his possession.

11 When produce belonging to a person was distant from him [when] the time for its removal arrived, he should designate the presents [appropriately] and transfer them to their owners by giving them together with land. Alternatively, [he may give them to] someone who will acquire them for their owners. He may then recite the declaration the following day.

[The rationale is] that transferring movable property to a person together with landed property is a present that has been strengthened. He may not, however, transfer [the produce from] the tithes to them via an exchange, because it resembles a sale and [the Torah] speaks of giving, not selling, the tithes, terumah, and the other presents.

12 What source teaches that he cannot recite the declaration until he removes all the presents [from his possession]? [It is written:] "I have removed all the sacred substances from the house." "The sacred substances" refers to the second tithe and neta reva'i which are called "sanctified." "From the house" refers to challah, for it is a present given to the priests in one's home. [The prooftext continues:] "I gave it to the Levite" - this refers to the first tithe. "And I also gave it" - this implies that it was preceded by another present, i.e., the great terumah and terumat ma'aser. "To the stranger, the orphan, and the widow" - this refers to the tithe given to the poor, leket, shichachah, and pe'ah. [The latter three are mentioned] even though [the failure to give them] does not prevent recitation of the declaration.

13 The presents must be separated according to the desired order and afterwards, the declaration is made, as [implied by the continuation of the verse:] "according to all Your mitzvot which You commanded me." Thus if he gives the second tithe before the first tithe, he cannot recite this declaration.

If a person's tevel is burnt, he cannot make this declaration, for he did not separate the presents or give them to the people designated. In the era when the first tithe was given to the priests, the declaration was not made, [because it contains the words:] "I gave it to the Levite."

14 When a person possesses only the second tithe, he should make the declaration, for the fundamental dimension of the declaration concerns the [second] tithe. Similarly, if he possesses only the first fruits, he should make the declaration, for [the prooftext] states: "I removed the holy substances" and the first type of produce that is holy is the first fruits.

15 [The prooftext continues:] "I did not violate your commandments," i.e., he did not separate from one species for another, nor from produce that has been reaped for produce that is still attached to the ground, nor from produce that is attached to the ground for produce that has been reaped, nor from produce from the present year for that of the previous year, nor from produce of the previous year for that of the present year.
[The prooftext continues:] "I did not forget," I did not forget to bless Him and recall His name with regard to them. "I did not partake of it in a state of acute mourning"; thus if he partakes of it in a state of acute mourning, he does not recite the declaration. "I did not partake of it in a state of impurity," thus if he separates it in a state of acute mourning, he does not recite the declaration. "I did not give of it to a corpse." This implies that he did not use [money from the redemption of the tithes] for a coffin or shrouds, nor did he give it to other people in a state of mourning. "I heeded the voice of God my Lord," i.e., I brought it to the Temple. "I performed everything that You commanded me," I rejoiced. And I shared that rejoicing with others with it, as [Deuteronomy 26:11]: "And you share rejoice in all the good."

16 [The passage continues:] "Look down from Your holy habitation heaven... as You swore to our ancestors, a land flowing with milk and honey." This is a prayer that the fruits be flavorful.

17 Israelites and mamzerim may make this declaration, but not converts and freed slaves, because they do not have an ancestral portion in Eretz Yisrael and in the declaration one says: "And the land that You gave us." Priests and Levites may make the declaration. Although they did not receive a portion in the division of the land, they were granted cities in which to dwell.

Mishneh Torah, First Fruits and other Gifts to Priests Out…

1 There are 24 presents that are given to the priests. All of them are explicitly mentioned in the Torah. A covenant was established with Aaron over all of them. Any priest who does not acknowledge them does not have a portion in the priesthood and he is not given any of these presents.

2 Every [priest] who partakes of one of the presents [given to the priests] that is sanctified should recite a blessing: '[Blessed are You].. who sanctified us with the sanctity of Aaron and commanded us to partake of...' [mentioning the particular type of present he is eating].

3 Eight of the presents may be eaten by the priests only in the Sanctuary, within the walls of the Temple Courtyard. Five of them may be eaten only in Jerusalem within the walls of the city. According to Scriptural Law, there are five presents that are acquired [by the priests] only in Eretz Yisrael. There are five presents that they acquire both in Eretz Yisrael and in the Diaspora. And there is one present that that they acquire from the Temple's [property].

4 What are the eight that may be eaten only in Temple? The meat of the sin offering - this includes both sin-offerings of fowl and sin-offerings of animals, the meat of a guilt-offering, whether a definite guilt-offering or a guilt-offering brought because of doubt, communal peace offerings, [the portion of] the omer offering that remains, [the portion of] an Israelite's meal offering that remains, the two loaves [offered on Shavuot], the show bread, and the log of oil brought by a metzora. [All of] these may be eaten only in the Temple.

5 What are the five that are eaten only in Jerusalem? The breast and the leg of the peace offering, the portion granted [the priests] from the thanksgiving offering, the portion granted [the priests] from the ram brought by a nazirite, the firstborn of a kosher animal, and the first fruits. [all of] these may be eaten only in Jerusalem.

6 What are the five [that are given] in Eretz Yisrael? Terumah, terumat ma'aser, and challah - these three are sanctified, the first shearings, and an ancestral field [that was consecrated] - these are ordinary property. [The priests are granted] these according to Scriptural Law only in Eretz Yisrael. Terumot and challot from Eretz Yisrael may be eaten only in Eretz Yisrael.

7 What are the five that the priests acquire in all places? The presents [given when slaughtering animals], [the money given for] the redemption of a firstborn [son], [the lamb given for] the redemption of a firstborn [donkey], [property] stolen from a convert [who died heirless], and dedication offerings. These five are ordinary property.

8 The present that they acquire from the Temple's property is the hides from the burnt-offerings. This also applies to the hides from other sacrifices of the most holy order. They are all given to the priests.

9 The eight presents that may be eaten only in the Sanctuary are all sacrifices of the most holy order. They may be eaten only by male priests, as will be explained in the appropriate place. Concerning them, [Leviticus 6:22] states: 'All males among the priesthood shall partake of it.

10 The five [presents that may be eaten only] in Jerusalem are all sacrifices of lesser sanctity. [Both] males and females [of the priestly family] may partake of them. Concerning them, [Numbers 18:11] states: 'To you, and your sons and your daughters with you have I given them as an eternal decree.' [Although a woman may partake of them,] they are granted only to the males of the priestly family. For they are given to the men of the watch [serving in the Temple].

The fat and the blood of the firstborn [of kosher animals] was offered and only a male was allowed to offer it. Similarly, the hides of the sacrifices of the most sacred order, an ancestral field, dedication offerings, and the stolen property of a convert, are acquired only by the men of the priestly watch [of that week], as will be explained.

Similarly, the redemption of firstborn [sons is given] only to males of the priestly family, for concerning it, [Numbers 3:48] states: 'And you shall give the money to Aaron and his sons.' [Similarly, the redemption of] a firstborn donkey [is given] to males of the priestly family, for all the laws of the firstborn are parallel. [The redemption is given] to males and not females.

11 Thus you have learned that the presents given [directly] to females like males are five: terumah, terumat ma'aser, challah, the presents given when slaughtering an animal, and the first shearings.

What is the source that teaches that the first shearings may be given to a woman of the priestly family? 'The first of your grain, your wine, and your oil, and the first shearings of your flock shall you give to him' [Deuteronomy 18:4]. [The verse establishes an equivalence:] Just as [terumah,] the first of the grain, may be given to females as well as males, so too, the first shearings.

12 Our Sages reckoned these presents in another manner, stating: 24 presents for the priests were given to Aaron. They are 10 in the Temple, 4 in Jerusalem, and 10 in the outlying areas.

13 The ten in the Temple are: a) an animal brought as a sin-offering, b) a fowl brought as a sin-offering, c) a guilt-offering, d) a guilt-offering brought because of doubt, e) the communal peace-offerings, f) the log of oil brought by a nazirite, g) the two breads, h) the show bread, i) the remnants of the meal offering, and j) the remnants of the omer offering.

14 The four in Jerusalem are: a) the firstborn [kosher animal], b) the first fruits, c) the portion granted [the priests] from the thanksgiving offering and the portion granted [the priests] from the ram brought by a nazirite, and d) the hides of the sacrifices.

15 The ten in the outlying areas are: a) terumah, b) terumat ma'aser, c) challah, d) the first shearings, e) the presents given when slaughtering an animal, f) the redemption of a firstborn [son], g) the redemption of a firstborn donkey, h) a field that was designated as a dedication offering, i) an ancestral field, and j) the stolen property of a convert.

According to this reckoning, all of the portions given the priests from sacrifices of lesser sanctity are considered as one present. This includes: the breast and the leg that is given [the priest] from every peace offering, together with the bread that is given with them if [the peace offering] was a thanksgiving offering and the foreleg given the priest from the nazirite's ram, with the bread given with it, and the breast and the leg. Since they are all peace offerings, all of the portions given the priests are considered as one present.

16 AIl of the presents that are dependent on the sacrifices will be explained in their appropriate places in the laws of sacrifices. Similarly, [the laws pertaining to] the stolen property of a convert will be explained in Hilchot Gezeilah. We have already explained the laws governing an ancestral field and dedication offerings in Hilchot Arachin and the laws of terumah and terumat ma'aser in Hilchot Terumah. In the present halachot, I will explain the laws of the [priestly] presents that are not dependent on the sacrifices: the first fruits, challah, the presents given when slaughtering an animal, the first shearings, the redemption of a firstborn son, the redemption of a firstborn donkey.

1 It is a positive commandment to bring the first fruits to the Temple. [The obligation of] the first fruits applies only while the Temple is standing, and only in Eretz Yisrael, as [implied by Exodus 23:19]: 'Bring of the first ripened fruit of your land to the house of God your Lord.' According to Rabbinic decree, one should bring first fruits even from the cities of Sichon and Og and from Syria. For a person who purchases land in Syria is like one who purchases in Jerusalem. We do not bring the first fruits from the lands of Ammon and Moab and Babylon, even though they are liable for terumah and tithes according to Rabbinic decree. If one brings the first fruits from the Diaspora, they are not considered as first fruits.

2 The first fruits are brought only from the seven species which are mentioned when relating the praise of Eretz Yisrael. They are: wheat, barley, grapes, figs, pomegranates, olives, and dates. If one brought fruit from other species, it is not sanctifted.

3 We do not bring [first fruits] from the dates in the mountains, nor from the fruit from the valleys, not from oil-producing olives that are not of the highest quality, but rather from dates from the valleys and fruit from the mountains, for they are of the highest quality. If a person brought first fruits of inferior quality, e.g., dates from the mountains, figs that were perforated and had oil applied to them, dusty and smoked grapes, they are not consecrated.

4 We may not bring liquids as the first fruits with the exception of [oil from] olives and [wine from] grapes, as [implied by Deuteronomy 26:2 which speaks of]: 'the fruit of the land,' i.e., [the fruit and] not a beverage. If one brought beverages, they are not accepted.

5 People who are close to Jerusalem should bring fresh figs and grapes.

People who are distant should bring dried figs and raisins.

6 The first fruits should not be brought before Shavuot, for that holiday is referred to as 'the harvest festival, the first fruits of your work.' If one brings [them at that time], we do not accept them from him. Instead, they should be left there until Shavuot, at which time, he should make the declaration concerning them. Similarly, the first fruits should not be brought after Chanukah. For first fruits that ripen after Chanukah are considered as being of the coming year. They should be left until Shavuot.

7 The first fruits may not be brought from produce of the present harvest for produce of the previous harvest or from produce of the previous harvest for produce of the present harvest.
What is implied? One should not bring produce that budded before the 15th of Shvat as first fruits for produce that budded after the 15th of Shvat. [This applies] both to produce that is planted and produce that grows on its own, as [implied by Numbers 18: 13]: 'The first fruits of everything in their land.'

8 The obligation of the first fruits applies to the produce of partners, [implied by]: 'The first fruits of everything in their land.'

9 When produce grows in a flower pot, even if it has a hole or it grows in a ship, one should not bring first fruits from them at all. [for the prooftext] speaks of 'their land.' One should, however, bring from produce that grows on a roof or in a ruin.

10 [In all the following situations,] a person should not bring the first fruits from the produce that grows in one domain or the produce that grows in another domain. [These situations include] one who plants a tree in his field and extends it into his colleague's field or into the public domain, or the trunk of the tree was in his field and he extended its end in his field but there was a public road or a private path interrupting between the trunk and the end which was extended. [This is derived from Exodus 23:19]: "the first fruits of your land.' [Implied is that] all the growth [of the tree] must be from your land.'

11 If his colleague gave him permission [to implant the end] in his property even for a brief time, he may bring the first fruits. If the tree was close to his colleague's boundary or leaned into his colleague's field [and he planted there], even though he was obligated to distance [his planting], he may bring [the first fruits] and recite the declaration, for Joshua gave the land [to our people] as an inheritance with that intent.

12 Sharecroppers, tenant farmers, men of force who compel the owners [to sell] their land and purchase it for a low price, and robbers may not bring first fruits, because [the prooftext] states: 'the first fruits of your land.' [This applies] even when the owners despair [of recovering their land].

13 When a person purchases a tree in a field belonging to a friend, he may not bring [the first fruits], because he does not own land. [If he purchases] three [trees], he does own land. Even if he formally acquired only the trees, it is as if he owns land. If he purchased one tree and the land around it, he should bring [the first fruits].

14 When a person purchases fruit that has been harvested and purchases the land [on which they grew], he should bring the first fruits, because he possesses both land and the fruits.

When one sells a colleague fruit, but not the land, even when the fruit is still attached to the land, [neither the seller, nor the purchaser may bring the first fruits]. The seller may not bring them, because he does not own the fruits. The purchaser may not bring them, because he does not own the land. If the seller buys the fruit back from the purchaser, he may bring [the first fruits], because he [now] owns [both] the land and its produce.

15 When a person sells his property to a gentile and later purchases it back from him, he must bring the first fruits from it according to Scriptural Law. [The rationale is that] it is not absolved from the mitzvah because of the gentile's purchase, as we explained.

16 [Although] one nullified an asherah, the first fruits should not be brought from its produce. For the first fruits are like the sacrifices of the Temple.

17 There is no set measure for the first fruits according to Scriptural Law. According to Rabbinic Law, one should give one sixtieth of the crop. If one desires to set aside his entire crop as first fruits, he may.

18 When a person separated his first fruits and afterwards added to them or adorned them, the addition is also considered as the first fruits.

When does the above apply? When he brought [the first fruits] from Eretz

Yisrael. If, however, he brought them from Transjordan or Syria, they are not as the first fruits. Even though they are not considered as the first fruits, they should only be eaten in a state of ritual purity. No matter where it is from, the first fruits should only be adorned with fruit from the seven species [mentioned in the praise of Eretz Yisrael].

19 How should one separate the first fruits? A person descends to his field, sees a fig tree, a cluster [of grapes], and/or a pomegranate tree that has budded, and ties them with a reed. He should say: "These are the first fruits.' They become designated as first fruits even though they are attached to the ground after they have been given that title, even though they have not ripened entirely.

When they ripen and are reaped from the ground, it is not necessary to designate them again. If he did not designate them while attached or call them first fruits and then he reaped them, he should designate them after he reaps them.

If his entire harvest becomes impure, he should not designate the impure produce as first fruits. Instead, as an initial preference, he should set aside other produce as first fruits for the impure produce. It appears to me that if he does not have other produce, to separate [as first fruits], he should not set them aside to be destroyed. Similarly, it appears to me that if the first fruits become impure, he should not use them as kindling for a furnace, because they are like objects consecrated for the Temple.

20 When a person set aside his first fruits and they rotted away, were taken by others, lost, stolen, or became impure, he is obligated to set aside others in place of them, as [Exodus 23:19] states: '...bring to the house of God your Lord.' This teaches that one is liable to replace them until he brings them to the Temple Mount.

21 If a person set aside his first fruits to bring them to Jerusalem himself, he should not send them with an agent If, however, he initially harvested them with the intent of sending them [to the Temple] with an agent, it is permitted for him to do so.

1 The first fruits are given to the men of the priestly watch [on duty at that time]. They divide them among themselves like the Temple sacrifices. We have already explained that [the first fruits] are called terumah. Therefore a non-priest who partakes of the first fruits anywhere is liable for death at the hand of heaven, provided he partook of them after they entered the walls of Jerusalem.

2 If a portion [of the first fruits] were inside Jerusalem and a portion were outside, [a non-priest] is liable for death for the portion that is inside and it is considered as consecrated property in all contexts. The portion that is outside is considered as ordinary property in all contexts.

3 When a priest partakes of the first fruits outside of Jerusalem after they have entered inside [the city's] walls, he is liable for lashes according to Scriptural Law, as [Deuteronomy 12:17] states: 'You may not eat within your gates... the terumah of your hand.' [The latter term] refers to the first fruits, as we explained in Hilchot Terumah.

Similarly, if a priest partakes of them in Jerusalem before they are placed in the Temple courtyard, he is liable for lashes according to Scriptural Law, as if he partook of them outside of Jerusalem, because [the first fruits] must be placed down in the Temple Courtyard as [ibid. 26:10] states: 'And you shall place them before the altar of God your Lord.'

4 After the person bringing [the first fruits] places them down in the Temple Courtyard, they are permitted to the priest even though the former has not recited the declaration over them. When the first fruits were taken out of their place and then returned, they are permitted to be eaten.

5 [The laws applying to] partaking of the first fruits are identical [to those applying] to partaking of terumah in all of their details. In addition, [the following stringencies apply with regard] to first fruits. They are forbidden to one in the acute state of onein mourning. They must be brought to [Jerusalem]. And a priest who is ritually pure who partook of the first fruits that were impure receives lashes like an Israelite who is ritually pure who partook of the second tithe that became impure. [These concepts] do not apply with regard to terumah.

6 What is the source which teaches that the first fruits are forbidden to an onein? With regard to these fruits, [Deuteronomy 26:11] states: 'And you shall rejoice in all the good.' Implied is that they have to be eaten in a state of happiness and not in a state of acute mourning. One who partakes of [these fruits] in a state of acute mourning is liable for stripes for rebellious conduct.

7 The first fruits must [be brought in] a container, as [ibid.:2] states: 'And you shall place them in a container.' The most preferable way of performing the mitzvah is to bring each type of fruit in a separate container. If one brings them [all] in one container, he has fulfilled his obligation. [Even in such an instance,] he should not bring them mixed together. Instead, he should bring the barley below, wheat on top of it, olives on top of it, dates on top of them, pomegranates on top of them, and figs on the top of the container. There should be a substance, e.g., palm leaves, wild grass, or leaves, or the like, that intervenes between each type of produce. One should surround the figs with clusters of grapes from the outside.

8 When a person brings the first fruits in a metal container, the priest takes them and returns the container to its owner. If he brings them in a reed or grass basket or the like, both the first fruits and the basket should be given to the priests. If the first fruits become impure, the baskets should not be given to the priests.

9 When they would bring the first fruits, they would also bring turtle doves and doves in their hands. Similarly, they would hang turtle doves and doves from the sides of the baskets in order to adorn the first fruits. Those that were with the baskets would be offered as burnt offerings and those they would bring by hand would be given to the priests [as presents].

10 It is a positive commandment to make a declaration in the Temple concerning the first fruits when they are brought. One should begin and say [Deuteronomy 26:3-10]: 'I am making a statement to God your Lord that I have come to the land... An Aramean [sought] to destroy my ancestor...' until he completes the entire passage, concluding: '...You gave me, O God.' [This declaration] may only be made in the Holy Tongue, as it states: 'And you shall respond and say.'

11 At first, those who knew how to read would read [the passage themselves] and those who did not know how to read would read after one who read for them. [As a result,] those who did not know how to read would refrain from bringing [the first fruits] so that they would not be embarrassed. [Hence] the court ordained that the passage would be read for one who knows how to read like it is read for one who does not know.

12 A person who brings the first fruits is permitted to give them to his servant or his relative [to carry] throughout the journey until he reaches the Temple Mount. When he reaches the Temple Mount, even if he is a king of Israel, he must place the basket on his own shoulder and proceed until he reaches the Temple Courtyard. He should read [the declaration,] 'I am making a statement to God your Lord today...,' while the basket is still on his shoulder. He then removes the basket from his shoulder. While he holds it by its edge, the priest puts his hand below it and raises it [up and down and to all four directions]. He then reads: An Aramean [sought] to destroy my ancestor and he descended to Egypt...' until he completes the entire passage.' He then places the first fruits at the side of the altar, at the southwest comer, on the south side of the altar. He then prostrates himself and departs.

What is the source which teaches that the first fruits must be raised [up and down and to all four directions]? [The above prooftext states:] 'And the priest shall take the basket from your hand,' including [an obligation to] raise the first fruits [up and down and to all four directions]. Just as [the first fruits] must be raised [up and down and to all four directions], so to they require that a peace offering be brought with them and song [accompany their offering], for with regard to them, [ibid.:11] states: 'And you shall rejoice in all the good.' [Now,] with regard to the festivals, [ibid. states: 'And you shall rejoice on your festivals.' [An association is drawn between the two:] Just as the happiness of the festivals is marked by peace offerings, so too, peace offerings [are required] here. [Nevertheless,] these offerings are not absolute requirements.

13 When is a song pronounced over them? When they reach the Temple courtyard. The Levites would begin proclaiming: 'I will exalt You God, for You have drawn me up...' (Psalms 30:2 .

14 [When bringing] the first fruits, it is necessary that one remain [in Jerusalem] overnight.

What is implied? When a person brought his first fruits to the Temple, made the declaration, and offered his peace offerings, he should not depart from Jerusalem that day to return home. Instead, he should stay in Jerusalem overnight and return to his city on the following day, as [Deuteronomy 16:7] states: 'And you shall turn back in the morning and return to your tent.' [That verse teaches a general principle:] All occasions when you turn from the Temple when you visit it should only be in the morning.

Thus the first fruits require seven factors: a) that they be brought to [Jerusalem], b) [in a] container, c) that the declaration be recited, d) that they be accompanied by a peace offering, e) and song, f) that they be raised [up and down and to all four directions], and g) that the person stay overnight [in Jerusalem].

1 Whenever anyone brings the first fruits, it is necessary that a [peace] offering be brought, song [be recited], they be raised [up and down and to all four directions] and the person remain in Jerusalem overnight. The declaration, however, is not a universal requirement. There are some who are obligated to bring the first fruits, but who do not recite the declaration over them.

2 The following must bring [the first fruits], but may not recite the declaration: a woman, a tumtum and an androgynous - for there is a doubt whether they are considered as a female; none of these can say "[the land] which You gave me," and similarly, a guardian, a servant, and an agent, because they cannot say "which You gave me."

3 A convert, by contrast, may bring the first fruits and make the declaration, for [Genesis 17:5] states with regard to Abraham: "I have made you a father to a multitude of nations." Implied is that he is the father of all those who enter under the shelter of the Divine presence. The oath that his descendants would inherit the land was given to Abraham first. Similarly, the priest and the Levites bring [first fruits] and make a declaration, because they have cities in which to dwell.

4 A person who purchases two trees in his colleague's field must bring [the first fruits], but may not recite the declaration. [The rationale is that] there is a doubt whether he has a right to the land [on which the trees stand] or not.

What should he do? He should first consecrate them to the Temple treasury for it is possible that they are ordinary produce and non-consecrated food is not brought into the Temple Courtyard. The priest then redeems them from the Temple treasury and partakes of them.

He must separate terumah and the tithes from them, because of the possibility that they are ordinary produce. He must give the tithes from them to the priests, because it is a possibility that they are first fruits and forbidden to non-priests. He should not bring them himself, but instead, send them via an agent so that [the fact] that the declaration [is not recited] will not prevent them from being eaten. For whenever a declaration concerning [first fruits] is not fit to be made because of a doubt concerning their status, [the fact that] a declaration [is not recited] prevents it [from being eaten].

5 If one set aside his first fruits and then sold his field, he should bring them, but not make the declaration, because he cannot say: "[the land] which You gave me," since it no longer belongs to him. The purchaser is not required to separate other first fruits, because the seller has already separated them. If, however, he does separate them, he should bring them, but not make the declaration. From another species [of produce], he should set aside the first fruits, bring them, and make the declaration.

6 When a person sells [the right to harvest] the produce of his field, the purchaser should bring [the first fruits], but not make the declaration. [The rationale is that] the acquisition of the produce is not equivalent to the acquisition of [the land] itself. When, however, one brings first fruits from the property of his wife, he makes the declaration even though he does not own the actual land, as [implied by Deuteronomy 26:11]: "which God, your Lord, has given you and your household." Even if his wife dies after he has set aside [the first fruits] and he is in the midst of his journey [to Jerusalem], he should bring [the first fruits] and make the declaration.

7 When a person sells his field or sells trees and the land around them in the era when the Jubilee year is observed, [the purchaser] should bring [the first fruits] and make the declaration in the first Jubilee. [The rationale is that] the seller has not taken for granted that the land will be returned to him. If, however, he sold it again in the second Jubilee, [the purchaser] should bring [the first fruits], but should not make the declaration. For he is certain that he will receive only the produce, and the acquisition of the produce is not equivalent to the acquisition of [the land] itself.

8 When a person set aside his first fruits and became mortally ill, the one who is fit to inherit his [estate] should bring the first fruits without making the declaration. When a person set aside his first fruits and sent them with an agent, but the agent died in the midst of the journey, even if the owner brought them, he should not make the delaration. [The rationale is that the phrase (Deuteronomy 26:2 :] "And you shall take... and you shall bring" does not apply unless the taking and the bringing are as one.

9 When a person set aside his first fruits, but they were lost before they reached the Temple Mount and therefore he separated others instead of them, he should bring the second fruits, but should not make the declaration. [The rationale is that] he cannot say [that he is bringing] "the first fruits of the land," for those that he is bringing are not the first fruits. One is not liable for an additional fifth [for partaking of] the produce separated second, as [he would had he partaken of] the first fruits.

10 When a person brings his first fruits and they become impure in the Temple Courtyard, he should spill out the basket there. He does not make the delaration.

11 If a person brought his first fruits from one species and made the declaration and afterwards brings first fruits from another species, he should not make the declaration for them. [This is derived from the phrase (Deuteronomy 26:3 :] "I am making a statement today." [Implied is that] he makes one statement and not two.

12 If a person separated his first fruits and then the spring [that served as his field's water supply] dried up or the tree [from which they were reaped] was cut down, he should bring them, but should not make the declaration. [The rationale is that] he is like someone who no longer possesses the land, because it has been ruined.

13 When a person brings his first fruits between Sukkot and Chanukah- even if he set them aside before Sukkot - he should bring them without making the declaration, [as implied by Deuteronomy 26:11]: "You shall rejoice in all the good." [Implied is that] the declaration should be made only in a time of happiness, [i.e.,] between Shavuot and the end of Sukkot. All individuals other than these must bring their first fruits and make the declaration.

14 The first fruits, the terumot, challah, the principal and the fifth, and the presents given when slaughtering an animal are a priest's private property. He may use them to purchase servants, land, or a non-kosher animal. A debtor of his may collect them as payment for his debt and a woman may take them in lieu of the money due her by virtue of her ketubah. And they may be used to purchase a Torah scroll.

15 The first fruits and the terumot are forbidden to be eaten by non-priests. [Generally,] when the first fruits are mixed with ordinary produce, they are permitted if there is 101 times the original amount as is the law with regard to terumah. Nevertheless, if they become mixed with the same species of ordinary produce in Jerusalem, [the mixture] is forbidden even if the slightest amount of [the first fruits are mixed in] as [is the law regarding] the second tithe. [The rationale is that] since [they are located in Jerusalem,] the place where one partakes of them, they are considered like an entity that could become permitted. Although the first fruits are forbidden to non-priests even in Jerusalem, nevertheless, even the slightest presence of them in a mixture causes it to be forbidden.

Even if one sowed the first fruits after they were brought to Jerusalem, even the slightest amount of produce that grows from them causes a mixture to become forbidden. If, however, one sows the first fruits before they were brought to Jerusalem, the produce that grows from them is ordinary produce.

16 How are the first fruits brought to Jerusalem? All of [the inhabitants of] the towns in a regional area gather in the central town of the regional area, so that they will not ascend to Jerusalem as individuals, for [Proverbs 14:28] teaches: "The glory of the King is among the multitude of people."

They come and sleep in the city's thoroughfare, but they do not enter the homes lest they contract impurity because of being under the same shelter as a corpse. In the morning, the leader calls out: "Arise and let us ascend to Zion, to God our Lord." An ox with its horns glazed with gold leads the procession. A crown of olive [branches] are placed on its head, to publicize that the first fruits come from the seven species [for which Eretz Yisrael is praised]. A flute plays before them until they arrive close to Jerusalem. They walk the entire way and proclaim: "I rejoiced when it was told me: 'Let us go to the house of God.'

They would travel for only two thirds of the day. When they arrived close to Jerusalem they sent emissaries to notify the inhabitants of Jerusalem and they adorned their first fruits and beautified them. If they had [some] produce that was fresh and other produce that was dried, the fresh produce was placed on top. The leaders of the Israelites and of the priests and the Temple treasurers would go out from Jerusalem to greet them. [The size of the welcoming party] was proportionate to the number of people who come. If many people come, many go out to greet them; if few, few. When they have all entered the gates of Jerusalem, they begin declaring: "Our legs were standing in your gates, O Jerusalem" (ibid.).

17 All of the artisans in Jerusalem would stand in honor of them and would greet them: "Our brethren, the inhabitants of so-and-so, you have come in peace." They proceed through Jerusalem while the flute is sounded until they reach the Temple Mount. When they reach the Temple Mount, each one should carry the first fruits on his shoulders and say: "Halleluyah. Praise God in His holiness" [Psalm 150:1] until [the conclusion of that psalm]: "May all the souls praise You." They proceed through the Temple Mount until they reach the Temple Courtyard. When they reach the Temple Courtyard, the Levites open with the song [Psalm 30]: "I will exalt You, for You have drawn me up..."

1 It is a positive commandment to separate a portion that is raised up from the dough [and given] to a priest, as [Numbers 15:20] states: "Raise up the first of your dough, the challah, as an offering...." According to Scriptural Law, this first portion does not have a minimum measure. Instead, even if one set aside a portion the size of a barley corn, he has absolved the entire dough. When a person designates his entire dough as challah, his deeds are of no consequence unless he leaves a portion of it [for himself].

2 According to Rabbinic Law, one should separate one twenty-fourth of the dough, so that there will be a [significant] present for the priest. [This is derived from Deuteronomy 14:4 which] states: "Give him," i.e., give him something that is fit to be called a gift.

A baker who makes a dough to be sold in the market place should separate one forty-eighth. [The rationale is that] since his dough is larger, this measure contains [enough] to be a [significant] present.

3 Even when a private person makes dough for [the wedding] celebration of his son, he should separate one twenty-fourth even though it is large, so as not to make a distinction in [the requirements of] a dough made by a private person. [Conversely,] when a baker makes a small dough, [he must separate only] one forty-eighth, so as not to make a distinction in [the requirements of] a dough made by a baker.

4 If a dough became impure unknowingly or because of forces beyond one's control, one need not separate more than one forty-eighth. If he purposefully made it impure, he must separate a twenty-fourth, so that the sinner will not benefit.

Impure challah is permitted to be used by a priest as kindling fuel like impure terumah.

5 According to Scriptural law, we are only obligated to separate challah in Eretz Yisrael, as [Numbers 15:19] states: "When you partake of the bread of the land...," and only when the entire Jewish people are located there, as [ibid.:18] states: "When you enter," i.e., when you all enter and not only when a portion of you enter. For this reason, in the present era - and even in the era of Ezra in Eretz Yisrael - [the observance of] challah is only a Rabbinic decree, as we explained with regard to terumah.

6 When the produce of the Diaspora is brought to Eretz [Yisrael], challah must be separated from it. When produce from Eretz [Yisrael], are brought to the Diaspora, they are exempt. [This is derived from ibid.:] "to which I will bring you." [Implied is that in that land,] you are liable, whether for the produce of the land itself or for that of other lands.

7 Challah should also be separated in the Diaspora by Rabbinic decree so that the Jewish people will not forget the laws of challah. Challah from the Diaspora should not be brought to Eretz Yisrael, just as terumah and first fruits from there should not be brought [to Eretz Yisrael]. If one should bring [such challah], it should be left to the day before Pesach and burned like terumah.

8 There are three different sets of laws that apply to challah in three different lands. In the entire area that was settled by those who returned from Babylonia until Kziv, one challah should be separated according to the appropriate measure and the priests may partake of it. In the remaining portions of Eretz Yisrael that were settled by the Jews who came out of Egypt, but not by those who returned from Babylonia - i.e., from Kziv until Amanah - two challot should be separated. One should be burnt and one should be eaten.

Why do we separate two challot there? Because the first challah is impure, because this land was not sanctified in the time of Ezra and the first sanctification was nullified after the Jews were exiled. [Nevertheless,] since [the land] is from Eretz Yisrael, a challah - one forty-eighth [of the dough] is separated and is burnt. A second challah is also separated and given to a priest to eat, so that people will not say that pure terumah should be burnt. For the first challah was burnt even though it did not contract impurity in a manner that was known to all. This second challah does not have a minimum measure. Instead, one may separate whatever he desires, because it is a Rabbinic ordinance.

In all of the lands from Amanah and beyond, whether in Syria or other lands, two challot should be separated: One is burnt so that people should not say we saw impure terumah being eaten and one is eaten so that the laws of challah will not be forgotten by the Jewish people. [Since] both of these are Rabbinic institutions, it is preferable to make the one that is eaten larger. Accordingly, there is no minimum measure for the one that is burnt. Even the slightest amount [is acceptable]. The one which is eaten should be one forty-eighth [of the dough]. It is permitted to be eaten by zavim and zavot- and needless to say, other people who are ritually impure.

9 In the present age when there is no pure dough, because of the impurity [imparted] by a human corpse, one challah - one forty-eighth [of the dough] - is separated in all Eretz Yisrael [in the present era]. [This applies even though] it is burnt, because it is impure, since the fundamental obligation to separate it is Scriptural. As was the law in previous ages, from Kziv to Amanah, a second challah is also separated for a priest to eat. There is no mimimum measure for it.

10 Although challah from the Diaspora is impure, since its fundamental requirement is a Rabbinic ordinance, it is forbidden to be eaten only by priests who are impure because of impurity that result from a physical condition. These include [priests] who had a seminal emission, zavim, zavot, niddot, women who give birth, and people afflicted by tzara'at. Others who are impure because they have been in contact with other sources of impurity, even those who are impure because of contact with a corpse, are permitted to partake of it.

Accordingly, if there was a priest who was a minor in the Diaspora - whether in Syria or in other lands - and one desired to separate [only] one challah, he could separate one forty-eighth of the dough. It could be eaten by a priest who is a minor who never had a seminal emission or a female from the priestly family who never menstruated. The person need not separate a second [challah].

11 Similarly, if a priest who was an adult immersed himself [in a mikveh and thus purified himself from the impurity resulting from] the emission of semen or zivut, he may partake of this first challah. Then [the one who separated it] need not separate a second challah in the Diaspora. [This applies] even though the sun has not set [after he immersed himself] and although he remains ritually impure due to the impurity imparted by a corpse. Anyone who separates challah should recite the blessing: "[Blessed are You...] Who sanctified us with His commandments and commanded us to separate challah." [This applies both] in Eretz Yisrael and in the Diaspora. Just as one recites a blessing when [separating challah that] is ritually pure, he should recite a blessing when separating the impure.

Therefore a naked man should not separate challah, because he may not recite the blessing. A naked woman who is sitting with her entire genital area covered by the ground may separate challah and recite a blessing.

12 A niddah and the like may recite a blessing and separate challah in the Diaspora. For she is not cautioned against touching the challah, only against partaking of it. If there is a priest who was a minor or [an adult] priest who immersed himself who is permitted to partake of it as we explained, he may partake of it, [eating] together with a non-priest at the same table. [The rationale is that] it does not create a forbidden mixture, even if there are equal quantities of it and ordinary food. It may be given to an unlearned priest because [the woman] is impure because of the air of the Diaspora, and the prohibition against a priest actively seeking to receive his presents does not apply in this instance.

If a person desires to eat first and then separate the challah in the Diaspora, he is permitted, for the fundamental obligation is Rabbinic in origin.

13 Challah is called terumah. Therefore it may only be separated from [dough] in the same location like terumah. And as an initial preference, one may not separate pure [dough as challah] for impure dough.

14 All of those individuals concerning whom it was said they should not separate terumah and if they separate it, the separation is invalid, are governed by the same laws with regard to challah. In all situations concerning which it was said that terumah should not be separated from this type of produce for another, challah should also not be separated. Whoever may not partake of terumah, may not partake of challah. Whoever may partake of terumah may partake of challah.

15 A blind person and an intoxicated person may separate challah as an initial preference. For with regard to dough, there is no inferior or superior portions that he must distinguish and separate from the superior portion.

1 One who purchases bread from a baker is obligated [to separate] challah. He may separate a portion from bread freshly taken from the oven for bread that has cooled or from bread that has cooled for bread freshly taken from the oven. [This applies] even with regard to many trays of bread.

2 The obligation [to separate] challah applies only to [dough from] the five species of grain: wheat barley, rye, oats, and spelt, as [implied by Numbers 15:19]: "When you partake of the bread of the land." The term "bread" refers only to a loaf made from these five species. If, however, one makes bread from rice, millet, or other legumes, there is no obligation of challah at all.

3 Although there is no obligation to separate terumah from leket, shichachah, pe'ah, grain which is ownerless, and grain which did not reach a third of its growth, there is an obligation to separate challah from these. Similarly, there is an obligation to separate challah [from dough made from grain in the following circumstances]: the tithes were separated from the grain early while it was still stalks and terumat ma'aser was separated from it, even though the portion of the great terumah is still included in it, [grain that was from] the second tithe or consecrated property that was redeemed, the extra [portions of barley harvested for] the omer offering, the two loaves [prepared to be offered on Shavuot], and [the loaves prepared for] the showbread which were redeemed.

4 When a dough was made from grain from the second tithe in Jerusalem or from grain from the Sabbatical year, or when there is a doubt whether the dough was made from a mixture of terumah and ordinary produce, there is an obligation to separate challah. A mixture of terumah and ordinary produce is exempt from the obligation of challah.

5 The loaves for the thanksgiving offering and the wafers for the nazirite offering which a person made for himself are exempt from the obligation of challah, for they are sanctified. [If they were made] to sell in the market place to nazirites and to those bringing thanksgiving offerings, there is an obligation to separate challah, since [the baker] has the intent that if they are not sold [for sacrificial purposes], he will eat them.

6 There is an obligation to separate challah from a dough made for partners and a dough made for many people.

7 When a person makes dough using grain that is tevel - whether the challah is separated before terumah or the terumah separated before challah - what he did is effective. If he separated the challah first, he should not partake of it until he separates terumah and terumat ma'aser for it. If he separated terumah first, he should not partake of it until he separates challah.

8 When a person makes a dough with the intent of feeding the bread baked from it to a domesticated animal or a wild animal, it is exempt from challah. There is an obligation to separate challah from a dough made for dogs which is eaten by the shepherds. A dough made by a gentile is exempt from challah.

9 If a gentile and a Jew were partners in a dough and the portion owned by the Jew was large enough to be liable for challah, it is liable for challah.

10 When a gentile separates challah even in Eretz Yisrael, it is not challah. Instead, we inform him that he does not have to [observe this mitzvah. The dough separated] may be eaten by a non-priest.
Why do we not suspect that maybe the dough belonged to a Jew and he gave it to a gentile so that it will be exempt? Because if a Jew wanted to exempt himself he could do so by making his dough smaller than the required measure.

11 [The following laws apply when a person] mixes flour from wheat and rice flour and makes a dough: If it has the flavor of grain, challah must be separated from it. If not, it is exempt. Even if one placed yeast from wheat into a dough from rice, one is obligated to separate challah from it if it has the flavor of wheat. If it does not have that flavor, it is exempt.

12 There is an obligation to separate challah in all [the following instances]: a dough that was kneaded with wine, oil, or honey, or with boiling water, or one in which spices where placed, water was boiled and flour was placed inside of it and a dough was kneaded. [And challah must be separated when] dough was baked whether in an oven or [in a pit] in the earth, whether in a frying pan or a deep pan, whether first one attached the dough to the frying pan or the deep pan and then heated them with fire from below until the loaf was baked or one heated them first and then attached the dough.

If, however, one made a dough to dry it in the sun alone or to cook it in a pot, it is exempt from challah, for [dough cooked] in the sun is not bread whether it was kneaded with water or other liquids. Similarly, roasted grain that was kneaded whether with water or honey and which is eaten without being baked is exempt, for the obligation of challah applies only to a dough that will ultimately be baked as bread for human consumption.

13 When a dough was first kneaded to make a dough to be cooked in the sun and then the person completed making it for a loaf of bread, or he began making it to bake bread and completed it to cook it in the sun and similarly, when roasted flour was kneaded to bake a loaf of bread, there is an obligation to separate challah.

14 When bread was baked to be used for kutach, the manner in which it is made indicates the intent. If it was made as cakes, there is an obligation to separate challah. If he made it in strips, it is exempt from challah.

15 What is the minimum measure of dough from which we are obligated to separate challah? An entire omer of flour, whether from one of the five species or from all five together, for they are all combined to reach the minimum measure.

What is the measure of an omer? One fifth [of a kab] less than two kabbin. A kab is four lugim and a log is four revi'iot. A revi'it is the volume of a cube two fingerbreadths by two fingerbreadths by a height of two and seven tenths fingerbreadths. A fingerbreadth refers to the width of a thumb.

Thus an omer is a measure that is ten fingerbreadths by ten fingerbreadths by a height of approximately 3 and one ninth fingerbreadths. Similarly, a cube with each side six and seven ninths fingerbreadths produces a measure of an omer.

How much does this measure contain? The volume of 43 and 1/5 eggs. This is equivalent to the weight of 86 2/3 selaim of Egyptian wheat flour. This is equivalent to 520 zuz of Egyptian zuzim at present. A measure that comprises such a weight of wheat is used universally to measure for the separation of challah.

16 It is forbidden for a person to make his dough less than the minimum measure in order to free it from the obligation of challah. When a person separates challah from a dough that is smaller than the prescribed measure, his actions are of no consequence and the dough is ordinary dough as

When a person made a dough that is less than the prescribed measure, baked it, and put the loaf in a basket, baked another loaf and put it in the basket, and [continued doing this] until a measure from which challah [must be separated] was collected in the basket, the basket joins them together [as a single entity, establishing an obligation for] challah. He must separate challah from the bread. This is derived [from the prooftext mentioned above]: "When you partake of the bread of the land." [The verse] teaches that one should separate [challah] from [bread] that is baked. An oven, [however,] does not join loaves together [to create an obligation to separate] challah.

17 If [small] loaves were joined together and a quantity equal to the measure of challah was gathered together, there is an obligation to separate challah. [This applies] even if they are not placed in a basket [together]. If one baked loaves a little bit at a time and gathered together the entire quantity on a board that does not have a cavity, there is a doubt regarding [the matter]. If [the obligation to separate] challah is of Rabbinic origin, one is not obligated to separate it until they are gathered in a container with a cavity.

18 When flour was not sifted, but instead kneaded together with its bran, since the entire measure of the flour comprises an omer, there is an obligation [to separate] challah. If, however, one removed the bran from the flour and then completed the [required] measure of dough by returning the bran to the flour, there is no obligation to separate challah.

19 When a baker makes a dough to become yeast and divide it up, there is an obligation [to separate] challah, for if it is not sold, he will use it as bread. If, however, one makes a dough to divide it while dough, it is exempt.

20 [The following law applies when] women give flour to a baker to make yeast. If none of them individually [gave enough flour to make a dough] that comprises the required measure - even though [the dough made from the flour which] they all [gave] does - it is exempt.

1 [The following laws apply when] there are two doughs that when combined comprise the measure that obligates the separation of challah, but neither comprises that measure alone should they touch each other and become attached to each other. If they belong to two individuals, they are exempt from challah even though they are of the same type of grain. [The rationale is that] we assume that the two people object [to the combination of their doughs]. If it is known that they would not object to the combination of their doughs, they are considered as one.

2 [Different rules apply if] the two belonged to one person. If they were from one type [of grain], they are combined and challah is obligated to be separated from them. If they are from two types, they are not combined. [The rationale is that] we assume that one person does not object [to the combination of his doughs]. If he objects [to their combination and endeavors] that one dough not touch the other or become mixed with it, they are not considered as one, even if they are of one type of grain.

3 What is meant by the statement that if they belonged to one person and were from the same type [of grain] they are combined? When a dough from wheat touches a dough from spelt, they are combined. If it touched [a dough from] another type of grain, they are not combined. Similarly, if a dough of barley touches a dough of spelt, oats, or rye, or doughs of spelt, oats, or rye touch each other, they can be combined.

4 A dough from grain from one year should not be combined with a dough from grain from the previous year even though they are of the same species. [This is a decree,] lest people say that terumah may be separated from new grain for old grain. A person should not separate [the challah] from the middle of the two. Instead, he should bring another dough - either from this year or the previous - and combine it with them to complete the required measure.

When does the above apply? When one dough touches another. If, however, one mixes flour from the species of grain and makes a single dough from one of them, the five are combined to comprise the measure of dough required for challah, as we explained.

5 When there is a dough that is less than the required measure on one side and another dough less than the required measure on the other side, and a dough that is exempt from challah in the middle - e.g., a dough of rice, a dough of terumah [flour] or from terumah [flour] that was mixed with ordinary flour, or a dough from a gentile - [the doughs] are not combined even though they touch each other. [The rationale is that] an entity that is exempt from challah separates in the middle.

6 When, by contrast, there is a dough from which challah was separated between them, [the two outer doughs] can be combined, because originally, there was an obligation to separate challah from the dough in the center. Similarly, if a dough that was consecrated was in the center, they are combined, [because that dough] is fit to be redeemed [at which point,] there will be an obligation to separate challah from it. Similarly, if there was a dough of another type of grain, a dough belonging to another person, or a dough from a different year between them, the doughs on the sides are combined [to comprise an obligation to separate] challah.

7 There were two doughs, each one of them less than the minimum measure for challah. One separated challah from each of them. Afterwards, they touched each other and [the combined doughs] comprise the [required] measure. There is an obligation to separate challah [from the combined doughs], for the challot separated originally are of no consequence.

8 Two gentiles made a dough comprising the required measure [for challah] and divided it. Afterwards, they converted and after the conversion, each one added to his portion until it comprised the [required] measure. There is an obligation [to separate] challah. [The rationale is that] there was no time that it was of the size obligating [challah] while they were gentiles, because each was to receive less than the required measure.

9 If, however, two Jews made [a dough] in the above manner and then, they divided it and each one of them added to his portion until it comprised the required measure, it is exempt. [The rationale is that] there was a time when there would have been an obligation [to separate challah from the original dough] and they were exempt at that time, because the dough was made to be divided.

10 [Different rules apply when], by contrast, the dough was owned by a gentile and a Jew in partnership and they divided it. If, afterwards, the gentile converted and then added to his portion and the Jew added to his portion until each one of them completed the measure that requires the separation of challah, there is an obligation to separate challah from the dough of the Jew, but the dough of the gentile is exempt.

11 [The following laws apply when a person] takes yeast from a dough from which challah was not separated and places it in a dough from which challah was separated. He should bring a second dough that - together with this yeast - will comprise a measure that obligates the separation of challah and combine it with the dough from which challah was separated. He should then separate from the second dough the appropriate measure of challah for it and for the yeast. [In this manner,] he is separating [challah] from [dough] that is in the same place. If he does not have a second dough, the entire [first dough] is considered as tevel. He should separate challah for the entire amount. [The rationale is that] when tevel is mixed with its own type, even the slightest amount causes the mixture to become forbidden.

12 A dough from which challah has not been separated is like ordinary produce and not like challah with regard to the laws of ritual purity. As will be explained in the appropriate place, impurity of the second degree does not bring about impurity of the third degree with regard to ordinary produce.

It is permitted to cause ordinary produce to contract ritual impurity in Eretz Yisrael. Therefore when there are two doughs, one that is ritually impure and one that is ritually pure, one may take [a portion of dough] equivalent to the measure of challah to be separated from both of them from a dough from which challah was not separated and place it in the center close to the pure dough. He should then extend a portion of the impure dough the size of an egg to the pure dough so that he will be able to separate challah from the dough in the same place.

13 A person may make a pure dough and refrain from separating challah from it, setting it - or a portion of it - aside to continuously separate challot from other doughs with it until the dough set aside becomes challah in its entirety, provided [the dough set aside] does not become spoiled to the point that it is no longer fit for human consumption. [This applies] even if the doughs became impure. Once the dough is no longer fit for human consumption, [challah] cannot be separated with it.

When does the above apply? When there is a question whether or not challah has been separated from the doughs for which he is separating challah. [The rationale is that] challah of a doubtful status may be taken from the pure dough for the impure as an initial preference and the two need not be in the same place.

1 When a person separates challah from flour, it is not challah. [The flour given] the priest is like stolen property in his possession and there is an obligation [to separate] challah from a dough [made from] the remainder [of the flour]. If the flour set aside [mistakenly] as challah is an omer in measure and a dough was made from it, one must separate challah from it as [is necessary with regard to doughs made] from any ordinary flour.

2 When should challah be set aside? When one adds water and mixes the flour with the water, he should set aside [a portion as] challah from the first portion that is kneaded, as [indicated by Numbers 15:20:] "From the first of your dough."

[The above applies] provided a measure of flour equal to an omer that has not become mixed with water does not remain in the kneading trough. If he stipulates: "This is challah for the dough, for the yeast, and for the flour that remains. When it all becomes one dough, the portion set aside will become sanctified as challah," it is permitted.

3 If the person left the dough [intact] until it was all kneaded and mixed together and separated [the challah] afterwards, [the delay] is of no consequence. If he does not separate challah while the mixture is a dough, but bakes the entire dough, he should separate [challah] from the loaf, as we explained.

4 When does the obligation [to separate] challah from dough take effect?

When the wheat [flour] was rolled into a ball and [all of] the flour becomes mixed with it or when the barley [flour] was made into a single mass and formed one block. One may snack from the dough until the wheat [flour] was rolled into a ball or the barley [flour] was made into a single mass. The laws pertaining to wheat [flour] pertain to spelt [flour] and those pertaining to barley [flour] pertain to oat and rye [flour].

5 Once the wheat [flour] was rolled into a ball or the barley [flour] was made into a single mass, one who partakes of it before challah was separated is liable for death [at the hand of heaven], because it is tevel. Therefore, if there is a Scriptural obligation [to separate] challah from the dough, a person who partakes of it is liable for lashes, as is anyone who partakes of tevel. If the obligation is Rabbinic in origin, [a person who partakes of the dough] is liable for stripes for rebellious conduct.

6 When a dough from ordinary flour becomes mixed with flour that is terumah before [all the flour] was rolled into a ball, it is exempt [from the obligation of challah]. When it becomes mixed with it after it was rolled into a ball, there is an obligation [to separate challah].
Similarly, if a person consecrates a dough or declares it ownerless before it was rolled into a ball and then redeemed it or took possession of it and rolled it into a ball - alternatively, he consecrated it or declared it ownerless after it was rolled into a ball - there is an obligation [to separate] challah.

7 If he consecrated it before he rolled it and it was rolled in the possession of the Temple treasury and afterwards, he redeemed it, it is exempt. For at the time the obligation would have taken effect, [the dough] was exempt.

8 Similarly, if a gentile gave [flour] to a Jew to make a dough for him and then gave him [the dough] as a present. If he gave it to him [as a present] before it was rolled into a ball, he is liable. [If he gave it to him] after it was rolled into a ball, it is exempt.

9 [The following laws apply when] a convert joins the Jewish faith. If he had a dough that was rolled into a ball before he converted, it is exempt. If it was rolled afterwards, there is an obligation [to separate challah]. If there is a doubt [concerning the matter], there is an obligation, [because eating bread from which challah was not separated] is a transgression punishable by death [at the hand of heaven]. If a non-priest [unknowingly] partook of this challah that was separated due to such a doubt or the like, he is not liable to add a fifth [when making restitution].

10 When a question arises concerning the ritual purity of a dough before it was rolled together as a ball, he should prepare [the dough] in a state of ritual impurity. For it is permitted to make ordinary produce impure in Eretz Yisrael. The challah should then be burnt.

If, after a dough was rolled into a ball, a doubtful situation arose concerning its ritual purity which, were it to be ascertained that it was definitely impure, would convey ritual impurity of Scriptural origin, its [preparation] should be completed in a state of ritual purity. [The rationale is that with regard to] any circumstance where impurity would be imparted to ordinary produce were one certain that it transpired, our Sages decreed that if there is a doubt that it transpired, a dough upon which the obligation to separate challah already fell should not intentionally be made impure, for that obligation has already taken effect. Instead, the challah [separated] is a tentative state; it is not eaten, nor is it burnt.

11 As an initial preference, a person should not prepare his dough in a state of ritual impurity. Instead, he should be careful and endeavor to purify himself and his utensils so that he can separate challah in a state of ritual purity. If he is more than four mil from water [fit for an immersion], he should prepare [the dough] in a state of ritual impurity and separate impure challah.

12 A loaf to serve as challah should not be prepared in a state of ritual purity for a common person. A loaf of ordinary produce may, however, be made in ritual purity [for him].

What is implied? A chaver may mix the dough and separate an appropriate measure of challah from it. He then places [the challah] in a utensil made from dung, stone, or clay, which do not contract ritual impurity. When the common person comes, he should take both of them, the dough and the challah. We tell him: "Be careful not to touch the challah, lest it become tevel again." Why is this allowed? So that the person making the dough could earn his livelihood.

13 The wife of a chaver may sift and strain [flour] together with the wife of a common person. Once water has been mixed with the dough, however, she should not help her, because [the wife of the common person] makes her dough while ritually impure. Similarly, one should not knead or array dough with a baker who bakes his dough in a state of ritual impurity. [The rationale is that] one should not reinforce the hands of transgressors. One may, however, transport bread with him to a bakery.

14 When a person purchases bread from a baker who is a common person in Syria and [the baker] tells him: "I separated challah," [the purchaser] does not need to separate challah because of the doubt. Just as the entire Jewish people in Eretz Yisrael were not suspect [to ignore the separation of] the great terumah, so too, in Syria, they were not suspect [to ignore the separation of] challah.

15 When a person purchases [bread] from a baker in the Diaspora, he must separate challah because of the doubt involved. If, however, he purchases from a private person - and needless to say, if he enjoys his hospitality - he is not required to separate challah because of the doubt.

1 It is a positive commandment for anyone who slaughters a kosher domesticated animal to give a priest the foreleg, the jaw, and the maw, as [Deuteronomy 18:50] states: "This is the judgment [due] the priests...." These are universally known as "presents."

This mitzvah is practiced at all times, whether at the time the Temple is standing or not, whether in Eretz Yisrael or in the Diaspora, with regard to ordinary animals but not consecrated ones.

2 There is an obligation to separate the above-mentioned presents from all consecrated animals that had a permanent blemish before they were consecrated and were redeemed. If, by contrast, they had a temporary blemish before their consecration or they were consecrated when they were unblemished, but afterwards, they became blemished, and they were redeemed, they are exempt from these presents.

3 If there is an unresolved doubt whether an animal is a firstborn, there is certainly an obligation to give the presents [from it to the priest]. [The rationale is:] If it is a firstborn, it must be given to a priest in its entirety. If it is not a firstborn, the presents must be given to a priest.

If a question arises with regard to the status of two animals and a priest took one because of the doubt, the second one is exempt from the presents. [The rationale is that] it is considered as an animal which a priest acquired and then gave to its owners, because of its blemish.

If, however, there is an unresolved doubt whether an animal is the tithes of the herd, it is exempt in all situations. [The rationale is that] when one desires to expropriate property from a colleague, the burden of proof is on him.

4 When an animal that was consecrated and then disqualified because of a blemish became mixed with other animals - even one with 100 - if one person owns all of them, they are all exempt [from the obligation of the presents]. [The rationale is that the status of] each one is doubtful and when one desires to expropriate property from a colleague, the burden of proof is on him. If one person was slaughtering all the animals, only one [set of] presents is exempt.

5 We are required to separate presents only from a kosher domesticated animal, [as indicated by Deuteronomy, loc. cit., which] states: "If it be an ox or a sheep." If a hybrid is born from a sheep and a goat, there is an obligation for presents to be given. We separate all the presents from a ko'i even though its status is undetermined.

When a male deer mates with a goat and it gives birth, there is an obligation [to give] half the presents [to a priest]. [This is derived from the above prooftext]: "If it be... a sheep," i.e., even if it is only part sheep. [When, by contrast,] a male goat mates with a deer, the offspring is exempt from the presents.

6 Whether a person slaughters an animal for consumption by non-Jews, by animals, by dogs, or for medical purposes, there is an obligation [to give] the presents.

7 There is an obligation [to separate the presents from] an animal belonging to partners, as [the above prooftext] states: "those who slaughter the animal."

8 When a person purchases an animal with the produce of the Sabbatical year, he is obligated to [give] presents [to a priest].

Priests and Levites are exempt from the presents, as [the above prooftext] states: "from the people." It is questionable whether the Levites are considered as part of "the people" or not. Therefore [the presents] are not taken from them. If, however, a priest took them, he need not return them.

9 When does the above apply? When one slaughters for his own sake. [Different laws apply to] a priest who is a butcher, who slaughters [animals] and sells them in the marketplace. We grant him two or three weeks. Afterwards, we expropriate the presents from him and grant them to other priests.

If he established a butcher shop to sell meat, we do not wait at all. Instead, we expropriate the presents from him immediately. If he refrains from giving them, we place him under a ban of ostracism until he gives them.

10 A person who slaughters an animal for the sake of a priest or a gentile is exempt from [the obligation to give presents].

A person who enters into a partnership with a priest [in the ownership of an animal] must mark his portion, so that he will leave the presents in the portion of the priest. If he does not mark his portion, he is obligated [to give] these presents, because the fact that the priest is his partner is not a matter of public knowledge. Accordingly, if the priest was standing with him in the butcher store and dealing and negotiating with him, he is not required to mark [his portion].

When a person enters a partnership with a gentile [in the ownership of an animal], he need not mark his portion. [The rationale is that] as a rule, a gentile will speak excessively and inform everyone that he is [the Jew's] partner, even if [the Jew] is not present at the time of the sale.

11 [If, when negotiating a partnership agreement regarding the ownership of an animal,] a priest stipulates to [his partner, an Israelite,] that they are partners with the exception of the presents, the presents belong to the priest. Since the priest stipulated "with the exception of...," he left himself the portion of [the animal containing] the presents. Hence, they are his.
If, however, the priest told the Israelite: "...on the condition that the presents are mine," the presents belong to the Israelite and he may give them to any priest he desires. Even though [the priest] stipulated that they were his, [the animal] is not exempt from [the obligation to give] the presents. For by saying "on the condition that...," he did not leave himself [the ownership of] the presents. Since he did not leave himself a share in their ownership, he did not acquire them through this stipulation.

12 If a priest was a partner in [the ownership of] the head, he is exempt from [giving] the jaw. If he is a partner in the front leg, he is exempt from the fore leg. If he is a partner in the digestive organs, he is exempt from the maw.
If the priest told [the Israelite]: "The entire animal is mine, but the head is yours," he is obligated to give the jaw, for the portion that must be given belongs to the Israelite.

13 [The following laws apply when] a gentile converts and he is in the process of having an animal slaughtered. If it was slaughtered before he converted, he is exempt. If [it was slaughtered] after he converted, he is obligated. If there is a doubt concerning the matter, [we follow the principle]: When one desires to expropriate property from a colleague, the burden of proof is on him.

14 It is permitted to partake [of the meat] of an animal from which the presents were not separated. [The situation] is not analogous to tevel [The rationale is that] the presents due to be given the priests are separate and distinct. It is forbidden for an Israelite to partake of the presents themselves without the permission of a priest. If he transgresses and partakes of them, damages them, or sells them, he is not liable to make financial restitution. [The rationale is that] this is money that has no known plaintiff. A person who purchases them - even though he is forbidden to do so - is permitted to partake of them, because when the presents to the priests are stolen, the theft effect a change in ownership.

15 If one tells a butcher: "Sell me the digestive organs of a cow," and there were presents among them, [the purchaser] should give them to a priest, but [the seller] need not decrease the price [accordingly]. If [the purchaser] bought [the organs] by weight, he should give them to the priest and deduct their value from the butcher's [due].

16 When a person sends meat to a friend and there were presents in [the parcel], the recipient need not be concerned that [the sender] transgressed and stole them.

In a place where there are no priests, one should determine their financial value and partake of them, [so as not to cause] a priest a loss. He should then give the money to any priest he desires.

17 If a person wants to give the presents to only one priest, he may do so. If he wants to divide them [and give them to several], he should not give half the maw or half the foreleg to one [priest]. Instead, he should give the foreleg to one, the maw to another, and the jaw to two others. [This is inferred from Deuteronomy 18:4]: "And you shall give it to him," i.e., give him a portion that is a significant present. If [he is giving presents] from an ox, he may divide them into portions, provided each portion is a significant present.

18 What is meant by the foreleg? The right foreleg, The portion from the upper-joint until the ankle joint; two limbs, one connected with the other. The jaw refers to the jaw bones until the large ring of the protrusion of the gullet with the tongue between the bones. All of this is given to the priest.

19 [When giving the jaw and the foreleg to the priest,] we do not pour boiling water on the hide [to remove the hair], nor do we skin it. Instead, we give it to [the priest] with its skin and wool. [We give a priest] the maw with the fat upon it and the fat within it. The priests have already accepted the custom of leaving the fat of the maw for the owner.

20 A women of the priestly family may partake of the presents even if she is married to an Israelite, because they are not consecrated. Moreover, her husband may partake of the presents for her sake.

A challalah, by contrast, may not partake of the presents, because challalim are not in the category of priests. If a priest desires to sell the presents, to give them as gifts, even to a gentile, or to feed them to the dogs, he may, for they are not consecrated at all.

21 [The following rules apply when there is] a priest whose friends [continually] give him presents. If he desires to transfer ownership of them to a friend who is an Israelite, he may, even though they did not enter [the priest's] domain. Thus [the priest's] friends may slaughter [their animals] and give the presents to the Israelite who acquired them. [This applies] provided the Israelite is in difficult straits and does not have the means to buy meat and the priest who transfers the meat to him is his friend. If, however, the priest is the Israelite's attendant or his hired worker or employee, he may not transfer ownership [of the presents] until they enter his domain. [This is a safeguard,] lest he compel him to do so.

22 A priest should not grab the presents, nor should he even request them verbally. Instead, if he is given them in a respectful manner, he may take them. When there are many priests at the slaughter house, the modest ones withdraw and the gluttons take them. [Even though] a priest is modest, [if] it is not known that he is a priest, he should take [the presents] to let it be known to everyone that he is a priest.

The priests should only eat the presents as they are roasted, with mustard on them, for [Numbers 18:8] states [that the gifts to the priests were given them]: "for distinction." Hence, [they should] be eaten in a manner befitting a king.

1 It is a positive commandment to give a priest the first shearings [of an animal], as [Deuteronomy 18:4] states: 'Give him the first shearings of your flock.' Levites are considered like Israelites with regard to this mitzvah. There is no minimum measure for these shearings according to Scriptural law. According to Rabbinical Law, one should not give less than a sixtieth. It applies only in Eretz [Yisrael], whether the Temple is standing or not like the first of the grain. It applies to ordinary animals, but not to consecrated ones.

2 What is implied? A person consecrated animals for the Temple treasury and then sheared them. Is he obligated to redeem them and give [the first shearings] to the priests? Or if one consecrated an animal with the exception of its shearings, is he obligated in the first shearings? It is written [ibid.]: "your sheep,' [i.e., the obligation applies only to "your sheep.'

3 There is an obligation [to give a priest] the first shearing of any consecrated animals that possessed a permanent blemish before they were consecrated and were [then] redeemed. If, however, they were consecrated before they were blemished or it had a temporary blemish before it was consecrated, and afterwards, it received a permanent blemish and it was redeemed, it is exempt from the first shearing.

4 The only animals whose first shearings we are obligated [to give a priest] are sheep, both male and female, for their wool is fit [to make] garments. If their wool was stiff and not fit for [making] garments, they are exempt from the first shearings, for this present is given to the priest for the sole purpose of providing him with garments.

5 Since the Holy One, blessed be He, granted [a priest] the terumot which provide him with bread and wine and He granted him the presents of meat and the sacrificial meat of the Temple for meat, He provided them with the first shearings for their garments and [restitution for property] stolen from a [childless] convert, devotion offerings, ancestral fields [that were consecrated and not redeemed], and the redemption of the firstborn, for their expenses and for their other needs. [These are granted to the priests,] because they are not granted an ancestral portion of the land, nor a share in the spoils of war.

6 If [a sheep's] wool was [naturally] red, black, or brown, there is an obligation [to give the priest] the first shearings. If, however, the wool was shorn and dyed, before it was given [to a priest], he is exempt from the first shearings. If one bleached it before he gave it [to the priests], he is obligated to set [the wool] aside after he bleaches it. When a person pulls out the wool of ewes by hand instead of shearing it, he is obligated in the first shearings.

7 There is an obligation [to separate] the first shearings from hybrids [of sheep], a ko'i, and a sheep that is mortally ill. If, however, one shears a dead sheep, he is exempt.

8 When a person sets aside the first shearings and they are lost, he is responsible to make restitution until he gives them to the priest.
When a person says: 'Let all of my shearings be considered as the first shearings,' his words are of consequence.

9 A person who purchases the shearings of a gentile's sheep after the gentile has shorn them is exempt from the first shearings. When he purchases [the gentile's] sheep for their shearing, he is obligated even though the wool grew in the gentile's domain and the sheep are returned to the gentile after the shearing. Since the shearer is Jewish and the shearings belong to him, he is obligated. For the obligation takes effect only at the time of shearing.

10 [The following laws apply when] a person purchases the shearings of a fellow Jew. If the seller left a portion of his sheep to shear, the seller is obligated to separate from [the shearing of] the remainder [the appropriate amount] for the entire [flock. This applies] even if the seller has not begun to shear [his sheep. The rationale is that we operate under] the assumption that a person will not sell the presents to be given the priests. If [the seller] did not leave any [sheep to shear], the purchaser is obligated to separate [the first shearings].

11 [A different rule applies it] there are two types of shearings, e.g., white wool and brown wool, or wool from males and wool from females, and one sold one and retained possession of the other. Both [the purchaser and the seller] should give the first shearings, [the purchaser] on what he purchased and the seller on what he retained.

12 When a convert converts and he possesses sheep that are being shorn and it is not known whether they were shorn before he converted or after he converted, he is exempt. [The rationale is when] one desires to expropriate property from a colleague, the burden of proof is upon him.

13 How many sheep must there be for [a flock] to be obligated for the first shearings? No less than five, provided their shearings is not less than the weight of 60 sela and the shearings of each one will not be less than the weight of 12 sela. If the shearings of one of them is less than the weight of twelve sela, [the flock] is exempt from the first shearing, even if [the wool of] the five of them weighs 60 selaim or more.

14 Partners are obligated in [the mitzvah of] the first shearings, provided each one's share is equal to the minimum measure [mentioned above]. It: however, there are only five sheep belonging to two partners, they are exempt.

15 The mitzvah is to set aside the first shearing at the outset. If, however, one set it aside in the middle or at the end, he fulfilled his obligation.
When a person owns five sheep, but [did not shear them together, i.e.,] he had one shorn alone and sold its wool, and then had another shorn alone and sold its wool, and then a third, etc., all of these are combined [to obligate him in the mitzvah of] the first shearing, even if this takes place over the course of several years. He may separate from the new shearings for the old shearings and from [the shearings of] one type of sheep for another. If, however, he had one sheep, he sheared it and set aside its shearings, purchased a second sheep and set aside its shearings, [and continued doing so until he sheared five sheep], their shearings are not combined.

16 When a person has several shearings from the first shearings that he desired to divide among the priests, he should not give any priest less than the weight of five selaim of white wool, enough to make a small garment. The intent is not that he should whiten it and give it to them. Instead, he should give each of them [at least enough] unrefined wool to produce five selaim or more of wool after it has been whitened. [This is derived from Deuteronomy 18:14:] 'Give it to him,' i.e., give him a significant present.

17 The first shearings are ordinary property in every regard. Therefore, I maintain that they may be given to a woman of the priestly family even if she is married to an Israelite like the presents of meat. It appears to me that they are governed by the same laws.

1 It is a positive commandment for every Jewish man to redeem his son who is the firstborn of his Jewish mother, as [Exodus 34:19] states: "All first issues of the womb are mine" and [Numbers 18:15] states: "And you shall surely redeem a firstborn man."

2 A woman is not obligated to redeem her son, for one who is obligated to redeem himself is obligated to redeem his son. If the father transgressed and did not redeem his son, when he comes of age, he is obligated to redeem himself.

3 If it is necessary to redeem both the person himself and his son, he should redeem himself first and then his son. If he only has enough [money] for one redemption, he should redeem himself.

4 If [a father] had to redeem his son and the time arrived for him to make a festive pilgrimage [to Jerusalem] and he does not have the resources for both, he should redeem his son and then make the pilgrimage. [This is alluded to in Exodus 34:20:] which states: "You shall redeem all your firstborn sons" and afterwards [continues]: "Do not behold My countenance empty-handed."

5 A person who redeems his son should recite the blessing: "[Blessed are You...] who sanctified us with His commandments and commanded us concerning the redemption of a son." Afterwards, he recites the blessing Shehechiyanu and then gives [the money for] the redemption to the priest. If [a son] redeems himself, he should recite the blessing: "[Blessed... who commanded us] to redeem the firstborn" and he should recite the blessing Shehechiyanu.

6 This mitzvah is practiced in every place and at all times. For how much should the son be redeemed? Five selaim, as [Numbers 18:16] states: "And those to be redeemed: from one month you shall redeem [according to the valuation of five silver shekalim]." [The redemption may be paid] in silver or in articles worth silver, i.e., movable property that is of financial worth like the shekalim are. Therefore one may not redeem [a firstborn] with landed property or with servants. Nor may promissory notes [be used], because they are not of inherent worth. If one redeemed a firstborn with these, he is not redeemed.

7 When a father writes to a priest that he is obligated to give him five selaim, the obligation takes effect, but the son is not redeemed. If he gives him a utensil that is not worth five selaim in the market, but the priest accepts it as if he was given five selaim, the son is redeemed. If he divides the five selaim among ten priests, whether at once or one after the other, he fulfils his obligation.

8 If the priest desires to return [what was given for] the redemption to [the father], he may. He should not, however, give it to him with the intent that he return it. If he did so, and [the priest] returned it, his son is not redeemed. [Instead,] he must give it to him with the resolution that he is giving him a present without any reservations. Afterwards, if the priest desires to return it, he may return it. Similarly, if he gives it to him as a present with the stipulation that it be returned, his son is redeemed.

9 The priests and the Levites are exempt from the redemption of their firstborn, as evident from a logical deduction: If they served as the redemption of the Israelites firstborn in the desert, certainly, they themselves are exempt.

10 An Israelite who is born to a woman of the priestly or Levite family is exempt, for this matter is not dependent on the father, but rather on the mother, as [indicated by the phrase]: "the first issue of the womb in Israel."

11 When a woman of the Levite family was impregnated by a gentile, her son is exempt. If, however, a woman of the priestly family was impregnated by a gentile, her son is obligated, for his mother was disqualified from the priestly family because of relations with the gentile.

12 When a priest fathers a son who is a challal and the father dies within 30 days [of the son's birth], the son is obligated to redeem himself, because the father did not acquire the redemption. If [the father] dies after 30 days [have passed], the son is not obligated to redeem himself, because the father acquired the redemption.

13 If a maidservant was freed - or a gentile woman converted - while she was pregnant and then she gave birth, since he was born in holiness, [the child] is obligated [to redeem himself] even though he was not conceived in holiness, as [indicated by] the phrase: "the first issue of the womb in Israel." For this child is the first issue of a womb in Israel. If it is not known whether the woman gave birth before she converted or afterwards, [we follow the principle:] When one desires to expropriate property from a colleague, the burden of proof is on him.

14 When a gentile woman or a maidservant gave birth and then converted or was freed and then gave birth again, [the second child] is exempt, as [indicated by] the phrase "the first issue of the womb," and this is not [the woman's] first issue of the womb.

Similar concepts apply when a son is born after a nefal. Whenever the mother is ritually impure due to birth because of a nefal, a son born afterwards is not considered the first issue of the womb. Whenever a nefal does not cause the mother to be ritually impure due to birth, e.g., a woman who miscarries and the issue resembles a fish or a grasshopper, a woman who miscarries on the fortieth day [after conception], or the like, a son born afterwards is [under obligation] to the priesthood and must be redeemed.

15 When a fetus in a woman's womb was cut up and removed limb by limb, a son born afterwards is not considered to be "the first issue of her womb." When the head of a fetus that was carried for eight months emerged alive and then was withdrawn back to the womb where it died - or the head of a stillborn fetus that was carried for nine moths emerged and then was withdrawn - and afterwards the [twin] brother [of the fetus] emerged as [a viable] birth, the viable birth is not considered the first issue of the womb, for [all subsequent births] became exempt with the [emergence of] the head of the first [fetus]. As soon as its forehead emerged, it exempted those born afterwards.

16 When a baby is born by Caesarian section, both it and the next birth are exempt: the first because it did not emerge from the womb, and the second, because it was preceded by another birth.

17 When does the obligation for redemption take effect? When the baby completes 30 days of life, as [Numbers 18:16] states: "And those to be redeemed should be redeemed from the age of a month." If the son died within the thirty days - even on the thirtieth day - or it became mortally ill, there is no obligation [to pay the priest] five selaim. If he gave the priest [the money for] the redemption beforehand, he should return it. If the baby died after its thirtieth day, the father is obligated to redeem him. If he did not give [the money to the priest], he should.

18 [The following rules apply when] one redeems his son within 30 days of his birth: If he tells [the priest]: "I am redeeming him at this time," his son is not redeemed. If he tells him that [the gift should take effect] after 30 days, his son is redeemed even if the coins no longer exist after 30 days.

19 If there is a doubt whether a son is obligated to be redeemed or not, he is exempt. [The rationale is that when] one desires to expropriate property from a colleague, the burden of proof is on him. If a father dies within 30 days [of his son's birth], we operate under the assumption that the son was not redeemed unless he brings proof from his father that he redeemed him before he died. If the father died after 30 days [following the son's birth], we operate under the assumption that he was redeemed unless he informed us that he was not redeemed.

20 When a person's wife has never given birth and she gives birth to a male and a female, but it is not known which emerged first, there is no obligation to give the priest anything.

If she gave birth to two males, even if it is not known which is the firstborn, [the father] must give five selaim to the priest. If one of them dies within 30 days, [the father] is exempt, [based on the principle, when] one desires to expropriate property from a colleague, the burden of proof is on him]. If the father died - whether he died within 30 days of the birth of his sons or afterwards, whether the sons divided his estate or not - five selaim should be given from the estate to the priest, because an obligation was already established upon the estate.

21 [The following rules apply when a man has] two wives who have not yet given birth and they give birth to two sons and [the father] gives ten selaim to the priest [within 30 days of their birth]. If one dies within 30 days and he had given [the ten selaim] to one priest, he should return five selaim to him. If he gave the money to two priests, he cannot expropriate the money from them, since he did not specify which son he is redeeming and each can tell him: "Have my colleague refund you."

22 When a man has two wives who have not given birth yet and they give birth to a male and a female or two males and a female [and it is not known which mother gave birth to which child and which is the order of the children's births], he should give five selaim to a priest. [The rationale is that] it is impossible that among them there will not be one male who is the first issue of the womb.

23 [In the above situation, if the women] give birth to two females and a male or two males and two females and it is not known which was born first, the priest is not entitled to anything. For [with regard to each mother], it is possible to say a female was born first and then a male.

24 [When a man has] two wives, one who has already given birth and one who has not yet given birth, and they give birth to two sons who become mixed together, he must give five selaim to a priest. If one of the sons dies within thirty days, the father is exempt. If the father died, five selaim should be paid from his estate.

25 [In the above situation, if the two wives] gave birth to a male and a female or two males and a female, the priest is not entitled to anything. For it is possible to say that the woman who did not give birth yet gave birth to a female first and then a male and the one who had given birth already gave birth to a male.

26 When there are two men who have wives who had not yet given birth and they both gave birth to males and they became mixed together, each father must give five selaim.
[The following rules apply if] they both gave [that amount] within thirty days and then one of the sons died within that time. If they gave the money to two priests, they cannot expropriate it from them. If they both gave it to the same priest, one should write a document giving power of attorney to the other and then the one with power of attorney should expropriate five selaim from the priest.

27 [In the above situation, if the women] gave birth to a male and a female and they became mixed together, the fathers are exempt and the son is obligated to redeem himself. Similar [laws apply when] a woman who has not given birth previously does not wait after [being divorced from] her

[first] husband three months [before marrying] and gives birth [to a child, whose lineage is doubtful]. It is not known whether he is the first [husband's] son having been born after nine months or the last husband's son, having been born after seven. Both fathers are exempt and the son is obligated to redeem himself.

28 [In the above situation, if the women] gave birth to two females and a male or two females and two males, the priest is not entitled to anything.

29 [The following laws apply when] there are two wives of two men and one gave birth previously and one did not [and they gave birth and the infants became mixed together]. If they gave birth to two males, the father whose wife had not given birth previously must give five selaim to a priest. If they gave birth to a male and a female, the priest does not receive anything.

30 [In the above situation, if the women] gave birth to two males and a female, the man whose wife had not given birth previously should give five selaim. The rationale is that his exemption implies a compounded doubt. For if his wife gave birth to a male only, he is obligated. And if she gave birth to a male and a female, he is obligated unless she gave birth to the female first. Since the probability of this is distant, he should give the money for the redemption.

1 It is a positive commandment for every Jewish man to redeem the first [male] issue of a donkey with a seh. If he does not desire to redeem it, it is a mitzvah for him to behead it, as [Exodus 13:13] states: "The first issue of a donkey you shall redeem with a seh. If you do not redeem it, you shall decapitate it."

These two mitzvot apply in all places and at all times. The mitzvah of redemption takes precedence over the mitzvah of beheading [the donkey].

2 The seh with which it is redeemed is given to the priest, as [Numbers 18:15] states: "All first issues of the womb... and the firstborn of an impure animal you shall redeem."

3 The "impure animal" mentioned in the verse refers only to donkeys.

4 It is forbidden to benefit from the first issue of a donkey until it is redeemed. If it is sold before it is redeemed, the money received for it is forbidden. If it died before it was redeemed or it was decapitated, it should be buried, because it is forbidden to benefit from it even after its decapitation, since it was not redeemed. Therefore if he did not redeem it, but instead gave the first issue of the donkey itself to the priest, it is forbidden for the priest to benefit from it until he redeems it with a seh and takes the seh for himself or he decapitates it and buries it.

The priests are suspect regarding this matter. Hence, it is forbidden for an Israelite to give the first issue of a donkey to a priest unless the priest redeems it in his presence.

5 When a person set aside [a seh] for the redemption of a donkey and it died before he gave it to the priest, he is not liable to replace it. Instead, he should give the corpse to the priest to benefit from. If the first issue of the donkey dies after it was redeemed, he should give the seh to the priest. It is permitted to benefit from [the donkey's corpse,] because it has been redeemed.

6 From when is he obligated to redeem [a firstling donkey]? From the time it was born until it reaches the age of 30 days. After 30 days, if he desires to decapitate it, he may [still do so]. If he desires to redeem it, he may. All that was involved was a delay in fulfilling the mitzvah.

7 If he does not desire to redeem [the firstling donkey], he should decapitate it with a butcher's hatchet from behind, as [Exodus 13:13] states: "If you do not redeem it, you should decapitate it." One may not kill it with a staff, a reed, an axe, or a saw, only with a hatchet. One may not place it in a room and lock the door until it dies, for [the verse] states: "And you shall decapitate it."

8 We may not redeem [a firstling donkey] with a calf, a wild beast, a slaughtered seh, nor an animal that is deathly ill, nor with a hybrid, nor with a ko'i, as [ibid.] states: "Redeem it with a seh." [The term] seh refers to a sheep or a goat that is alive.

9 One should not redeem [a firstling donkey] with a seh that resembles another species. If one redeems it in that manner, the redemption is effective. One may use a ben pekua for the redemption, but not a consecrated animal that was disqualified [and redeemed], for [Deuteronomy 15:22] equates such animals with "the deer and the hart." Just as a deer and a hart may not be used for this redemption, so too, a consecrated animal that was disqualified may not be used.

10 One may redeem [a firstling donkey] with a seh, whether a male or female, whether blemished or unblemished, whether small or large.

11 When a seh was purchased with money that came from the sale of produce of the Sabbatical year, it should not be used to redeem a donkey that is definitely a firstling. It may, however, be used to redeem a donkey whose firstling status is questionable.

If [the owner of a firstling donkey] does not own a seh to redeem it, he may redeem it for its value, paying its worth to a priest. The Torah did not mention a seh to be stringent with him, but rather to be lenient with him, i.e., if he possessed a firstling donkey worth ten selaim, he could redeem it with a seh that is worth a dinar. [The rationale is that the redemption of the firstling donkey] should not be considered more stringent than [the redemption of] consecrated property which may be redeemed with its monetary value.

12 When does the above apply? When the value of the firstling donkey was three zuzim or more. If, however, its worth was less than three zuzim, it may be redeemed only with a seh or with three zuzim. A generous person should not give less than a sela, a parsimonious person should give half a sela and an average person, three zuzim.

13 When a person redeems a firstling donkey belonging to a colleague, the redemption is effective, but the donkey belongs to its owner.

14 Priests and Levites are exempt from the redemption of a firstling donkey, as [Numbers 18:15] states: "The firstborn of man and the firstborn of an impure animal you shall redeem." All of those who are obligated to redeem a firstborn human are obligated to redeem the firstborn of an impure animal. Those who are exempt from redeeming a firstborn human are exempt from redeeming the firstborn of an impure animal.

15 When a person purchases the fetus of a donkey belonging to a gentile or sells the fetus of his donkey to a gentile - although he is not allowed to do so - he is exempt from [redeeming] the firstborn. We do not penalize him for such an act.

If the gentile was a partner in the mother or the firstborn - even if he only owned a thousandth share - the animal is exempt. Should [the gentile own] only one limb or organ of the fetus or the mother - e.g., its forefoot or its hindfoot, even its ear, any limb or organ that if cut off would cause the animal to be disqualified as blemished - it is exempt from [the obligations of] a firstborn. If, however, the portion belonging to the gentile would be cut off, the animal would not be considered as blemished for the altar, he is obligated.

Similarly, one who receives a donkey from a gentile to care for on the condition that they divide the offspring or a gentile received [a donkey] from a Jew on that condition, they are exempt from [the obligations of] the firstborn, as [indicated by Exodus 13:2]: "The first issue of the womb within the children of Israel, in humans and in animals." [Implied is that] it must entirely belong to an Israelite.

16 When a convert converts and it is not known whether his donkey gave birth before he converted or afterwards, he is obligated to decapitate it or redeem it. If he redeems it with a seh, the seh belongs to the convert, [because we follow the principle]: When a person desires to expropriate property from a colleague, the burden of proof is upon him.

17 When a gentile separates a firstling donkey, he should be informed that he is not obligated [to redeem it]. It is permitted for him to use its shearings and to work with it.

18 When a cow gives birth to an offspring resembling a donkey or a donkey gives birth to an offspring resembling a horse, it is exempt. [This is derived as follows. Twice the Torah states:] "The first issue of a donkey you shall redeem with a seh and the first issue of a donkey...." By mentioning "the first issue of a donkey" twice, [the Torah] indicates that both the mother and the offspring must [resemble] donkeys. If such an offspring has some of the identifying marks of a donkey, there is an obligation to redeem it.

19 When a donkey had not given birth before and it gives birth to two males, [the owner] should give a lamb to a priest. If it gives birth to a male and a female [and it is not known which was born first], a lamb should be set aside to remove its holiness so that it will be permitted to benefit from it, for perhaps the male was born first.

The lamb that is set aside belongs to the owner and not to the priest. [We follow the principle]: When a person desires to expropriate property from a colleague, the burden of proof is upon him.

20 When two donkeys that have not given birth yet give birth to two males, [the owner] should give two lambs to a priest. [If they give birth to] a male and a female or two males and a female, he should give one lamb to the priest.

21 [If these donkeys] gave birth to two females and a male or [even] two males and two females, the priest does not receive anything. Moreover, [the owner] need not [even] set aside a lamb that he can keep for himself. [The rationale is that] there are many doubts involved: Maybe one gave birth to a male and the other gave birth to two females. Or perhaps one gave birth to a female and the other to a male and then a female or a female and afterwards a male. Similarly, there are many doubts when two males and two females were born.

If there were two donkeys - one had given birth previously and one had not - and they gave birth to two males and they became intermingled, [the owner] should give one lamb to the priest. If they gave birth to a male and a female, he should separate a lamb for himself and he need not give it to the priest, because its status is doubtful. [Hence, we follow the principle]: When a person desires to expropriate property from a colleague, the burden of proof is upon him.

22 Similarly, when a person purchases a donkey from a gentile and it gives birth to a male, but it is not known whether it gave birth previously or not, he should redeem it with a seh - which he may keep - because its status is doubtful.

23 When a person possesses ten lambs - each of them having been separated because of a first issue of a donkey of a doubtful status - they are considered as ordinary property in every context. They should be tithed like other animals. One of them should be separated as the tithes and the others remain his property, as they were previously.

24 When an Israelite possesses at home ten donkeys whose status as firstlings is definite which he inherited from his maternal grandfather who was a priest who in turn inherited them from his maternal grandfather who was an Israelite, he should separate ten se'in for them. They, however, [may be kept] as his own and, hence, he is obligated to tithe them.

Mishneh Torah, Sabbatical Year and the Jubilee

1 It is a positive commandment to rest from performing agricultural work or work with trees in the Sabbatical year, as [Leviticus 25:2] states: "And the land will rest like a Sabbath unto God" and [Exodus 34:21] states: "You shall rest with regard to plowing and harvesting."

When a person performs any labor upon the land or with trees during this year, he nullifies the observance of this positive commandment and violates a negative commandment, as [Leviticus 25:4] states: "Do not sow your field and do not trim your vineyard."

2 According to Scriptural Law, a person is not liable for lashes except for [the following labors] sowing, trimming, harvesting [grain], and harvesting fruit - both from vineyards and from other trees.

3 Trimming is considered in the category of sowing. And harvesting fruit is considered in the category of harvesting grain. If so, why did the Torah single them out? To teach that one is liable [for lashes] for performing these two derivatives alone. For the other derivatives that involve working the land and the other major categories of labor that were not mentioned explicitly [by the Torah] in this context, one is not liable for lashes. He is, however, given stripes for rebellious conduct.

4 What is implied? When a person digs or plows for the sake of the land, removes stones, fertilizes the land, or performs another similar type of work on the land or extends, grafts, plants, or performs other similar types of work with trees, he is given stripes for rebellious conduct.

5 We do not plant even non-fruit-bearing trees in the Sabbatical year. Nor may one cut an abnormal outgrowth from a tree, remove dried leaves and branches, apply dust to the top of a tree, or smoke a tree so that worms [that infest it] die. [Similarly,] one should not apply a foul-smelly potion to plants so that birds will not eat them when they are soft. One should not apply oil to unripened fruit, nor should one perforate them. One should not bind plants, nor trim them, nor prepare a support for a tree or perform any other work with trees. If one performs any of these labors in the Sabbatical year, he is given stripes for rebellious conduct.

6 One may not light a fire in an overgrowth of reeds, because this is considered as working the land. We train a cow to plow only in sand. We do not test [the viability of] seeds in a flowerpot full of earth, but we may test them in a flowerpot full of dung. One may soak seeds in the Sabbatical year in order to plant them in the following year. We maintain aloe plants on top of the roof, but we do not water them.

7 We may apply red paint to a tree and we may load it with stones. We may hoe under vines and under olive trees. If [these activities are intended] to make the trees flourish, they are forbidden. If they are intended to close their cracks, it is permitted.

8 We may irrigate a beit hashilechin, i.e., a field that is sown [with grain] that is very arid, in the Sabbatical year. Similarly, we may cause water to flow from one tree to another in an orchard if there were ten trees dispersed in an area larger than that necessary to sow a se'ah [of grain]. One should not, however, irrigate the entire orchard. If they are closer to each other than that, one may irrigate the entire orchard for them.

Similarly, [when trees grow in] a field where they are planted distant from each other, we can sprinkle the earth with water for the sake of the trees that they will not be ruined.

9 One may dig a pit at the roots of a grapevine [to collect water]. One may make an irrigation ditch at the outset and one may fill the water reservoirs with water.

10 Why were all these activities allowed? For if he will not irrigate [the field], the land will become parched and all the trees in it will die. Since the prohibition against these activities and the like is Rabbinic in origin, they did not impose their decrees in these instances. For according to Scriptural Law, a prohibition applies only to the two primary categories and their two derivatives, as explained.

11 When the number of those who impose their desires by force increased and the gentile kings required the Jews to supply food for their soldiers, [the Sages] permitted [the people] to sow only those crops that are necessary for the servants of the king alone. Similarly, if a person of force compelled someone to perform labor in the Sabbatical year without pay, for the service of the king or the like, he may do so.

12 When a person plants [crops] during the Sabbatical year whether in inadvertent or willful violation, he should uproot them, because the Jews are suspect with regard to [the prohibitions of the] Sabbatical year. If we would allow a person who [sowed] inadvertently to keep the crops, a person who [sowed] intentionally would say: "I did so inadvertently."

13 When one plows his field, breaks its ground, or fertilizes itin the Sabbatical year so that it will be better to sow in the following year, we penalize him and [prohibit] him from sowing it in the following year. He may not hire it out to others. Instead, he must leave it fallow. If he dies, however, his son may sow it.

14 When a person removes thorns from his field in the Sabbatical year to improve it for the following year or removes stones from it, even though he is forbidden to do so, we do not penalize him. He is permitted to sow it in the following year.

15 [The following laws apply when a person] buries turnips, radishes, and the like in the Sabbatical year. If some of their leaves were revealed, he need not be concerned. If not, it is forbidden. When someone buries wild onions or the like, he should place at least four kabbim in the height of a handbreadth and place a handbreadth of earth above them. He should bury them in a place where people walk so that they will not grow.
It is permitted to rip off the protruding stalks of rice in the Sabbatical year, but one should not cut them off.

16 At the outset, [the Rabbis] would say: A person may gather wood, stones, and grass from his field, provided he takes the larger ones alone, so that his intent is not to clear the land, but from his colleague's field, he may take small and larger pieces. When there was an increase in the number of transgressors, i.e., people who intended to clear their fields, but would excuse themselves, saying: "We are only taking the larger pieces," they forbade a person from gathering wood and stones from his own field, [permitting this] only from a colleague's field. Even then, [the leniency was granted] only when he does not do so in order that he exchange the favor, i.e., he does not tell his colleague: "See how much of a favor I did for you, for I have cleared your field."

17 When a person's animal is standing in his field, he may gather [all types of grasses] and bring them to it, for [the presence of] his animal indicates his [intent]. Similarly, if his cooking range is located there, he may gather everything and kindle it, for [the presence of] his range indicates his [intent].

18 If a person cuts down a tree or two to use as wood, he may dig out their roots. If he cuts down three or more next to each other, he should not dig out their roots, because then he is improving his land. Instead, he should cut off the portion above the earth and leave the roots in the ground.
When does the above apply? In one's own field. In one's colleague's field, by contrast, it is permitted to dig out the roots.

19 When a person is chopping [branches from] an olive tree for wood, he should not cover the place [where the branches grew] with earth, because this involves performing work [with the tree]. He may, however, cover it with stones or with straw.

20 One who trims the ends of branches of vines and cuts down reeds, may cut them in his ordinary pattern with a hatchet, a sickle, or a saw, or with any other utensil he desires.

21 One should not chop wood from a wild fig tree from which wood has never been cut before in the same way as one cuts wood from it in other years, because trimming a tree is [one of the forbidden] tasks involved with trees, for through trimming the tree, it will grow and increase. If he needs its wood, he should trim it in an unusual manner.

22 How should he trim it? [He should cut either] the branches close to the ground or those higher than ten handbreadths.
When a tree is split, it can be tied together in the Sabbatical year. [The intent is not that] it will mend, but that [the split] will not increase.

1 A person should not remove waste materials from his courtyard and place them in his field in the Sabbatical year, because it appears that he is fertilizing his field so that it will be improved for him to sow it. If he did remove them, but made a waste heap, it is permitted.
He should not make a waste heap in his field until the time when it is common to fertilize the fields as is done when tilling the land passes, i.e., when the bitter [apples] become [very dried out and] knotted. He should not make a waste heap that contains less than 150 se'ah of waste, so that it will be obvious that it is a waste heap. If he wishes to add to it, he may. If he has a small amount [of waste matter placed in his field before the beginning of the Sabbatical year], he can continue to increase it [throughout the Sabbatical year]. One should not make more than three waste heaps in an area large enough to sow a se'ah of grain.

2 When a person desires to make waste heaps throughout his entire field, three in each area large enough to sow a se'ah, he may. If he desires to combine his waste into one large waste heap, he may.

3 When a person would place waste on a rock, dug out three handbreadths of the earth and then made a heap of waste, or built [a platform] three handbreadths high above the earth and placed the waste upon them, there is no required measure. Even if he made several waste heaps in an area large enough to sow a se'ah of grain, it is permitted. [The rationale is] it is obvious that his intent is not to improve the land, but rather to collect his waste.

4 A person is permitted to remove waste from a corral of sheep and place it in his field as [is permitted to] all those who collect waste.

When a person makes a corral in his field in the Sabbatical year, he should not make it larger than an area it takes to sow two se'ah. [When it is that size,] he may bring his sheep into it. When they have fertilized the entire corral, he may leave one wall of the corral and make another corral on its side, [and then bring his sheep there]. In this manner, he can fertilize a portion of his field large enough to sow four se'ah.

5 If, however, his entire field was only large enough to sow four se'ah, he should leave a portion [unfertilized], because of the impression that might be created. [In this way,] everyone will know that the sheep deposited their wastes there and fertilized it and they will not say that the person fertilized his entire field in the Sabbatical year.

6 A person should not open a quarry in his field at the outset in the Sabbatical year, lest it be said that he intended to improve his field by removing the rocks from it. If he began before the Sabbatical year and quarried from it 27 blocks - each block being one cubit by one cubit and one cubit high or larger - from a group of stones that were three cubits by three cubits and three cubits high, it is permitted to extract from it all one desires during the Sabbatical year.

7 [The following rules apply when there is] a stone wall that is ten handbreadths or more high and one desired to remove all the stones. If it contained ten or more stones, each one at least [large enough to require] two people to carry it, he may take them, for an observer will know that he is taking them because he needs the stones. If the wall was less than ten handbreadths high, there were less than ten stones or the stones were smaller [and did not require] two people to carry it, he may take them, but must leave [a row] a handbreadth high above the ground.

8 When does the above apply? When he intends to improve his field or he began to remove the stones in the Sabbatical year. If, however, he did not intend to improve his field or began removing them before the Sabbatical year, he may take everything he desires during the Sabbatical year, clearing away [the stones] until he reaches the earth. Similarly, if he was removing the stones from a colleague's field, even though he was a contractor, he may clear them away until he reaches the earth.

9 [The following rules apply when, in a field, there are] stones that would be dislocated by a plow or which were covered [by earth] and then uncovered. If there are two stones that are each large enough to require two people to carry them, it is permitted to remove them. If they are smaller than this, he should not take them.

10 When a person removes stones from his field because he needs the stones [for construction], he should remove the upper ones and leave those in contact with the earth. Similarly, if he has a pile of pebbles or of stones in his field, he should take the upper one's and leave those in contact with the earth. If there is a large rock or straw beneath them, he may take all of them.

11 A person should not fill a groove in the ground with earth or level it with earth, because he is improving his land. He may, however, make a divider before the groove, [separating it from the remainder of his field]. He may take any stone [in the groove] that he can pick up if he stretches out his hand while he is standing at the edge of the groove.

12 It is permitted to bring stones carried on one's shoulder - i.e., two or three are carried on one's shoulder at a time - from any place, whether from a colleague's field or from one's own field. Similarly, a contractor may bring stones, even small ones, from any place whether from the field he hired or from a field that he did not hire.

13 [The following laws apply when there is] an open space [in a wall separating one's property from the public domain] that was filled with earth. If its [stones] do not create an obstacle block for people in the public domain, it is forbidden to rebuild it. If they create a stumbling block for people or it was not filled with earth, but instead open to the public domain, it is permitted to rebuild it.

14 It is forbidden for a person to build a wall between his field and his colleague's field in the Sabbatical year. He may, however, build a wall between his field and the public domain. [When he builds the wall,] he is permitted to dig deeply until he reaches a stone. He may remove the earth and gather it in his field in the same manner as waste is gathered. Similarly, if a person dug out a cistern, a trench, or a storage cavity in the Sabbatical year, he may gather the earth in the same manner as all those who dig.

1 It is a halachah conveyed to Moses at Sinai that it is forbidden to work the land in the last 30 days of the sixth year, just before the Sabbatical year, because one is preparing for the Sabbatical year. This concept - i.e., the prohibition [to work the land] established by tradition - applies in the era of the Temple [alone]. Our Sages [extended that prohibition], decreeing that one should not plow an orchard in the year preceding the Sabbatical year in the era of the Temple after Shavuot, nor a field of grain after Pesach. In the era where the Temple does not stand, we are permitted to perform agricultural work until Rosh HaShanah, as [permitted by] Scriptural Law.

2 What is meant by an orchard? Any place where there are three trees in an area large enough to sow a se'ah of grain. Whether these are fruit-bearing trees or not and even when they belong to three different people, we consider them as if they were fig trees. If they were fit to produce a mass of dried figs of a weight of 60 maneh, we may plow the entire field because of them. [This applies] provided there is sufficient distance between them that cattle can pass through together with their implements.

3 [Different laws apply] if there were less than three trees in an area fit to sow a se'ah or there were three, but [only] one was fit to produce 60 maneh or more and the other two were not fit to produce [a significant amount] or there were two fit to produce even 100 maneh and one is not fit to produce [a significant amount]. We may plow only the portion of the field necessary for [these trees], i.e., [an area whose radius is the space in which could stand] a person picking figs together with his basket.

4 If there were between three and nine trees and they were fit to produce 60 maneh, we may plow the entire field for their sake, even though there are some trees that are not fit to produce [a significant quantity of] fruit.

5 When there are ten or more trees in an area fit to sow a se'ah, whether they are fit to produce [the above quantity of fruit] or not, we may plow the entire area for their sake [until Shavuot]. If there were ten plantings spread out in an area fit to sow a se'ah, we may plow the entire area for their sake until Rosh HaShanah. This is a halachah conveyed to Moses at Sinai.

6 If [the plantings] were planted in a row or in a semi-circle, we may only plow what is necessary for each of their needs. If there are squash plants together with the plantings, they can be counted in the sum of ten [plantings].

7 What is meant by a planting? A sapling for as long as it is called a planting.

8 [The following rules apply when] a tree was cut off and a new tree grew from its stump. If it was cut off a handbreadth or more above the ground, it is considered as a tree. If it was cut off lower than a handbreadth, it is considered as a planting.

9 All of the above applies in the era of the Temple, as we stated. In the present era, by contrast, we are permitted to work the land until Rosh HaShanah. [Moreover,] even in the era of the Temple, it is permitted to remove stones from fields and fertilize them and to hoe in zucchini and squash gardens and in parched land until Rosh HaShanah. Similarly, one may fertilize saplings, remove dried leaves and branches from them, apply dust to them, smoke under them, rip off stalks, trim their far-spreading branches, and apply foul-smelling matter to them. We may wrap their branches, trim them, make shelters around them, place water upon them, apply oil to the unripened fruit and perforate them. All of these tasks are permitted in the year preceding the Sabbatical year until Rosh HaShanah of the Sabbatical year even in the era of the Temple.

10 When unripened fruit from the sixth year enter the Sabbatical year or such fruit from the Sabbatical year enter the eighth year, we may not apply oil to them or perforate them. In the era of the Temple, one may not build steps at the entrance to valleys in the sixth year after the rains cease, because he is preparing for the seventh year.

11 Even in the present age, we may not plant trees, graft trees, or extend vines in the sixth year unless there is time for the planting to become rooted and remain after taking root thirty days before Rosh HaShanah of the Sabbatical year. Usually, it takes two weeks [for a plant] to take root. This is forbidden at all times, because of the impression that might be created, lest an observer think that they were planted in the Sabbatical year. Thus if a person planted, grafted, or extended [a tree or vine] in the sixth year, 44 days before Rosh HaShanah, he is allowed to maintain it. If he did so for a lesser time, he must uproot it. If he did not uproot it, however, the fruit it produces is permitted. If he dies before he uprooted it, we obligate the heir to uproot it.

1 All produce that grows from the earth in the Sabbatical year: whether it grew from seeds that fell into the earth before the Sabbatical year, it grew from roots whose plants were harvested previously, but nevertheless grew again - in both instances [such produce] is referred to with the term safiach - or grasses and vegetables that grew on their own accord [in the Sabbatical year], is permitted to be eaten according to Scriptural Law, as [Leviticus 25:6] states: "And [the produce that grows] while the land is resting shall be yours to eat." Even when a field was plowed thoroughly in the Sabbatical year, and produce grew in it, that produce is permitted to be eaten. The statement [ibid.:] "Do not reap the aftergrowth of your harvest" means that one should not reap it in the same manner as one does every year. If one reaps it according to the ordinary manner, he is worthy of lashes. For example, he harvested the entire field, set up a grain heap, and threshed it with cattle or harvested it for the sake of tilling the land as we explained. Instead, he should reap it little by little, beat it, and partake of it.

2 According to Rabbinic decree, all the sifichim are forbidden to be eaten. Why was a decree established concerning them? Because of the transgressors, so that they could not go and sow grain, beans, and garden vegetables in one's field discretely and when they grow, partake of them, saying that they are sifichim. Therefore the Sages prohibited all the sifichim that grow in the Sabbatical year.

3 Thus we have learned that the only produce of the Sabbatical year of which one may partake are fruit from trees and herbs that are not sown by most people, e.g., rue, amaranth, and the like. With regard to vegetables that most people sow in their gardens and species of grains and beans, by contrast, anything that grows from these species is forbidden according to Rabbinic decree. One who gathers them is liable for stripes for rebellious conduct.

4 When sifichim grow in an underdeveloped field, a field that was plowed, a vineyard, and a field where crops had been sown, they are permitted to be eaten.

Why was the above decree not applied to these places? Because a person will not sow these fields. [He will not sow] an underdeveloped field, because no one pays attention to it. When a field has been plowed, [the owner] desires that it remain lying fallow. With regard to a vineyard, no person will cause his vineyard to become forbidden. And when a field has been sown, the aftergrowth will spoil it. Similarly, straw that grows in the Sabbatical year is permitted in all places; no decree was issued against its use.

5 When sifichin from the Sabbatical year enter the following year, they are forbidden to be eaten. We may not uproot them by hand. Instead, one should plow [the land] in its ordinary fashion or [let] an animal pasture in its ordinary fashion.

6 Until when are the sifichin of the Sabbatical year forbidden in the eighth year? From Rosh HaShanah until Chanukah. From Chanukah and onward, they are permitted. When a person sows the sifichin of the Sabbatical year after the Sabbatical year, the produce that grows from this is permitted.

7 When onions of the Sabbatical year enter the eighth year, they are permitted when there is enough time for produce of that size to have grown [in the eighth year]. If not, they are forbidden.
Similar concepts apply with regard to other produce. They should not be purchased in the eighth year until produce of that size could have grown in the eighth year. When, in the eighth year, the produce which grows rapidly reaches [the size of the produce which grew in the Sabbatical year], the prohibition is lifted from the produce that remains. It is permitted to purchase garden vegetables in the eighth year immediately.

8 When is a person permitted to purchase wild onions in the eighth year? When the new produce exceeds [the old].

9 The first of Tishrei is Rosh HaShanah with regard to the Sabbatical and Jubilee years. [The following rules apply with regard to] produce of the sixth year that enters the Sabbatical year. Grain, legumes, or fruit that reached the stage when tithes are required to be separated before Rosh HaShanah [of the Sabbatical year] are permitted [to be reaped]. Even though they are gathered in the Sabbatical year, they are considered like produce of the sixth year in all regards. If they did not reach the stage when tithes are required to be separated until after Rosh HaShanah, they are considered as produce of the Sabbatical year.

10 Grain and legumes are forbidden to be eaten as sifichin and the fruit of trees must be eaten with consideration for the holiness of the Sabbatical year.

11 When rice, millet, poppy seeds, sesame seeds, and Egyptian beans are sown to produce seed, [the ruling depends on] when the produce completes its growth. If its growth is completed before Rosh HaShanah, these [seeds] are permitted [to be harvested] in the Sabbatical year like the produce of the sixth year. If their growth is completed after Rosh HaShanah, even though [the plants] took root before Rosh HaShanah, they are forbidden as sifichin.

12 [The ruling regarding] vegetables [depends] on the time they were harvested.

With regard to an esrog, even if it was the size of a bean before Rosh HaShanah [of the Sabbatical year] and grew to the size of a loaf of bread in the Sabbatical year, it is obligated to be tithed like the produce of the sixth year. [Conversely,] even if it had reached the size of a loaf of bread in the sixth year, since it was reaped in the Sabbatical year, it is considered as the produce of the Sabbatical year. As a stringency, the tithes are separated like the produce of the sixth year.

13 Similarly, when the produce of the Sabbatical year is reaped in the eighth year: With regard to grain, legumes, and the fruit of the trees, [the ruling depends on when the produce reached] the stage when tithes are required to be separated. When rice, millet, poppy seeds, sesame seeds, and Egyptian beans are sown to produce seed, [the ruling depends on] when the produce completes its growth. [The ruling regarding] vegetables [depends] on the time they were harvested.

14 When one sowed Egyptian beans for seed in the sixth year and the produce was completed before Rosh HaShanah of the Sabbatical year, both its vegetables and its seed are permitted in the Sabbatical year. If one sowed it to use as a vegetable and it entered the Sabbatical year, both its vegetables and its seed are forbidden like the sifichin of the Sabbatical year. Similarly, if he sowed it both for its seed and to use as a vegetable, it is forbidden.

15 [The following rules apply if] one transgressed and sowed [such beans] in the Sabbatical year, [their growth was completed in the Sabbatical year,] but they remained [in the ground] until the eighth year: If they were sown for seed, both the seed and the vegetables are forbidden in the eighth year like other sifichin. If one sowed it to use as a vegetable, since it was harvested in the eighth year, both its vegetables and its seed are permitted. If he sowed it both for its seed and to use as a vegetable, its seed is forbidden as sifichin and its vegetables are permitted.

16 Since white figs take three years before their growth is completed, if they reach the stage when tithes are required to be separated before Rosh HaShanah of the eighth year, they should be eaten in the second year of the seven year cycle according to the restrictions governing fruit of the Sabbatical year.

17 Onions that will not produce scallions and Egyptian beans from which water was withheld for 30 days before Rosh HaShanah and onions that do produce scallions from which water was withheld for three irrigation periods before Rosh HaShanah are considered as the produce of the sixth year. If water was withheld from them for a shorter period, they are considered as sefichin from the Sabbatical year.

18 [The following laws apply with regard to] gourd plants which were maintained [in the ground] to produce seed. If they became hard before Rosh HaShanah and thus were unfit for human consumption, it is permitted to maintain them in the Sabbatical year, for they are from the produce of the sixth year. If not, they are considered as sefichin from the Sabbatical year.

Similar [laws apply with regard to] vegetables. Any ones that become hard before Rosh HaShanah are permitted to be maintained in the Sabbatical year. If they were soft, it is forbidden to maintain them, as [is the law regarding] sefichin.

We do not require a person to uproot wild onions. Instead, we allow him to leave them in the ground as they are. If they grow in the eighth year, they are permitted. Similarly, we do not require him to uproot an artichoke plant. All that is necessary is to cut off its leaves. If it grows again in the eighth year, it is permitted.

19 Wild onions [grown] in the sixth year, summer onions, and madder which completed their growth before the Sabbatical year may be uprooted in the Sabbatical year with metal hatchets. This is not considered as tilling the land.

20 When, in the Sabbatical year, rain descended upon onions and they sprouted leaves, the leaves are permitted as long as they are light green. If they have turned dark, it is considered as if the plants were planted in the earth and those leaves are forbidden as sefichin. In both situations, the onions themselves remain permitted.

21 When an onion was uprooted in the Sabbatical year and replanted in the eighth year and its growth exceeded its original size, the additional growth elevates the original mass and the entire [onion] is permitted. [The rationale is that] since the prohibition of the Sabbatical year comes about via the earth, it can be removed via the earth.

22 Fruits produced by a tree in the Sabbatical year should not be reaped in the same manner as they are reaped every year, as [Leviticus 25:5] states: "The grapes you had designated you shall not gather." One who reaps grapes to improve the vine or in the ordinary manner of reaping is liable for lashes.

23 How should one conduct himself? Figs of the Sabbatical year should not be set out to dry in the place where they are usually set out to dry. They can, however, be left to dry in a ruin. We may not crush grapes in a vat, but they may be crushed in a kneading trough. Olives should not be crushed in a press, but they may be squeezed and placed in a very small press. One may grind them in the oil press and place them in a small press. Similarly, with regard to other matters, [the fundamental rule is]: One should deviate from the norm in whatever way possible.

24 It is a positive commandment to divest oneself from everything that the land produces in the Sabbatical year, as [Exodus 23:11] states: "In the seventh [year], you shall leave it untended and unharvested."
Anyone who locks his vineyard or fences off his field in the Sabbatical year has nullified a positive commandment. This also holds true if he gathered all his produce into his home. Instead, he should leave everything ownerless. Thus everyone has equal rights in every place, as [ibid.] states: "And the poor of your people shall partake of it." One may bring a small amount into one's home, just as one brings from ownerless property, e.g., five jugs of oil, fifteen jugs of wine. If he takes more than that, it is permitted.

25 [The laws of] the Sabbatical year are observed only in Eretz Yisrael alone, as [Leviticus 25:2] states: "When you will come to the land...." It is observed while the Temple is standing and when the Temple is not standing.

26 In the entire area taken possession of by the Jews who ascended from Babylonia until Kziv, it is forbidden to work the land and the sifichin that grow there are forbidden to be eaten. In the entire area that was taken possession of only by the Jews that ascended from Egypt, i.e., from Kziv to the River [of Egypt] and to the Umanum Mountains, even though it is forbidden to till [the land] in the Sabbatical year, the sifichin that grow there are permitted to be eaten. From the River [of Egypt] and from the Umanum Mountains [onward], one may till [the land] in the Sabbatical year.

27 Although the Sabbatical year is not observed in Syria according to Scriptural Law, [our Sages] decreed that it would be forbidden to till it in the Sabbatical year like Eretz Yisrael, so that [the Jewish people] would not abandon Eretz Yisrael and go and settle permanently there. In Ammon, Moab, Egypt, and Babylonia, by contrast, though the tithes must be separated according to Rabbinic Law, the Sabbatical year is not observed.

28 The Sabbatical year is observed in Transjordan by Rabbinic decree. The sifichin of Syria and Transjordan are permitted to be eaten. [The restrictions in] these lands need not be more stringent than those in [the portions of] Eretz Yisrael that were inhabited by the people ascending from Egypt.

29 When a gentile purchases land in Eretz Yisrael and sows it in the Sabbatical year, the produce is permitted. For our Sages decreed that sifichin should be forbidden only as a safeguard against transgressors and the gentiles are not commanded to observe the Sabbatical year. Thus there is no need to institute a safeguard for them.

30 In the cities of Eretz Yisrael that are close to the border, we appoint a trustworthy watchman so that the gentiles will not spread [through the land] and take the produce of the Sabbatical year.

1 The produce of the Sabbatical year is designated for the sake of eating, drinking, smearing oneself [with oil], kindling lamps, and dyeing. According to the Oral Tradition, we learned that the word tihiyeh implies that it may be used even for kindling lamps, and dyeing.

2 What is meant by [the license to use the produce of the Sabbatical year] for eating and drinking? One should eat those foods that are normally eaten and drink the beverages that are normally drunken, as is the law with regard to terumah and the second tithe.

3 He should not change the natural function of produce as he does not with regard to terumah and the second tithe, i.e., something that is normally eaten raw should not be eaten cooked. Something that is normally eaten cooked should not be eaten raw. For this reason, animal fodder should not be cooked, nor should one press himself to eat a cooked dish that has spoiled or bread that has become moldy, as he does not eat such foods that are terumah or the second tithe.

4 We do not cook vegetables from the Sabbatical year in oil that is terumah lest it disqualify it. If one cooked a little and ate it immediately, it is permitted, because he did not leave it aside so that it become disqualified.

5 Produce that is set aside for human consumption should not be fed to domesticated animals, beasts, and fowl. If an animal went under a fig tree under its own initiative and began eating the fruit, we do not require [the owner] to bring it back, for [Leviticus 25:7] states: "And for the animal and the beast in your land shall be all the produce to eat."

6 What is meant by [the license to] smear oneself [with produce from the Sabbatical year]? One may smear oneself with produce with which it is common to smear oneself. He should not smear wine or vinegar, but he may smear oil. We do not place fragrant herbs in oil, nor should one apply oil in a bathhouse. He may, however, apply oil outside and then enter.

7 Oil from the Sabbatical year should not be used to seal an oven or a range, nor should it be applied to a shoe or a sandal. One should not apply [such oil] with impure hands. If the oil fell on his flesh, he may rub it in with impure hands. One should not apply [such] oil to his foot while it is in a shoe, He may, however, smear [such oil] on his foot and put on a shoe or smear his entire body and then roll on a new [leather] mat.

8 What is meant by [the license to] kindle a lamp [with produce from the Sabbatical year]? One may kindle a lamp with oil from the Sabbatical year itself. If one sold [oil from the Sabbatical year] and used the proceeds to purchase other oil or exchanged [oil from the Sabbatical year] for other oil, they are both forbidden to be used for kindling, for we may not use money received in return for the produce of the Sabbatical year for kindling.

One should not place oil directly into a fire. Instead, one should light it in a lamp.

9 What is meant by [the license to use produce from the Sabbatical year] for dyeing? Produce which is ordinarily used as dye even though it is also used as food for people may be used as dye for man's sake. We may not, however, use the produce of the Sabbatical year - even animal fodder - as dye for the sake of an animal. For the holiness of the Sabbatical year does not rest on dye for animals.

10 The holiness of the Sabbatical year falls on [natural] detergents - e.g., borit and ehel, - and we may launder with them, as [Leviticus 25:6] states: "And [the produce that grows] while the land is resting shall be yours," i.e., for all your needs. Nevertheless, the fruit of the Sabbatical year should not be used as a detergent, nor should it be used to produce a compress, for [the above verse] states: "...shall be yours to eat," i.e., and not for a compress, nor to sprinkle, induce regurgitation, soak flax, or use as a detergent.

11 A great principle was stated with regard to the produce of the Sabbatical year: Whatever is distinguished as being for human consumption, e.g., wheat, figs, grapes, and the like, should not be used as a compress or a bandage, even for a person, as implied by the phrase: "yours to eat," i.e., whatever is distinguished as being for you, should be used as food and not for medicinal purposes. Anything that is not distinguished as being for human consumption, e.g., soft thorns and brambles, may be used as a compress for a person, but not for an animal.

If it is not distinguished as being for either of the above purposes - e.g., za'ater, oregano, and thyme, [the ruling depends] on the person's intent. If he thought to use it as kindling wood, it is considered as kindling wood.

If he intended that it be used as food [for humans], it is considered as produce.

If it is distinguished as being for both of the above purposes, we treat it with both the stringencies incumbent on food for humans - and compresses are not made with it - and those incumbent on animal fodder - that they may not be cooked.

12 It is permitted to sell food for humans and animal fodder and use the proceeds to purchase food for humans. We may not, however, sell animal fodder to purchase other animal fodder. Needless to say, we may not sell food for humans to purchase animal fodder. If [animal fodder] was purchased with [such produce] or food for humans was exchanged for animal fodder, [the animal fodder] is considered like food for humans and it may not be used to make a compress for a person.

13 The produce of the Sabbatical year may not be transported from Eretz Yisrael to the Diaspora, not even to Syria. It cannot be fed to a gentile, nor to a hired worker. If he was hired for an entire week, an entire year, or an entire month or an agreement regarding his food was established, he is considered as a member of one's household and he may be fed [the produce of the Sabbatical year]. We may feed a guest the produce of the Sabbatical year.

14 The court does not allot produce of the Sabbatical year to a woman, because this is considered as paying a debt with the produce of the Sabbatical year. She may, however, take her livelihood from [produce of the Sabbatical year] in her husband's possession.

15 We do not harvest the produce of the Sabbatical year when it is not yet ripe. [This is derived from Leviticus 25:12 which states:] "And you shall partake of its produce," [implying that the fruits] may not be eaten until they are considered as produce. One may, however, partake of a small amount of them in the field while they are underdeveloped, as one partakes [of such produce] in other years. One should not bring the produce into one's home until it reaches the stage when the obligation to separate tithes takes effect.

16 From when is it permitted to partake of the fruit of trees in the field in the Sabbatical year? With regard to underdeveloped figs, when their surface will become shiny, he may eat his bread with them in the field. The same applies in all analogous situations With regard to underdeveloped grapes, when sap flows in them, they may be eaten in the fields. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

With regard to olives, when a se'ah of olives would produce a revi'it of a log of oil, one may break them open and eat them in the fields. [If such an amount of olives] would produce half a log [of oil], one may crush them and smear oneself in the field. [If they reach the stage where they] produce one third [of the amount they ordinarily produce], it is permitted to bring them to his home, because they have reached a third of their growth.

17 It is permitted to cut down trees for their wood in the Sabbatical year, before they produce fruit. Once they have begun to produce fruit, however, they should not be cut down, for doing so spoils [the fruit], and [the fruit of the Sabbatical year is granted] "to eat," and not to spoil. If it produced fruit and they reached the stage at which an obligation to separate tithes exists, it is permitted to cut them down, for it has already produced its fruit and the laws of the Sabbatical year no longer apply to it.

18 From when is it forbidden to cut down a tree in the Sabbatical year? For carobs, when a chain of carobs will be formed. For grapes, when the fruit produces seeds. For olives, when they bud. For all other fruit trees, when they produce underdeveloped fruit.
It is forbidden to cut off underdeveloped clusters of dates in the Sabbatical year, because one is spoiling the fruit. If these clusters will not produce dates, merely buds, it is permitted to cut off those clusters.

19 We may not use hay and straw of the Sabbatical year for kindling, because it is fit for animal fodder. We may, however, use the wastes of olives and grapes of the Sabbatical year for fuel.

20 When a bathhouse has been heated with hay and straw of the Sabbatical year, it is permitted to bathe there [even] when payment is required. An important person, however, is forbidden to do so, lest they also mix other [herbs] into the kindling for him, so that it will produce a fragrant scent. Thus they will destroy the produce of the Sabbatical year.

21 The holiness of the produce of the Sabbatical year does not fall on the types of shells and seeds that are permitted to non-priests with regard to terumah. Instead, they are considered like wood, unless they are fit for dyeing. The holiness of the Sabbatical year falls on the hearts of palms.

22 [The following rules apply when a person] places spices from the Sabbatical year in a wrapping and inserts them into cooked food. If their flavor is nullified, they are permitted. If they retain their flavor, the holiness of the Sabbatical year is still invested in them.

23 Straw and hay from the Sabbatical year should not be placed in a pillow or in mud. If one did place them there, they are considered as if they have been destroyed. When an oven has been heated with straw and hay from the Sabbatical year, it should be allowed to cool.

Once the second wave of rains descend in the eighth year, we are allowed to benefit from straw and hay of the Sabbatical year and use it for kindling.

1 We may not use the produce of the Sabbatical year for commercial activity. If one desires to sell a small amount of the produce of the Sabbatical year, he may. The money he receives [in return] has the same status as the produce of the Sabbatical year. He should use it to purchase food and eat that food according to the restrictions of the holiness of the Sabbatical year. The produce that was sold retains the holiness it possessed previously.

2 [In the Sabbatical year,] one should not reap vegetables from a field and sell them, nor should one charge a fee for dyeing with shells [from produce] of the Sabbatical year, because this is using the produce of the Sabbatical year for commercial activity. If one reaped vegetables to partake of them and some were left over, he may sell the remainder. The proceeds are considered as the produce of the Sabbatical year. Similarly, if a person reaped vegetables for himself and his son or grandson took some of them and sold them, [the sale] is permitted and the proceeds are considered as the produce of the Sabbatical year.

3 When the produce of the Sabbatical year is sold, it should not be sold by measure, nor by weight, nor by number, so that it will not appear that one is selling produce in the Sabbatical year. Instead, one should sell a small amount by estimation to make it known that [the produce] is ownerless. And the proceeds of the sale should be used to purchase other food.

4 One may package those entities that are usually packaged to bring home to sell in the market by estimation in the manner that one packages produce to bring home, not like one packages it for the market so that one will not sell in a constrained manner. Produce that is packaged only for the marketplace should not be packaged.

5 Produce from the Diaspora which were brought into Eretz Yisrael should not be sold by measure, nor by weight, nor by number. Instead, they should be sold by estimation like the produce of Eretz Yisrael. If it was obvious that it was produce from the Diaspora, it is permitted [to sell it in the ordinary manner].

6 There is a stringency that applies to the produce of the Sabbatical year and not to articles consecrated [to the Temple]. When one redeems consecrated articles, the consecrated article loses its sacred status and that status is conveyed to the money. This is not so with regard to the produce of the Sabbatical year. When one sells the produce of the Sabbatical year, the status of the produce is conveyed to the money. The produce itself, however, does not lose its status and it is not considered as produce of the other years. [This is derived from] the use of the word tihiyeh [in the command regarding the produce of the Sabbatical year. That term implies that the produce] will be in its state at all times. And since the produce of the Sabbatical year is described as "holy," its status is conveyed to the money paid for it. Thus the final [object purchased] receives the status of the Sabbatical year and [the status of] the produce itself remains as before.

7 What is implied? A person purchased meat with the produce of the Sabbatical year or the proceeds from its sale. The meat is given the status of that produce and must be eaten [as befits the holiness of] the produce of the Sabbatical year. And one must rid oneself of it when one one must rid oneself of that produce. If one used that meat or the proceeds from its sale to purchase fish, the meat is considered as ordinary food and [the holiness of the Sabbatical year] is conveyed upon the fish. If one used that fish or the proceeds from its sale to purchase oil, the fish is considered as ordinary food and [the holiness of the Sabbatical year] is conveyed upon the oil. If one used that oil or the proceeds from its sale to purchase honey, the oil is considered as ordinary food and [the holiness of the Sabbatical year] is conveyed to the honey. One must rid oneself of the original fruit and the honey as one must rid oneself of the produce of the Sabbatical year. Neither of them may be used to make a compress, nor may they be ruined, as is the rule with regard to the produce of the Sabbatical year.

8 The holiness of the produce of the Sababtical year may be transferred only through a sale. When does this apply? With regard to the original produce. With regard to the produce received [in exchange for that produce], its holiness can be transferred through a sale or through a process of transfer.

9 When one is transferring the holiness of produce that was exchanged [for produce of the Sabbatical year], one may not transfer it to a domesticated animal, fowl, or beast, that is alive, lest they be left alive and one raise herds [of animals imbued with the holiness of the Sabbatical year]. Needless to say, this applies with the produce of the Sabbatical year itself. One may, however, transfer the holiness of this produce to animals that have been slaughtered.

10 Money received for produce of the Sabbatical year may not be used to pay a debt. Nor may one use it to repay shushbinut or return a favor. One should not use it to pay a pledge of charity for the poor in the synagogue. One may, however, send it for purposes associated with the acts of kindness, but one must notify the recipients.

Similarly, it may not be used to purchase servants, landed property, or a non-kosher animal. If it was used for those purposes, one should purchase ordinary food with a commensurate sum and partake of it [as befits the holiness of the Sabbatical year], as was explained with regard to the second tithes. One may not purchase pairs of doves for [the sacrifices of] zavim, zavot, or women after childbirth, or sin-offerings or guilt offerings. If he purchased [these offerings with these funds], he should purchase food with a commensurate sum and partake of it [as befits the holiness of the Sabbatical year]. One should not apply oil from the Sabbatical year to utensils or hides. If one did so, one should purchase food with a commensurate sum and partake of it [as befits the holiness of the Sabbatical year].

11 [This money] should not be given to a bathhouse attendant, a blood-letter, a person who sails a boat, or another craftsman. He may, however, give them to a person who draws water from a well to provide him with drinking water. It is permitted to give the produce of the Sabbatical year or money received in return for it to a craftsman as a present.

12 When a person tells a worker: "Here is an isar. Gather vegetables for me today," his wage is permitted. It is not considered as money received in return for produce of the Sabbatical year. Instead, he may use it for whatever he desires. The worker was not penalized in that his wage would be considered as money received for the produce of the Sabbatical year. If he told him: "Gather a vegetable for me today for it," [his wage] is considered as money received in return for produce of the Sabbatical year. He may use it only for eating and drinking like the produce of the Sabbatical year.

13 When donkey-drivers perform work with the produce of the Sabbatical year that is forbidden - e.g., they bring more than the [minimal amount] of produce - their wages are considered as money received in return for produce of the Sabbatical year. This is a penalty imposed upon them.

Why was a penalty imposed on the wages of a donkey-driver and not on the wages of a hired worker? Because the latter receives a minimal wage. Hence, he was not penalized so that [he could earn] his livelihood.

14 When a person purchases a loaf of bread from a baker for a pundiyon, and tells him: "When I harvest vegetables [grown in the Sabbatical year] from the field, I will bring them to you for it." this is permitted. The loaf of bread is considered as the produce of the Sabbatical year. If he purchases the loaf without making any qualifications, he should not pay him with money received for the produce of the Sabbatical year, because one should not use that money to pay debts.

15 One may partake of the produce of the Sabbatical year [in expectation that the recipient will return] the favor and when there are no such expectations. What is implied [by the idea of eating in expectation of the return of the favor]? One may give a colleague the produce of the Sabbatical year as if he had already performed a favor for him or invite him into his garden to eat as one who performed a favor for him.
When a person was given the produce of the Sabbatical year as a present or he inherited it, he should partake of it in the same manner as if he gathered this produce from the field himself.

1 We may only partake of the produce of the Sabbatical year as long as that species is found in the field. [This is derived from Leviticus 25:7]: "For the animal and the beast in your land will be all the produce to eat." [Implied is that] as long as a beast [can be] eating from this species in the field, one may eat from [what he has collected] at home. When there is no longer any [of that species] for the beast to eat in the field, one is obligated to remove that species from his home. This is the obligation of biyur which applies to the produce of the Sabbatical year.

2 What is implied? If a person has dried figs at home, he may partake of them as long as there are figs on the trees in the field. When there are no longer figs in the field, it is forbidden for him to partake of the figs he has at home and he must instead remove them.

3 If he had a large amount of produce, he should distribute a quantity that can be eaten in three meals to every person [he desires]. It is forbidden - both for the rich and the poor - to partake of it after the time of biyur. If he is not able to find people to eat at the time of biyur, he should burn it with fire or cast it into Mediterranean Sea, or destroy it through any other means.

4 If one had raisins from the Sabbatical year and there were no longer any grapes left in the fields, the gardens, and the orchards which are ownerless, even though there are still grapes on the vines in the courtyards, he may not partake of the raisins because of the grapes in the courtyard, because they are not accessible to a wild beast. If, however, there are very firm grapes that do not mature until the end of the year [still growing in the field], one may partake of the raisins [he has stored] because of them. Similar laws apply in all analogous instances.

5 When a tree produces fruit twice a year and one still possesses fruit from its first crop, he may partake of it as long as the second crop is still in the field. For [the requirement that] this species be [available] in the field [is met]. We do not, however, [continue to] partake [of stored fruit] because of fruit that grows in the fall, because it is considered as the produce of a different year.

6 When a person pickles three types of produce in one barrel, if one of these types of produce is no longer available in the field, that type of produce should be removed from the barrel. If he began partaking of [the pickled produce], the entire [mixture] is considered as having been removed.
Just as one is obligated to remove food [stored for] human consumption, so too, must he remove animal fodder from his home and he may no longer feed it to an animal if that type of produce is no longer available in the field.

7 Just as one must remove the produce of the Sabbatical year, so too, one must remove the money [received in exchange for it]. What is implied? One sold pomegranates of the Sabbatical year and used the money received in return for them [to purchase] food. When there are no longer any pomegranates on the trees in the field, but he remains in possession of the money he received for selling them, he is obligated to remove it from his possession.

8 What should he do? He should purchase food with this money and distribute it, [providing] three meals to every person [he desires]. Alternatively, if he does not find people to partake of such food, he should cast the money into the Mediterranean Sea.

9 [Eretz Yisrael is divided into] three lands [with regard to the obligation of] biyur:

a) the entire land of Yehudah, its mountainous portion, its plain, and its valley, is all one region.

b) the entire [West] Bank of the Jordan, [including] the plain of Lod, the mountains [around] the plain of Lod, [the area of] Beit Choron, with the sea, is all one region; and

c) the entire Galilee, the upper [Galilee], the lower [Galilee], and the area of Tiberias, is one region. In each of these three regions, one may partake [of a species of produce stored at home] until the last [traces of that produce] cease [to exist in the entire region's fields].

10 What is implied? If one possesses produce in the land of Yehudah, one may partake of it as long as this species is found [in the fields of] the entire land of Yehudah. Similar laws apply if he possesses produce from the Galilee or from the [West] Bank of the Jordan.

11 These three regions are considered as one entity with regard to carobs, olives, and dates. One may eat dates [throughout Eretz Yisrael] until the last dates are no longer available in Tzo'ar. From when are they no longer available? Purim. We may eat olives until Shavuot and grapes until Pesach of the eighth year. Dried figs may be eaten until Chanukah.

12 When a person transports produce of the Sabbatical year from a region in which it is no longer available [in the field] to a region where it is available, or from a region where it is available to a region in which it is no longer available, he is obligated in biyur. [The rationale is that] we place upon him the stringencies of the place from which he departed and those of the place to which he journeyed.

When the produce of Eretz Yisrael has been brought to the Diaspora, it should be destroyed in its place. It should not be transported from one place to another.

13 A great general principle was stated with regard to [the produce of] the Sabbatical year: Whenever [produce] is [used as] food for humans, animal fodder, or as one of the dyes, if it will not be maintained in the earth, the laws of the Sabbatical year apply to it and to money received for it and the requirements of biyur apply to it and to money received for it, e.g., the leaves of wild onions, mint, and endives, are considered as food for humans, brambles and thorn are considered as animal fodder, and woad and safflower are considered as dyes. If the species is maintained in the earth, e.g., madder and dyer's rocket from the dyes, even though the laws of the Sabbatical year apply to it and to money received for it. The requirements of biyur do not apply to it or to money received for it, because it is maintained in the earth. Instead, one may benefit from it and use it as dye until Rosh HaShanah.

14 Whenever a plant is not set aside to be [used as] food for humans, animal fodder, or as one of the dyes, since it is not used as kindling fuel, the laws of the Sabbatical year apply to it and to money received for it, but the requirements of biyur do not apply to it or to those monies. [This applies] even if it will not be maintained in the earth. Instead, we may benefit from it and the money received for it until Rosh HaShanah. Examples [of this category include] the roots of wild onions and mint and the scorpion-like herb.

15 The laws of the Sabbatical year apply to the peels and the buds of pomegranates, the shells of nuts, and the seeds [of other fruits] and to the money received for them, but the requirements of biyur do not apply to them or to those monies.

The laws of the Sabbatical year apply to the tips of the branches of grape vines and carob trees and to the money received for them, as do the requirements of biyur. The laws of the Sabbatical year apply to the tips of the branches of the evergreen oak, the pistachio tree, and the box thorn bush and to the money received for them, but the requirements of biyur do not apply to them. The requirement of biyur does apply to their leaves.

16 When is the time for biyur? For leaves, it is when they wither and fall from the tree. The leaves of olive trees, reeds, and carob trees do not have a time of biyur, because they never wither and fall away.

17 Until when does a person have the license to gather fresh grass in the Sabbatical year? Until the bitter [apples] become dried out. He may gather dried grasses until the second rains of the eighth year.

18 Until when are the poor permitted to enter the orchards in the eighth year to gather the fruits of the Sabbatical year? Until the second rains descend.

19 The laws of the Sabbatical year apply to roses, cloves, and chestnuts and to the money received for them. The laws of the Sabbatical year do not apply to balsam sap that flows from trees, from their leaves, and their roots. They do apply to [sap] that flows from underdeveloped berries and the money received for it.

20 When does the above apply? When the tree produces edible fruit. If, however, the tree is not fruitbearing, the sap that flows from its leaves and roots is considered as its fruit and the laws of the Sabbatical year apply to it and to the money received for it.

21 When a person pickles a rose from the Sabbatical year in the oil of the sixth year, he may gather the rose and it is permitted [to use] the oil [in an ordinary manner]. If he pickles [a rose] in the oil of the eighth year, he is obligated to perform biyur with the oil. [The rationale is] at that time, the rose is dry and the obligation of biyur has already fallen upon it.

22 When carobs of the Sabbatical year were left to soak in the wine of the sixth year or in the wine of the eighth year, biyur must be performed with the wine, because it has absorbed the flavor of the produce of the Sabbatical year. This is the general principle: When the produce of the Sabbatical year becomes mixed with other produce of the same species, even the slightest amount [causes the entire mixture to be considered as the produce of the Sabbatical year]. When it becomes mixed with other species, [the ruling depends on whether it has] imparted its flavor [or not].

1 Just as it is forbidden to work the land in the Sabbatical year, so too, it is forbidden to reinforce the hands of the Jews who do till it or to sell them farming tools, for it is forbidden to strengthen the hands of transgressors.

2 These are the utensils which a craftsman is not permitted to sell in the Sabbatical year to someone who is suspect [to violate the laws of] the Sabbatical year: a plow and all of its accessories, a yoke [for a team of oxen], a winnowing fork, and a mattock. This is the general principle: Any [utensil] that is exclusively used for a type of work that is forbidden in the Sabbatical year is forbidden to be sold to a person suspect [to violate the laws of] the Sabbatical year. [If it is used for] a type of work that may be forbidden or which might be permitted, it is permitted to be sold to a person suspect [to violate the laws of] the Sabbatical year.

3 What is implied? He may sell him a sickle and a wagon and all of its accessories. For if he uses it to harvest a small amount of produce and he brings a small amount of produce on the wagon, it is permitted. If, however, he harvests in the ordinary manner of reapers or brings all the produce of his field, it is forbidden.

4 It is permissible to sell [a utensil] - even one which is exclusively used for tasks forbidden in the Sabbatical year - to someone who is not suspect [to violate the laws of] the Sabbatical year without any stipulations, because it is possible that he purchased the article in the Sabbatical year to perform work [with it] after the Sabbatical year.

5 A potter may sell a person five jugs for oil and fifteen jugs for wine. It is permitted to sell a larger amount to a gentile. One need not suspect that perhaps he will sell them to a Jew. One may sell many jugs to a Jew in the Diaspora. One need not suspect that perhaps he will bring them to Eretz [Yisrael].

6 One may sell a cow that plows to a person suspect [to violate the laws of the Sabbatical year] in the Sabbatical year, because it is possible to slaughter it. One may sell such a person a field, for it is possible that he will leave it fallow. He may not, however, sell him an orchard unless he stipulates that [the purchaser] does not have a share in the trees' [produce]. He may lend him [a measure of] a se'ah even though he knows that he has a granary, because he might use it to measure in his house. And he may exchange money for him even though he knows that he has workers [employed in violation of the laws of the Sabbatical year]. In all these instances, [if the purchaser states] explicitly [that he is intending to use the article in violation of the laws of the Sabbatical year, it] is forbidden.

7 Similarly, a woman may lend a sifter, a sieve, a mill, and an oven to a friend who is suspect [to violate the prohibitions of the Sabbatical year], but she may not sift or grind with her.

8 We may encourage the gentiles [working] in the Sabbatical year, but only verbally. For example, if one sees one plowing or sowing, he should tell him: "Be strong," "Be successful," or the like, because they are not commanded to let the land rest. One may not physically assist them. It is permitted to remove honey from a beehive with them and one may enter a sharecropping agreement with them for land whose ground was broken [in the Sabbatical year], for they are not obligated to observe [these restrictions]. [Hence,] they are not penalized [for their violation].

9 In Syria, it is permitted to perform labor with produce that has been harvested, but not with produce that is still connected to the earth. What is implied? One may thresh produce, winnow it, squeeze grapes, and make sheaves out of grain, but one may not harvest grain, grapes, olives, or perform any similar activities.

10 Just as it is forbidden to engage in business transactions with the produce of the Sabbatical year or to store them [until after the obligation of biyur has been incurred], so too, it is forbidden to purchase them from a common person. [The rationale is that] we do not give even the slightest amount of money exchanged for the produce of the Sabbatical year to a common person, lest he not partake of [food purchased with it] in a manner that befits the holiness of the Sabbatical year.

11 When a person purchases a lulav from a common person in the Sabbatical year, he should give him an esrog as a present. If he does not give it to him, he should have the price of the esrog included in the price of the lulav.

12 When does the above apply? When a person sells types of fruit that are usually protected, e.g., figs, pomegranates, or the like. If, however, he sells fruit which we could assume is ownerless, e.g., rue, amaranth, moss rose, coriander and the like, it is permitted to purchase from them a small amount, merely the worth of three meals. [This leniency was granted to allow] the seller to earn his livelihood.

13 Similarly, any species from which the tithes are not obligated to be separated, e.g., exceedingly powerful garlic, the onions of Rikpah, a pearled Cilcilian bean, Egyptian lentils, and the like, and also the seeds of plants when [the seeds] are not eaten, e.g., those of turnips, radishes, and the like, may be purchased from any person in the Sabbatical year.

14 When does the above apply? To an ordinary common person. When, however, one is suspect to carry out transactions with the produce of the Sabbatical year or to guard his produce and sell it, we may not purchase anything from him that has any connection to the Sabbatical year. [Similarly,] we may not purchase flax - even combed out flax - from him. One may, however, purchase [flax] that has been spun and twisted [into threads].

15 A person who is suspect [to sell produce of] the Sabbatical year is not necessarily considered as suspect to [sell produce of the second] tithe. [Similarly,] one who is suspect [to sell produce of the second] tithe is not necessarily considered as suspect [to sell produce of] the Sabbatical year even though they are both Scriptural commandments. [The rationale is that each possesses a stringency which the other lacks.] The [second] tithe must be brought to [Jerusalem] and this does not apply with regard to [the produce of] the Sabbatical year. [Conversely, the produce of] the Sabbatical year cannot be redeemed and this does not apply with regard to [the produce of] the second tithe.

16 A person who is suspect [of selling impure food as if it were] ritually pure is not suspect [to sell produce of the second] tithe or [that of] the Sabbatical year. For the impure food that was sold as being ritually pure imparts impurity to others only according to Rabbinic Law and one who is suspect [of causing the transgression] of Rabbinic Law is not suspect [of causing the violation] of Scriptural Law.

17 Whenever a person is suspect [of selling entities in violation of a prohibition], even though his word is not accepted with regard to his own property, his word is accepted with regard to [the property of] others. We operate under the assumption that a person will not violate a prohibition for the sake of others. Therefore even though a person is suspect with regard to a given [prohibition], he may judge and offer testimony regarding this matter.

18 Priests are considered suspect with regard to [the prohibitions of] the Sabbatical year. [The reason is that] they rationalize their conduct saying: Since the terumot are permitted to us even though they are forbidden to non-priests [and this violation is punishable] by death, certainly, the produce of the Sabbatical year is permitted to us.

Therefore when a se'ah of terumah falls into 100 se'ah of the produce of the Sabbatical year, a se'ah should be separated. If it fell into less than 100 se'ah, the entire mixture should be left to rot instead of being sold to priests as other produce which is miduma, because they are suspect to violate the prohibitions of the Sabbatical year.

19 Painters and cattle-raisers may purchase bran from any source. They need not suspect it is sefichin of the Sabbatical year.

20 In the Sabbatical year, the collectors of the kupah were not careful [to refrain from entering] the courtyards of those who partake [of the sefichin] of the Sabbatical year. If they gave a loaf of bread, it is permitted [for the poor to partake of it]. We do not suspect that perhaps it is from the sefichin of the Sabbatical year. For the Jews were not suspect to give [the produce of the Sabbatical year to charity], only money received for the produce of the Sabbatical year or eggs which were purchased with money received for the produce of the Sabbatical year.

It is permitted to borrow the produce of the Sabbatical year from the poor. They should be repaid with produce in the eighth year.

1 It is a positive commandment to nullify a loan in the Sabbatical year, as [Deuteronomy 15:2] states: "All of those who bear debt must release their hold." A person who demands payment of a debt after the Sabbatical year passed violates a negative commandment, as it is stated [ibid.]: "One shall not demand [payment] from his friend and his brother."

2 The nullification of debts applies according to Scriptural Law only in the era when the Jubilee year is observed and [the sale of] land is also nullified, for the land [that has been sold] returns to its original owners without financial payment. This matter was conveyed through the chain of tradition. Our Sages declared: In the era when you nullify [the sale of] land, you nullify debts everywhere, whether in Eretz Yisrael or in the Diaspora. In the era when you do not nullify [the sale of] land, you do not nullify debts anywhere, even in Eretz Yisrael.

3 According to Rabbinic Law, the nullification of debts applies in the present age in all places, even though the Jubilee year is not observed. [This is a decree, instituted] so that the concept of the nullification of debts will not be forgotten by the Jewish people.

4 The Sabbatical year does not nullify debts until its conclusion. [This is derived as follows: Deuteronomy 15:1-2] states: "At the end of seven years, you shall effect a remission. This is the matter of the remission." And [Deuteronomy 31:10] states: "At the end of seven years, at the time of the Sabbatical year, during the holiday of Sukkot." Just as in that instance, [the event takes place] after the seven [years], so too, the nullification of the debts takes place after the seven [years].

Therefore if one lent money to a colleague in the Sabbatical year itself, he may demand payment of his debt for the entire year. When the sun sets on the night of Rosh HaShanah of the eighth year, the debt is nullified.

5 If one slaughtered a cow and divided it under the supposition that today would be [declared as] Rosh HaShanah, but instead, a day was added to Elul and thus that day was the final day of the Sabbatical year, the money is lost, for the Sabbatical year ended while the debt was extant.

6 The Sabbatical year nullifies a loan, even a loan supported by a promissory note which creates a lien on one's possessions. If, however, the borrower designated a field [to serve as payment] for the loan, it is not nullified. The Sabbatical year also nullifies the obligation to take an oath, for [the prooftext] states: "He shall not demand," i.e., neither payment, nor an oath.

7 When does the above apply? With regard to an oath imposed by the judges and the like, i.e., obligations that were he to accept them, the Sabbatical year would nullify them. But oaths taken by watchmen or partners and the like, i.e., oaths that were he to admit [the obligation], he would be required to pay [after the Sabbatical year], he is required to take the oath after the Sabbatical year.

8 If a person gave a colleague a loan and then demanded payment, [the colleague] denied the obligation and remained in denial when [the conclusion of] the Sabbatical year arrived and then he admitted his obligation or witnesses came [and testified to that effect] after the Sabbatical year [was concluded], the obligation is not nullified.

9 When a person lends money to a colleague and sets [the time of payment] in ten years time, it is not nullified [by the Sabbatical year. The rationale is that] although [ultimately, the command,] "Do not demand [payment]" will apply, at present, he may not demand payment. If he stipulated that he would not demand payment, [the debt] is nullified by the Sabbatical year.

10 When a person lends money to a colleague and he stipulates with [the borrower] that [the debt] will not be nullified by the Sabbatical year, it is nullified, for he cannot negate the law of the Sabbatical year. If [the borrower] stipulates that he will not nullify this debt, even in the Sabbatical year, the stipulation is binding, for any stipulation made regarding financial matters is binding. Thus this person took on a financial obligation which the Torah did not obligate him in.

11 An account at a store is not nullified by the Sabbatical year. If it is established as a debt, it is nullified. The wage of a worker is not nullified. If it is considered as a debt, it is nullified.

12 The fines for a rapist, a seducer and one who spreads a slanderous report [about his wife] are not nullified by the Sabbatical year. If they are considered as debts, they are nullified. When are they considered as a debt? When the matter was brought to court.

13 When a person divorces his wife before the Sabbatical year, [his obligations to her by virtue of] her ketubah are not nullified by the Sabbatical year. If she impaired the legal power [of her ketubah] or considered it as a debt, it can be nullified.

14 When a person lends money in exchange for security, the debt is not nullified by the Sabbatical year, provided the security is equal in value to the debt. If the debt exceeds the value of the security, the extra amount is nullified by the Sabbatical year.

15 When a person hands over his promissory notes to the court, telling [the judges]: "Collect my debt for me," the debts are not nullified by the Sabbatical year. [This is derived from Deuteronomy 15:3]: "[a debt] that you have from your brother."[Implied is that debts demanded by "your brother," a private individual, are nullified by the Sabbatical year. [Payment for] these [debts, by contrast,] is being demanded by the court.
Similarly, if the court rendered a judgment, writing: "So-and-so, you are obligated to give this person this-and-this amount," [the debt] is not nullified. Such [a debt] is considered as if it has already been collected and entered [the creditor's] possession. It does not resemble a loan.

16 When Hillel the Elder saw that the people would refrain from lending to each other and thus violated the Scriptural charge [Deuteronomy 15:9]: "Lest there be a wicked thought in your heart," he ordained a pruzbol so that debts would not be nullified and people would lend to each other.
A pruzbol is effective only with regard to the nullification of debts in the present era which are a Rabbinic institution. A pruzbol is not effective with regard to the nullification of debts by Scriptural Law.

17 A pruzbol should be composed only by very great Sages like the court of Rabbi Ami and Rabbi Assi, for they are suitable to release financial [obligations due] others. Other courts [of lesser authority] may not compose [a pruzbol].

18 This represents the body of a pruzbol: "I am notifying you, so-and-so and so-and so the judges in this-and-this places, [that I reserve the right] to collect all the debts [owed] to me at any time I desire." The judges or the witnesses should sign below.

19 A pruzbol may be composed only when [the borrower possesses] land. If the borrower does not possess land, the lender should grant the borrower even the slightest amount of land - even enough to grow a cabbage stalk- in his field. [Even if] he lent him place for an oven or a range, a pruzbol may be composed. If [the borrower] owns a field that was given as security, a pruzbol may be composed on that basis.

20 [A pruzbol] may be composed against a man based on property owned by his wife or against orphans on property owned by their guardian. If [the borrower] does not possess land, but the guarantor does, we can compose a pruzbol because of it. If [a borrower] is owed a debt by a colleague and the colleague owns land - since that land is on lien [to the first borrower] - we may compose a pruzbol because of it.

21 When one person borrows from five others, each one must have a pruzbol composed. When five people borrow from one, one pruzbol is sufficient for him for all the debts.

22 When a person has a pruzbol composed and then he makes a loan, it is not effective. Instead, the loan will be nullified unless he composes [another] pruzbol after giving the loan. Thus one can conclude that any loan which precedes a pruzbol is not nullified because of this pruzbol. If the pruzbol precedes the loan, it is nullified [despite] this pruzbol.

23 Accordingly, a pruzbol that is predated is valid, while one that is postdated, is invalid.

What is implied? One wrote a pruzbol in Nissan and predated it to Adar, it is valid, for he has impaired its legal power, for [only the loans given] until Adar are not nullified. If, however, he postdated it and dated it in Iyar, it is invalid, for he has strengthened its legal power, for [were it to be effective] the loans given until Iyar would not be nullified. This is unlawful, because it is only [the loans given] until Nissan that are not nullified, for that [is when] the matters were conveyed to the court.

24 When a person produces a promissory note after the Sabbatical year without it being accompanied by a pruzbol, the debt is lost. If he says: "I possessed [a pruzbol] and it was lost, his word is accepted. For from the time of the danger onward, a creditor was allowed to collect his debt [after the Sabbatical year] without a pruzbol.

Moreover, when a creditor would bring the promissory note [to court] or would come and demand payment of a loan supported by a verbal commitment [alone], [the court] tells the defendant: "Pay him." If the defendant claims: "Where is his pruzbol?", the court asks the plaintiff: "Did you have a pruzbol that was lost?" If he answers affirmatively, his word is accepted. If he admits that he did not have a pruzbol, the debt is nullified.

25 [When the plaintiff] produces a pruzbol, the defendant claims: "The loan for which he is demanding payment was made after the pruzbol," and the plaintiff retorts: "It was made before the pruzbol," the plaintiff's word is accepted. [The rationale is] were he to have claimed: "I had [a pruzbol] and it was lost," his word would have been accepted even though we do not know the date of the pruzbol that was lost.

26 If the defendant claims: "I owe him a debt," and the plaintiff states: "No, it is an account from a store which is not nullified [by the Sabbatical year], because I have not yet considered it as a loan," his word is accepted, for were he to desire, he could say: "It was a loan, but I had a pruzbol and it was lost." [Leniency is granted in these instances,] because once the Sages instituted [the concept of] pruzbol, we operate under the assumption that a person will not forgo something permitted and partake of something that is forbidden.

27 When Torah Sages offer loans to each other and one conveys his words to his students, saying: "I am notifying you [that I reserve the right] to collect all the debts [owed] to me at any time I desire," he does not have to compose a pruzbol. [The rationale is that Torah scholars] know that the nullification of debts in the present era is a Rabbinic decree and it can be negated verbally.

28 [Whenever] anyone returns a debt [despite the fact] that the Sabbatical year has passed, the spirits of our Sages are gratified because of him. [When receiving the payment,] the lender must say to the one who is making restitution: "I am nullifying [the debt] and your [obligation] to me has been released." If the debtor says: "Nevertheless, I desire that you accept it," he should accept it. For the Torah states: "One shall not demand [payment]," and payment was not demanded.

[The debtor] should not tell [the creditor]: "I am giving them to you as [payment of] my debt. Instead, he should tell him: "[The money] is mine, and I am giving it to you as a present."

29 If [a debtor] returned a debt, but did not make the above statements, [the lender] should turn the conversation to the point where the debtor says: "[The money] is mine, and I am giving it to you as a present." If [the debtor] does not make such statements, [the creditor] should not accept it from him. Instead, [the debtor] should take his money and depart.

30 One who refrains from lending money to a colleague before the Sabbatical year lest [the repayment] of the debt be delayed and it be nullified, violates a negative commandment, as [Deuteronomy 15:9] states: "Be careful [lest there be a wicked thought in your heart....]" It is a severe sin, for the Torah warned against it with two adjurations, for it is written: "Be careful lest," and whenever the Torah uses the expressions "Be careful," "lest," or "Do not," it is communicating a negative commandment. The Torah objected to this evil thought and called it "wicked" and the verse continued warning and commanding one not to refrain [from lending], but to give [the loan], as [ibid.:10] states: "You shall certainly give him and your Heart should not regret giving him." [Indeed,] the Holy One, blessed be He, promised that the reward for this mitzvah will be granted in this world, as [the verse continues:] "Because of this God will bless you."

1 It is a positive commandment to count sets of seven years and to sanctify the fiftieth year, as [Leviticus 25:8-10] states: "And you shall count seven years for yourselves... and you shall sanctify the fiftieth year." These two mitzvot are entrusted to the High Court alone.

2 When did the counting begin? After the fourteen years following the entry into Eretz [Yisrael]. [This is derived from Leviticus 25:3]: "Six years shall you sow your field and six years shall you trim your vineyard." [Implied is that] each person must recognize his [portion of the] land. [The people] took seven years to conquer the land and seven years to divide it. Thus the counting began after the 2503rd year after the creation, from Rosh HaShanah, after the conjunction [of the sun and the moon before the creation] of Adam, which was in the second year of the creation. They declared the [two thousand,] five hundred, and tenth year after the creation which was the 21st year after the entry into Eretz Yisrael as the Sabbatical year. They counted seven Sabbatical years and then sanctified the fiftieth year which was the 64th year after they entered Eretz [Yisrael].

3 The Jewish people counted 17 Jubilee years from the time they entered [Eretz Yisrael] until they departed. The year they departed, when the Temple was destroyed the first time, was the year following the Sabbatical year and the 36th year in the Jubilee cycle. For the First Temple stood for 410 years. When it was destroyed, this reckoning ceased.

After it ceased, the land remained desolate for seventy years. Then the Second Temple was built and it stood for 420 years. In the seventh year after it was built, Ezra ascended [to Eretz Yisrael]. This is referred to as the second entry. From this year, they began another reckoning. They designated the thirteenth year of the Second Temple as the Sabbatical year and counted seven Sabbatical years and sanctified the fiftieth year. Although the Jubilee year was not observed in [the era of] the Second Temple, they would count it in order to sanctify the Sabbatical years.

4 It follows that the year in which the [Second] Temple was destroyed, [more precisely, the year] beginning from Tishrei that was approximately two months after the destruction - for the reckoning of Sabbatical and Jubilee years begins in Tishrei - was the year following the Sabbatical year. It was the fifteenth year of the ninth Jubilee cycle.

According to this reckoning, this year which is the 1107 year after the destruction, which is the 1487th year according to the reckoning of legal documents, which is 4936th year after the creation, is a Sabbatical year and it is the 21st year of the Jubilee cycle.

5 Nevertheless, all of the Geonim have said that they have received a tradition, transferred from teacher to student that in the seventy years between the destruction of the First Temple and the building of the Second Temple, they counted only Sabbatical years, not the Jubilee year. Similarly, after the destruction of the Second Temple, they did not count the fiftieth year. Instead, they counted only sets of seven from the beginning of the year of the destruction. [This interpretation] is also apparent from the Talmud in Avodah Zarah. This reckoning is a received tradition.

6 [The reckoning of] the Sabbatical year is well-known and renowned among the Geonim and the people of Eretz Yisrael. None of them make any reckoning except according to the years of the destruction. According to this reckoning, this year, which is the 1107th year after the destruction is the year following the Sabbatical year.

We rely on this tradition and we rule according to it with regard to the tithes, the Sabbatical year, and the nullification of debts, for the received tradition and deed are great pillars in establishing [Halachic] rulings and it is appropriate to rely on them.

7 The Jubilee year is not counted in the set of Sabbatical years. Instead, the 49th year is a Sabbatical year and the fiftieth year is a Jubilee year. Then the 51st year is the first of the six years of the [next] Sabbatical cycle. This is true of every Jubilee year.

8 From the time the tribes of Reuven and Gad and half the tribe of Menasheh were exiled, [the observance] of the Jubilee year ceased, as [implied by Leviticus 25:10]: "You shall proclaim freedom throughout the land to all of its inhabitants." [One can infer that this commandment applies only] when all of its inhabitants are dwelling within it. [Moreover,] they may not be intermingled, one tribe with another, but rather each tribe is dwelling in its appropriate place.

When the Jubilee is observed in Eretz [Yisrael], it should also be observed in the Diaspora, as [implied by the phrase used in the above verse:] "It is the Jubilee," [i.e.,] in every place. [This applies] whether the Temple is standing or whether the Temple is not standing.

9 When [the laws of] the Jubilee year are observed, the laws of a Hebrew servant are observed, as are the laws of homes in a walled city, the laws of a field given as a dedication offering, and the laws of ancestral fields. We accept [a gentile as] a resident alien and the Sabbatical year is observed in Eretz [Yisrael] and debts are nullified in all places according to Scriptural Law. In the era when the Jubilee year is not observed, none of these mitzvot are observed except the Sabbatical year in Eretz [Yisrael] according to Rabbinic Law and also the nullification of debts in all places according to Rabbinic Law, as we explained.

10 It is a positive commandment to sound the shofar on the tenth of Tishrei in the Jubilee year. This mitzvah is entrusted to the [High] Court first, as [Leviticus 25:9] states: "You shall sound a shofar blast. Each and every individual is also obligated to sound the shofar, as [the verse] continues: "and you shall sound the shofar."

We sound nine shofar blasts in the same way as we sound them on Rosh HaShanah. We sound the shofar throughout the boundaries of [Eretz]

Yisrael.

11 [The requirements] of shofar used for the Jubilee and Rosh HaShanah are the same in all matters. Both on Rosh HaShanah and in the Jubilee the tekiyot are sounded except in the Jubilee year, they are sounded both in the court that sanctifies the new moon and in a court that does not sanctify the moon. [Moreover,] for the entire time the court is in session, every individual is obligated to sound [the shofar even] outside the presence of the court.

12 When Rosh HaShanah falls on the Sabbath, by contrast, [the shofar] would be sounded only in a court that sanctified the new moon. Every individual may sound [the shofar] only in the presence of the court.

13 [The observance of] three matters are of critical importance with regard to the Jubilee year: the sounding of the shofar, the release of servants, and the return of fields to their owners. This is referred to as "the release of land."

14 From Rosh HaShanah until Yom Kippur, servants would not be released to their homes, nor would they be subjugated to their masters, nor would the fields return to their [original] owners. Instead, the servants would eat, drink, and rejoice, with crowns on their heads. When Yom Kippur arrives and the shofar is sounded in the court, the servants are released to their homes and the fields are returned to their owners.

15 With regard to the land being allowed to rest, the laws of the Jubilee year are the same of those of the Sabbatical year. Whatever agricultural labors are forbidden in the Sabbatical year are forbidden in the Jubilee year. Whatever is permitted in the Sabbatical year is permitted in the Jubilee. Whenever the performance of a labor is punishable by lashes in the Sabbatical year, it is punishable by lashes in the Jubilee year. [Similarly,] the laws governing the eating, sale, and removal of the produce of the Jubilee year are the same as those governing the produce of the Sabbatical year in all respects.

16 The Sabbatical year has an added dimension lacking in the Jubilee, for debts are nullified in the Sabbatical year, and they are not nullified in the Jubilee. The Jubilee year has an added dimension lacking in the Sabbatical year, for in the Jubilee, servants are released and land is released. This refers to the laws regarding the sale of land in the Torah. This is a positive commandment, as [Leviticus 25:24] states: "You shall grant redemption to the land.

The Jubilee year releases land at its beginning, while the Sabbatical year does not release debts until its conclusion, as explained.

1 [The portions of] Eretz Yisrael that were divided among the tribes can never be sold permanently, as [Leviticus 25:23] states: "The land will not be sold in perpetuity." If one sells the land in perpetuity, both [the buyer and the seller] violate a negative commandment. Their deeds are of no consequence, and the land reverts to its [original] owner in the Jubilee year.

2 When a person sells his field for 60 years, it is not returned in the Jubilee. For [the only property] that returns in the Jubilee year is property that is sold without qualification or property that is sold in perpetuity.

3 A person should not sell his home or his ancestral field even though it returns to him eventually, unless he becomes impoverished, as [Leviticus 25:25] states: "If your brother becomes indigent and sells his ancestral heritage." One is not permitted to sell [such property] and hold the money in his pocket, engage in commerce with them, or purchase utensils, servants, or livestock. [He is only allowed to] sell to provide himself with sustenance. [Nevertheless,] if one transgressed and sold [such property], the sale is valid.

4 Judgments are made with regard to a home in accordance with the laws of a walled city, and with regard to a field in accordance with the laws of a field that is an ancestral heritage. The laws of a person who sells a field that is an ancestral heritage [require] the calculation of the years remaining until the Jubilee. Whenever [the original owner] desires to redeem the field he should make a reckoning with the purchaser with regard to the years from which he benefited from the field and reduce that from the purchase price and return the remainder.

5 What is implied? There remained ten years until the Jubilee and a field was sold for 100 dinar. The purchaser benefited from the field for three years and then the seller desired to redeem his field. He should give him 70 dinar and then [the seller] should return the field. Similarly, if he benefited from the field for six years, he should give him 40 dinar and then [the seller] should return the field. If he did not redeem it, but instead left it in the purchaser's possession until the Jubilee, and then it should return to the owner without money, as [indicated by Leviticus 25:15]: "According to the number of years of [its] crops, he will sell it to you."

6 If he sold it to him when it was filled with produce and then he redeemed it after two years, he cannot tell him: "Return it to me filled with produce as it was when I sold it to you." Therefore if he sold it to him filled with produce before Rosh HaShanah and redeemed it after two years, the purchaser will have benefited from three harvests in those two years. Nevertheless, [the reduction of the price] is calculated only according to two years, as [implied by ibid. 27:18: "the priest shall calculate the money...] according to the remaining years," [i.e., the calculation is made according to years,] and not according to crops.

7 The shoots, the twigs, and the fruits from the wild fig trees contained within it belong to the purchaser like its other produce. If, however, [the branches of a tree] are cut down or it dries, they are both forbidden to benefit from it. What should be done? It should be sold and land purchased with the proceeds. The purchaser is entitled to benefit from that land until the [original] field is redeemed from him.

8 If a person purchases a field that is an ancestral heritage and plants trees which increase the value [of the field], when it returns [to its original owner] in the Jubilee, we should evaluate the increase in value brought about by the trees in it and the owner of the field must pay this sum to the purchaser. [This is derived from ibid. 25:33]: "A home that was sold shall go out... [in the Jubilee]." [Implied is that the home] is returned, but not the increase in its value.

9 When a person sells his field in the era when the Jubilee year is observed as we explained, he is not permitted to redeem it in less than two years, as [ibid.:15] states: "According to the number of years of [its] crops, he will sell it to you." Even if the purchaser was willing [to return it earlier], it is forbidden, as [the same verse] states: "According to the number of years after the Jubilee shall you purchase it from your colleague." [The purchaser must maintain possession for] at least two years from the date of the sale.

10 The purchaser must benefit from two crops in these two years and then [the seller] may redeem it, for it is written "years of its crops." Therefore if one of the two years were the Sabbatical year or a year of windblast or blight, they are not included in the reckoning.

11 If, however, the purchaser left it fallow one year and then benefited from it in the second year or benefited from it one year and then lightly plowed it, but did not sow it in the following year, [these years] are included in the reckoning. If he sold it in the Jubilee itself, the sale is not binding and the money should be returned to the seller.

12 If he sold it one year before the Jubilee, the purchaser benefits from it for a second year after the Jubilee, as [implied by the phrase]: "years of its crops."

13 If he sold clefts that were filled with water or rocky [land] that was not fit to sow upon, he may redeem them in less than two years, as [implied by the phrase]: "years of its crops." One might infer that it is only a field that is fit to grow crops that is not redeemed in less than two years. [Nevertheless,] if the original owner did not redeem [this land], it returns to him in the Jubilee even though it is not fit to be sown.

14 If he sold [fruit-]trees, they may not be redeemed in less than two years, for they are fit to produce crops. If he did not redeem them, they are not returned to the owner in the Jubilee, as [implied by ibid.:27]: "he shall return to his ancestral heritage." [This excludes] trees.

15 If a person sold his field to one person, that person sold it to a second, the second to a third - even if there were 100 consecutive sales - in the Jubilee, it returns to its original owner, as [implied by Leviticus 27:24]: "In the Jubilee year, the field will return to the one from whom he purchased it, whose ancestral heritage it was."

16 If [the owner] sold it to the first purchaser for 100 dinarim and [the latter] sold it to the second for 200, should the original owner desire to redeem it, he makes a reckoning only with the first purchaser, as [ibid. 25:27] states: "[And return the remainder] to the man to whom he sold it." If [the owner] sold it to a person for 200 and [the latter] sold it for 100, [the owner] makes a reckoning with the final [purchaser].

Similarly, if he sold the field for 100 and it increased in value in the possession of the purchaser until it was appropriate to be sold for 200, the reckoning should be made according to the purchase price. If he sold it for 200 and its value diminished and it is now fit to be sold for 100, the reckoning should be made according to its present value. [The general principle is:] We always augment the legal power of the seller of an ancestral heritage and weaken the legal power of the purchaser.

17 When a person sells a field that is an ancestral heritage, but he also possesses other fields and sells some of those other fields to redeem [his ancestral heritage] that he sold, his [request to redeem the field] is not heeded, for [ibid.:26] states: "And he attained enough to redeem it." [We can infer that] he must attain something that was not accessible to him at the time he sold it. Similarly, if he borrowed [money] to redeem [the field], his [request] is not heeded, for that verse states: "And he acquired." [Implied is that he must obtain the means on his own], not through a loan.

18 If he attained a small amount [of resources] and desired to redeem half the field he sold, his [request] is not heeded, for that verse states: "enough to redeem it." Either he redeems the entire [field] or he does not redeem at all.

If a relative desired to redeem it, he may, as [ibid.:25] states: "And his redeemer who is related to him shall come...."

19 When a person gives his field away as a present, it returns to him in the Jubilee, as [ibid.:13] states: "Each man shall return to his ancestral heritage." This includes one who gave [it away as] a present.

20 Brothers who divide [an inheritance] are considered as purchasers and each one should return his portion to the other in the Jubilee, but their division is not nullified. Similarly, a firstborn and one who performs yibbum with his brother's wife, return the portion that they received in the Jubilee and take another portion instead of it.

21 [Different rules apply with regard to a husband] who inherits his wife's [property]. Although a husband's inheritance of this property is a Rabbinic ordinance, our Sages reinforced their decree as if it were of Scriptural origin and he is not required to return it [to the women's family] in the Jubilee year. If he inherited a [family] cemetery from her, he should return it to her family members lest this blemish [the reputation of] the family. They should pay him its worth after deducting the value of his wife's grave, for he is obligated to bury her.

1 A person who sells a house in a city surrounded by a wall may redeem it throughout a twelve month period from the day he sold it whenever he desires, even on the day he sold it. When he redeems it, he returns all the money he received and does not deduct anything from the purchaser.

2 Relatives may not redeem it, only the seller himself if he obtains the means. He may sell his property and redeem it, but he may not borrow to redeem it, nor may he redeem it partially.

3 If the purchaser dies, [the original owner] may redeem it from his son. Similarly, if the seller dies, his son may redeem it for the duration of the twelve months.

4 If [the seller] sold it to one person and he sold it to another, the reckoning is made from [the date of] the first [sale]. When the first year is concluded, the house is established as the property of the [second] purchaser. For the [second] seller sold to the second [purchaser] all the rights that will accrue to him [with regard to this property]. If twelve months pass and it is not redeemed, it is established as the property of the [second] purchaser.

Similarly, if [a person] gave a house as a present and did not redeem it within these twelve months, it is established as the property of the recipient of the present.

5 During a leap year, the permanent disposition of the property is not brought about until the end of the year, as [Leviticus 25:30] states: "Until a complete year is completed for it." [This wording indicates that] the extra month [of the leap year] is included.

6 [The following rules apply when a person] sold two houses, one in the middle of Adar 1 and the other on Rosh Chodesh Adar II. When the month of Adar arrives in the following year, the year for the house sold on Rosh Chodesh II is completed. The year for the house sold in the middle of Adar I is not completed until the middle of Adar in the following year,

7 If the final day of the twelfth month arrives and [the seller] cannot find the purchaser to redeem his field from him, he may deposit his money in the court, break down the door, and enter his home. Whenever the purchaser comes, he may take his money.

8 When a person consecrates a house in a walled city and another person redeems it from the Temple treasury, when a year passes from the time that it was redeemed from the Temple treasury without it being redeemed by its [original] owner, it becomes established as the property of the one who redeemed it [from the Temple treasury]. For the Temple treasury does not become the permanent owner, the purchaser does, as [implied by Leviticus 25:30]: "the one who purchases it for his generations."

9 When a person sells a house in a walled city and the Jubilee arrives within the first year after the sale, the house does not revert to its owner in the Jubilee. Instead, it remains in the possession of the purchaser until the seller decides to redeem it throughout the year after its sale or it becomes established as the property [of the purchaser] after that year is completed.

10 When a person sells a home in a settlement or in a city that is not surrounded by a wall in the appropriate manner, he may redeem it according to the advantages that apply with regard to both the redemption of an [ancestral] field and the redemption of a home in a walled city.

What is implied? If he desires to redeem [the home] immediately, he may, as is the law with regard to a home [in a walled city]. If the twelve months pass and he does not redeem it, he may redeem it until the Jubilee, as is the law regarding a field. When he redeems it, he makes a reckoning with the purchaser and subtracts the value of the benefit he received. If the Jubilee arrives without having redeemed it, the house returns [to the owner] without payment, as is the law with regard to fields.

11 Any [residential property] within a city's wall, e.g., gardens, bathhouses, and dovecotes, is considered as a house, for [ibid.] states: "that are in the city." Fields that are located in the city may be redeemed according to the rules applying to fields outside the city, as [implied the phrase (ibid.)]: "And the house that will be within the city will be established." [This includes] houses and anything resembling houses, not fields.

12 When a house is not four cubits by four cubits, it does not become the permanent property of the purchaser like the houses in a walled city. A house does not become the permanent property of a purchaser in Jerusalem. A house that is built in the wall is not considered as a home in a walled city.

13 When the roofs of a city serve as its walls or the sea serves as it wall,it is not considered as a city surrounded by a wall.

14 A city is not referred to as a walled city unless it has three or more courtyards and in each of the courtyards, it has two or more houses. [Moreover,] it must have been surrounded by a wall first and then the courtyards were built in its midst. If, however, a place was settled and afterwards, surrounded [by a wall] or it did not have [at least] three courtyards with [at least] two houses [each], it is not considered as a walled city. Instead, its houses are like the houses of a settlement.

15 We rely only on a wall that surrounded [a city] at the time of the conquest of the land.

What is implied? When a city was not surrounded by a wall at the time when Joshua conquered the land even though it is surrounded now, [the houses in it] are considered as the houses of a settlement. [Conversely,] if a city was surrounded by a wall at the time of Joshua, even though it is not surrounded at present, it is considered as walled.

When the Jews were exiled after the first destruction [of the Temple], the sanctity of the walled cities from Joshua's time were nullified. When Ezra ascended at the time of the second entry into the land, all of the walled cities of that time became consecrated. For the entry [into the land] at the time of Ezra, i.e., the second entry, was comparable to the entry at the time of Joshua. Just as [after] their entry at the time of Joshua, they counted Sabbatical years and Jubilees, sanctified the homes in walled cities and were obligated in the tithes, so too, [after] their entry in the time of Ezra, they counted Sabbatical years and Jubilees, sanctified the homes in walled cities and were obligated in the tithes.

16 Similarly, in the Ultimate Future, upon the third entry to the land, we will begin to count the Sabbatical and Jubilee years and sanctify the homes in walled cities, and every place that will be conquered will be obligated in

[the separation of] tithes, as [Deuteronomy 30:5]: "And God your Lord will bring you to the land that your ancestors possessed as a heritage and you shall possess." [The verse] equates [the Jews' ultimate] possession with that of their ancestors. Just as when your ancestors took possession of the land as a heritage, they practiced the renewal of all these observances, when you take possession of the land, you should practice the renewal of all these observances.

1 Although the tribe of Levi does not have an ancestral portion within Eretz [Yisrael], the Jewish people were commanded to give them cities to dwell in and [additional] residential property. The cities include the six cities of refuge and 42 additional cities. When cities of refuge will be added in the era of Mashiach, all will be given to the Levites.

2 [The obligation to give] the non-developed land around the cities is explicitly mentioned in the Torah as being [a radius of] three thousand cubits in every direction from the wall of the city outward, for [Numbers 35:4-5] states: "From the wall of the city onward, 1000 cubits on all sides" and continues: "You shall measure from the outside of the city 2000 cubits on the eastern side." The first thousand are left as [additional] residential property and the 2000 that are measured outside this residential property are for fields and vineyards.

3 Every city is given a cemetery outside these boundaries, for they do not bury their dead within their cities, as [implied by ibid.:3]: "The residential area will be for their animals, their property, and all their vital needs." [This land] was given "for their vital needs" and not for burial.

4 In the cities of the Levites, the city itself should not be transformed into an outlying residential area and the outlying residential area should not made part of the city. This outlying residential area should not be converted to fields, nor should the fields be converted into such a residential area, as [Leviticus 25:34] states: "The fields of the residential area of their cities should not be sold."

5 According to the Oral Tradition, it was taught that the phrase "should not be sold" should be interpreted as "should not be changed." Instead, all of the three, field, a residential area, and a city should remain in its original circumstances forever.

Similarly, in the other cities of [Eretz] Yisrael, the outlying residential area should not be converted to fields, nor should the fields be converted into such a residential area. The city itself should not be transformed into an outlying residential area and the outlying residential area should not be made part of the city.

6 A person should not destroy his home to make it into a garden, nor should he plant a garden in his ruin, lest one destroy Eretz Yisrael.

7 The priests and the Levites who sold fields from the fields of their cities or homes from the homes in their walled cities do not redeem their property according to the procedures [explained above]. Instead, they may sell their fields even directly before the Jubilee and redeem them immediately. If they consecrated a field, they may redeem it from the possession of the Temple treasury after the Jubilee. They may redeem houses in a walled city whenever they desire, even after several years, as [Leviticus 25:32] states: "The Levites will have eternal rights of redemption."

8 When an Israelite inherits property from his maternal grandfather who was a Levi, although he is not a Levite, he may redeem [the property] as if he was a Levite. Since these cities or fields belong to the Levities, they may be redeemed forever. For this law is dependent on [the characteristics of] these places, not of the owners.

9 When a Levite inherits the property of his maternal grandfather who is an Israelite, he does not have the redemption rights of a Levite, only those of an Israelite, for the verse "The Levites will have eternal rights of redemption" applies only in the cities of the Levites.

10 The entire tribe of Levi are commanded against receiving an inheritance in the land of Canaan, and they were commanded against receiving a share in the spoil when the cities are conquered, as [Deuteronomy 10:9] states: "The priest and the Levites - the entire tribe of Levi - should not have a portion and an inheritance among Israel." "A portion" [refers to a portion] of the spoil; "an inheritance" refers to [a portion of] the land. And [Numbers 18:20]: "You shall not receive a heritage in their land, nor will you have a portion among them," i.e., in the spoil. If a Levite or a priest takes a portion of the spoil, he is punished by lashes. If he takes an inheritance in Eretz [Yisrael], it should be taken from his possession.

11 It appears to me that the above applies only with regard to the land for which a covenant was established with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, their descendants inherited it and it was divided among them. If, however, other lands will be conquered by a king of Israel, the priests and the Levites have the same rights as the entire Jewish people.

12 Why did the Levites not receive a portion in the inheritance of Eretz Yisrael and in the spoils of war like their brethren? Because they were set aside to serve God and minister unto Him and to instruct people at large in His just paths and righteous judgments, as [Deuteronomy 33:10] states: "They will teach Your judgments to Jacob and Your Torah to Israel." Therefore they were set apart from the ways of the world. They do not wage war like the remainder of the Jewish people, nor do they receive an inheritance, nor do they acquire for themselves through their physical power. Instead, they are God's legion, as [ibid.:11]: states: "God has blessed His legion" and He provides for them, as [Numbers 18:20] states: "I am your portion and your inheritance."

13 Not only the tribe of Levi, but any one of the inhabitants of the world whose spirit generously motivates him and he understands with his wisdom to set himself aside and stand before God to serve Him and minister to Him and to know God, proceeding justly as God made him, removing from his neck the yoke of the many reckonings which people seek, he is sanctified as holy of holies. God will be His portion and heritage forever and will provide what is sufficient for him in this world like He provides for the priests and the Levites. And thus David declared [Psalms 16:5]: "God is the lot of my portion; You are my cup, You support my lot."

Blessed be the Merciful One who provides assistance.

Mishneh Torah, The Chosen Temple

Chapter 1

1 It is a positive commandment to construct a House for God, prepared for sacrifices to be offered within. We [must] celebrate there three times a year, as [Exodus 25:8] states: "And you shall make Me a sanctuary."
The sanctuary constructed by Moses is already described in the Torah. It was only temporary, as [Deuteronomy 12:9] states: "For at present, you have not come unto [the resting place and the inheritance]."

2 After [the Jews] entered The Land [of Israel], they erected the Sanctuary in Gilgal during the fourteen years in which they conquered and divided [the land]. From there, they came to Shiloh, built a house of stone, and spread the curtains of the Sanctuary over it. It did not have a roof. The sanctuary of Shiloh stood for 369 years. When Eli died, it was destroyed. [Afterwards,] they came to Nov and built a sanctuary. When Samuel died, it was destroyed. And they came to Givon and built a sanctuary. From Givon, they came to the eternal structure [in Jerusalem]. The days [the sanctuary stood] in Nov and Givon were 57 years.

3 Once the Temple was built in Jerusalem, it became forbidden to build a sanctuary for God or to offer sacrifices in any other place.
There is no Sanctuary for all generations except in Jerusalem and [specifically,] on Mt. Moriah, as [I Chronicles 22:1] states: "And David declared: 'This is the House of the Lord, God, and this is the altar for the burnt offerings of Israel.' and [Psalms 132:14] states: "This is My resting place forever."

4 The [design of the] structure built by [King] Solomon is described explicitly in [the Book of] Kings. [In contrast, the design of] the Messianic Temple, though mentioned in [the Book of] Ezekiel, is not explicit or explained. Thus, the people [in the time] of Ezra built the Second Temple according to the structure of Solomon, [including] certain aspects which are explicitly stated in Ezekiel.

5 The followings elements are essential when constructing this House:
a) the Sanctuary,
b) the Holy of Holies,
c) preceding the Sanctuary, there should be a place called the Entrance Hall.
The three [together] are called the Temple.
[In addition,] we must make another partition around the Temple, set off from it [slightly], resembling the curtains surrounding the courtyard of the [sanctuary in the] desert. Everything encompassed by this partition is similar to the courtyard of the Tent of Meeting and is called the Courtyard.
The entire area is referred to as the Mikdash.

6 The following utensils are required for the Sanctuary:
a) an altar for the burnt offering and other sacrifices;
b) a ramp to ascend to the altar. It was positioned before the Entrance Hall to the south.

c) a wash basin with a pedestal where the priests would sanctify their hands and feet for the (Temple) service. It was positioned between the Entrance Hall and the altar, to the left when entering the Sanctuary.

d) the altar for the incense offering,

e) the Menorah, and

f) the table [for the showbread].

The [latter] three were placed within the Sanctuary, before the Holy of Holies.

7 The Menorah was in the south, to the left as one entered. The Table was to the right. The Showbread was placed upon it. Both of them were close to the Holy of Holies on the outside. The incense altar was positioned between these two, towards the outside.

Divisions are to be made within the Temple Courtyard to [indicate] the point to which the Israelites may proceed; the point to which the priests, [who were not able to participate in the Temple service,] may proceed.

[Also,] within it, we must build structures for the various necessities of the Sanctuary. These structures were called chambers.

8 When we build the Temple and the courtyard, we must use large stones. If stones cannot be found, we may build with bricks.

We may not split the stones used for the building on the Temple Mount. Rather, we must split and chisel them outside, and [afterwards,] bring them in, as it is said (I Kings 5:31 : "And they brought great stones, costly stones, to lay the foundation of the House with hewn stone."

Furthermore, it is said (ibid. 6:7): "Neither hammer, nor axe, nor any tool of iron was heard in the House while it was being built."

9 We must not build with any wood protruding at all, only stone, bricks, or cement.
[Similarly,] we must not make wooden chambers in the courtyard. Rather, [they were made] of stone or of brick.

10 Costly stones were laid on the floor of the entire courtyard.
Stones which were uprooted [from their fixture] are invalidated, even though they remained in place, since they were impaired. [Thus,] a priest is forbidden to stand upon them during the [Temple] service until they become fixed in the ground [again.]

11 The most preferable way to fulfill the mitzvah is by strengthening the building and raising it [to the utmost degree] within the potential of the community, as [implied by Ezra 9:9]: "to exalt the House of our Lord."
They must make it beautiful and attractive according to their potential. If possible, it is a mitzvah to plate it with gold and to magnify all of its aspects.

12 We must not build the Temple at night, as [Numbers 9:15] states: "on the day in which the Sanctuary was raised up." [Our Sages interpret this phrase as implying:] We may raise it up by day and not by night.
We must be involved with its building from dawn until the appearance of the stars.
Everyone is obligated to build and to assist both personally and financially; [both] men and women, as in the [construction of the] Sanctuary in the desert. [Nevertheless,] children are not to be interrupted from their [Torah] studies.

The construction of the Temple does not supersede the [observance of the] festivals.

13 The Altar should only be made as a structure of stone. Though the Torah states, [Exodus 20:24]: "You shall make Me an altar of earth," [that verse is interpreted to mean that] the altar must be in contact with the earth and not built on an arch or on a cave.

Though [ibid.:22] states: "If you shall make an Altar of stone...," the Oral Tradition explains that the matter is not left to [our] decision, but is an obligation [incumbent upon us].

14 Any stone which is damaged to the extent that a nail will become caught in it [when passing over it], as is the case regarding a slaughtering knife, is disqualified for [use in the] Altar or the ramp, as [Deuteronomy 27:6] states: "You shall build the Altar of the Lord with whole stones."

From where would they bring the stones of the Altar? From virgin earth. They would dig until they reach a point which was obviously never used for tilling or for building, and they would take the stones from there. Alternatively, [they would take them] from the Mediterranean Sea and build with them.

Similarly, the stones of the Temple and the Courtyard were whole.

15 Damaged or split stones from the Temple and the Courtyard are invalid.

They can not be redeemed [and used for mundane purposes]. Rather, they must be entombed.

Every stone which was touched by iron, even though it was not damaged, is disqualified [for use] in building the Altar or the ramp, as it is said (Exodus 20:22 : "By lifting your sword against it, you will have profaned it."

Anyone who builds the altar or the ramp with a stone that has been touched by iron [violates a negative command and] is [given] lashes, as it is said (ibid.): "Do not build them with hewn stone."

One who builds with a damaged stone violates a positive command.

16 [If] a stone was damaged or touched by iron once it had been built into the Altar or the ramp, that stone [alone] is invalidated, but the others are still fit for use.

They coated the altar [with cement] twice a year, [before] Pesach and [before] Sukkot. When they coated it, they used a cloth, rather than an iron lathe, lest it touch a stone and invalidate [it.]

17 We must not make steps for the Altar, as [Exodus 20:23] states: "Do not ascend on My Altar with steps." Rather, we must build an incline on the southern side of the Altar, diminishing [in height] as it declines from the top of the Altar until the earth. It was called the ramp.

Anyone who ascends the Altar with steps [violates a negative command and] is [given] lashes.

Similarly, anyone who demolishes a single stone from the Altar, any part of the Temple building, or [the floor of the Temple Courtyard] between the Entrance Hall and the Altar with a destructive intent is worthy of lashes, as [Deuteronomy 12:3-4] states: "And you shall destroy their altars.... Do not do so to God, your Lord."

18 The Menorah and its utensils, the Table and its utensils, the Incense Altar, and all the sacred utensils may be made only from metal. If they are made from wood, bone, stone, or glass, they are unacceptable.

19 If the nation is poor, it is permissible to make them of tin. If they [later] become wealthy, they should be made of gold.
If the nation possesses the means, they should even make the basins, the spits, and the rakes of the altar of the burnt offering and, [similarly,] the [Temple's] measuring vessels, out of gold. They should even coat the gates of the Courtyard with gold, if it is within their potential.

20 All the [Temple's] utensils must initially be made for sacred purposes. If they were initially made for mundane uses, they may not be used for [the Temple's] sake.
A vessel [intended to be used for the Temple], but which was never used for [the Temple] may be used for mundane purposes. Once it has been used for [the Temple], it may not be used for mundane purposes.
Stones or boards which were originally hewn for use in a synagogue should not be used in the Temple Mount construction.

Chapter 2

1 The Altar is [to be constructed] in a very precise location, which may never be changed, as it is said (II Chronicles 22:1 : "This is the Altar for the burnt offerings of Israel."

Isaac was prepared as a sacrifice on the Temple's [future] site, as it is said (Genesis 22:2 : "Go to the land of Moriah," and in Chronicles (II 3:1), it is said: "Then, Solomon began to build the House of the Lord in Jerusalem, on Mt. Moriah, where [the Lord] appeared to David, his father, in the place that David had prepared, in the threshing floor of Ornan, the Jebusite."

2 It is universally accepted that the place on which David and Solomon built the Altar, the threshing floor of Ornan, is the location where Abraham built the Altar on which he prepared Isaac for sacrifice.
Noah built [an altar] on that location when he left the ark. It was also [the place] of the Altar on which Cain and Abel brought sacrifices. [Similarly,] Adam, the first man, offered a sacrifice there and was created at that very spot, as our Sages said: "Man was created from the place where he [would find] atonement."

3 The dimensions of the Altar must be very precise. Its design has been passed down from one to another [over the course of the generations].
The altar built by the exiles [returning from Babylon] was constructed according to the design of the Altar to be built in the Messianic age. We may not increase or reduce its dimensions.

4 Three prophets returned to [Eretz Yisrael] with the people: one attested to the site of the Altar; the second, to its dimensions; and the third attested to [the Halachah permitting] all sacrifices to be offered on that Altar, even though the Temple itself was not [built] there [yet].

5 The Altar constructed by Moses, and, [similarly,] that built by Solomon, and that erected by the [returning] exiles, and that to be built [in the Messianic age] are all ten cubits high. Though the Torah states [Exodus 27:1]: "Its height will be three cubits," [that refers to] the surface on which the wood for the sacrifices was arranged.

The length and breadth of the Altar built by the [returning] exiles and, similarly, the one to be built in the Messianic Age, is 32 cubits by 32 cubits.

6 The 10 cubits of the Altar's height [were not measured in a consistent manner.] Sometimes the measure of a "cubit" was six handbreadths, while in other cases, the cubit's measure was five handbreadths. In all other cases, the cubits mentioned in the dimensions of the Temple are six handbreadths.

The height of the entire Altar was 58 handbreadths.

7 The [Altar's] dimensions and design were as follows: Five handbreadths up and five handbreadths in [form a step called] the base. Thus, the [remaining area of the Altar] was 30 cubits and two handbreadths by 30 cubits and two handbreadths.

Thirty handbreadths [further] up and 5 handbreadths [further] in is [called] the surrounding ledge.

Thus, its area was 28 cubits and four handbreadths by 28 cubits and four handbreadths.

Go up eighteen handbreadths, place a hollow, rectangular structure in each corner of this surface [thus, creating the Altar's] four horns.

The area encompassed by the horns was one cubit by one cubit on all sides. Similarly, the space for the priests to walk was a cubit on all sides.

[Thus,] the surface on which [the wood for the sacrifices] was arranged was 24 cubits and four handbreadths by 24 cubits and four handbreadths.

8 Each horn was five handbreadths high. The area of each horn was a cubit by a cubit. [All] four horns were hollow.

Thus, the surface on which [the wood for the sacrifices] was arranged was 18 handbreadths above [the surrounding ledge.]

Half of the Altar's height [began] 6 handbreadths below the end of the surrounding ledge.

9 A scarlet band is girded around the middle of the Altar six handbreadths below the surrounding ledge to separate between the blood [to be cast on] the upper [portion of the Altar] and the blood [to be sprinkled on] the lower [portion of the Altar].

Thus, the distance from the earth to the surface on which [the wood for the sacrifices] was arranged was a handbreadth less than nine cubits.

10 The ledge encircled the Altar on all four sides. The base did not. The base encompassed the entire northern and western sides [of the Altar], and consumed one cubit on the South side and one cubit on the east side. [Thus,] the southeast corner [of the Altar] did not have a base.

11 There were two holes in the southwest corner [of the Altar's base], resembling two thin nostrils. They were called Shittin. The blood [which was poured onto the Altar] would run off through them and be mixed together in the drainage canal in that corner. From there, it would flow out to the Kidron River.

12 Below, in the floor of that corner of the Altar, was a place, a cubit by a cubit, [covered by] a block of marble, with a ring affixed to it. They would descend there to the Shittin and clean them.

13 The ramp was constructed to the south of the Altar. Its length was 32 cubits, and its width, sixteen cubits. It consumed 30 cubits on the ground adjacent to the Altar, and extended [further, covering] one cubit of the base and one cubit of the surrounding ledge.

There was a small space between the ramp and the Altar so that the limbs [of the sacrifices] would have to be tossed to reach the Altar.

The height of the ramp was nine cubits minus a sixth of a cubit. It equaled that of [the surface on which the wood for the sacrifices] was arranged.

14 Two small ramps extended from it. One led to the base, and the other to the surrounding ledge. They were set off from the Altar by a hair's breadth.

There was an aperture on the west side of the ramp, a cubit by a cubit. It was called the Rivuvah. There, fowl that had been disqualified for use as sin offerings would be placed until their form decomposed, at which time they could be taken out to be burnt.

15 Two tables were [placed] on the left side of the ramp:
One of marble, on which the limbs [of the sacrifices to be offered on the Altar] were placed, and One of silver, on which sacrificial vessels were placed.

16 When we build the Altar, it must be made as one solid block, resembling a pillar. No empty cavity may be left at all.
We must bring whole stones, both large and small. Then we must create a liquid with lime, pitch, and molten lead, and pour it [over the stones] into a large mold of its dimensions. We must build it in this manner, ascending [level by level].
We must place a block of wood or stone in the southeast corner of the structure, equal to the measure of [the missing portion of the Altar's] base. Similarly, [blocks] must be placed in each horn until the building is completed. Then, the blocks may be removed from the structure, thus leaving the southeast corner without a base, and the horns, hollow.

17 The four horns, the base, and a square shape are absolute requirements for the Altar. Any Altar which lacks [either] a horn, a base, a ramp, or a square shape, is unfit for use, for these four are absolute requirements.
However, the measures of length, width, and height, are not absolute requirements, provided they are not less than a cubit by a cubit [in area,] and three cubits high. [The latter were] the dimensions of the surface [on which the wood for the sacrifices] was arranged for the altar [in the Sanctuary that accompanied the Jews] in the desert.

18 [The following laws apply when] the structure of the Altar is damaged. If a handbreadth of its structure is damaged, it is unfit for use. If less than a handbreadth [is damaged], it is acceptable, provided none of the remaining stones are damaged.

1 The design of the Menorah is explicitly [stated] in the Torah. The [central] shaft of the Menorah had four goblets, two bulbs, and two flowers, [Exodus 25:34] states: "The Menorah shall have four embossed goblets, together with its bulbs and its flowers." A third flower was close to the Menorah's base, as [Numbers 8:4] states: "to its base, to its flower."

2 The [Menorah] had three feet.
Six [diagonal] branches extended from three other bulbs in the [central] shaft of the Menorah, three [branches] on one side and three on the other. Each branch had three goblets, a bulb, and a flower. They were all embossed by beating them [in a manner that their surface] resembled [tiny] almonds.

3 Thus, the total number of goblets was 22; of flowers, nine; of bulbs, eleven. [The absence of] any of these ornaments could render the others invalid. Even if one of the 42 [ornaments] was lacking, all [the others] would not be valid.

4 This applies when the [Menorah] is made of gold. [However, if it is made] of other metals, it should not have goblets, bulbs, and flowers.
Also, when the Menorah is made out of gold, its total [weight] including its lamps shall be one talent. It must be fashioned entirely by hammering out one block [of gold].
[In contrast, should it be made from] other metals, there is no need to be precise about its weight. Also, it may be hollow.

5 [The Menorah] should never be made of fragments of broken vessels, whether it was made of gold or of other metals.

6 [Though the Menorah's] tongs, ash-scoops, and oil containers [shall also be made out of pure gold], they are not included in the talent [mentioned above. This decision was made] because, in connection with the Menorah, [Exodus 25:31] states: "pure gold" and afterwards, [ibid.:38) repeats: "Its wick-tongs and ash-scoops shall be made of pure gold."
The verse does not state: "its lamps shall be of pure gold," for the lamps were permanently fixed in the Menorah, and were included in the talent [of gold from which the Menorah was fashioned].

7 The [absence of one of the] seven branches of the Menorah invalidates the others. The [absence of one of the] seven lamps invalidates the others. This applies whether [the Menorah was made] of gold or of other metals.
All the lamps were [permanently] affixed to the branches.

8 The six lamps affixed in the six branches extending out from the Menorah all faced the central lamp which was above the [central] shaft of the Menorah. The central lamp faced the Holy of Holies and was called the western lamp.

9 The goblets resembled Alexandrine chalices. They had wide mouths and narrow bases. The bulbs were like the apples of Keros which are slightly elongated, [resembling] eggs with both ends rounded. The flowers resemble the flowers of a column. They are shaped like bowls, with the edges bent over outward.

10 The Menorah was eighteen handbreadths high:
Its feet, [base,] and [bottommost] flower were three handbreadths high,
There were two empty handbreadths,
The next handbreadth included a goblet, a bulb, and a flower,
Two empty handbreadths [followed],
A handbreadth with a bulb and two branches extending outward from it, one to one side and one to the other, extending outward and ascending until reaching the full height of the Menorah,
An empty handbreadth,
A handbreadth with a bulb and two branches extending outward from it, one to one side and one to the other, extending outward and ascending until they reached the full height of the Menorah,
An empty handbreadth,
A handbreadth with a bulb and two branches extending outward from it, one to one side and one to the other, extending outward and ascending, until they reached the full height of the Menorah,
and two empty handbreadths

[Thus,] three handbreadths remained, with three goblets, a bulb, and a flower.

11 A stone with three steps was [placed] before the Menorah. The priest stood on it and kindled the lamps. [Also,] he placed the containers of oil, the tongs, and the ash-scoops upon it while kindling it.

12 The Table [for the Showbread] was twelve handbreadths long and six handbreadths wide. Its length was positioned in parallel with the length of the Sanctuary and its width was positioned in parallel with the width of the Sanctuary.

Similarly, the length and width of all the articles in the Sanctuary except for the Ark paralleled the length and width of the Sanctuary. The length of the Ark was placed to the width of the Sanctuary.

The lamps of the Menorah were also positioned in parallel with the width of the Temple, from north to south.

13 The Table had four side frames of gold which were Y-shaped at their heads. They supported the two arrangements of the showbread, two for each arrangement. The Torah calls them "its kesot."

14 There were 28 rods of gold. Each resembled half of a hollow reed. Fourteen [were used] for one arrangement and fourteen for the other arrangement. [The Torah] calls them "its minakiot."

There were two incense bowls. The frankincense was placed inside them on the Table, on the side of the arrangements [of Showbread]. [The Torah] calls them "its kapot."

The molds used to make the Showbread are called "its ke'arot."

15 The 28 rods mentioned above [were used as follows]: The first loaf was placed on the Table itself. Three rods were placed between the first and the second loaves. Similarly, three rods were placed between each [of the following] loaves. Between the fifth and the sixth loaf, there were only two rods, for another loaf is not placed upon the sixth. Thus, each row [of loaves] required fourteen rods.

16 There were two tables in the Entrance Hall, near the entrance to the Temple building. One was made of marble. The Showbread was placed upon it before it was brought in. The other was made of gold. The bread was placed upon it when it was brought out. [The rationale for the use of different substances is that] with regard to holy matters, one must always ascend, and may not descend.

17 The incense altar was one cubit by one cubit square. It was placed in the Sanctuary, exactly [midway] between north and south, between the Table and the Menorah, towards the outside. These three were all placed beyond the first third of the Temple building, in front of the Parochet, which divided the Sanctuary from the Holy of Holies.

18 The washbasin had twelve taps, so that all the priests who were involved in offering the daily sacrifice could sanctify [their hands and feet] at one time.

A mechanism was made so that it could be filled with water at all times. [The mechanism itself] was not sacred, and thus, the water remaining in it did not become invalidated [for future use] because the night passed. [This was necessary] because the washbasin was a sacred vessel and sanctified [its contents]. Anything which is sanctified by a sacred vessel becomes invalidated [for future use] after the night passes.

1 The Ark was placed on a stone in the western portion of the Holy of Holies. The vial of manna and Aharon's staff were placed before it.

When Solomon built the Temple, he was aware that it would ultimately be destroyed. [Therefore,] he constructed a chamber, in which the ark could be entombed below [the Temple building] in deep, maze-like vaults.

King Josiah commanded that [the Ark] be entombed in the chamber built by Solomon, as it is said (II Chronicles 35:3 : "And he said to the Levites who would teach wisdom to all of Israel: 'Place the Holy Ark in the chamber built by Solomon, the son of David, King of Israel. You will no [longer] carry it on your shoulders. Now, serve the Lord, your God.'

When it was entombed, Aharon's staff, the vial of manna, and the oil used for anointing were entombed with it. All these [sacred articles] did not return in the Second Temple.

Similarly, the Urim V'Tumim that existed in the Second Temple did not answer with Ruach HaKodesh (Divine inspiration) and questions were not asked of them, as stated [in Ezra 2:63]: "until a priest will arise with the Urim V'Tumim." [In the Second Temple,] they only made them to fulfill the requirement of eight garments for the High Priest. Thus, the High Priest would not lack one of the required garments.

2 The First Temple had a one-cubit thick wall which separated the Sanctuary and the Holy of Holies. When the Second Temple was constructed, they were unsure whether the width of that wall was included in the measure of the Sanctuary or the Holy of Holies. Therefore, the Holy of Holies was made a full twenty cubits long, and the Sanctuary a full forty cubits long, and one additional cubit was left between the Sanctuary and the Holy of Holies.

They did not build a wall in the Second Temple. Rather, they hung two curtains, one from the side of the Sanctuary and one from the side of the Holy of Holies, with a cubit between them in place of the width of the wall of the First [Temple]. However, in the First Temple, there was only one curtain, as [Exodus 26:33] states: "The curtain will divide for you [between the Sanctuary and the Holy of Holies.]"

3 The Temple building constructed by the exiles [returning from Babylon] was one hundred cubits long, one hundred cubits wide, and one hundred cubits high. The measurement of its height can be described as follows:

They built a solid base six cubits high resembling a foundation for it;

the Sanctuary, 40 cubits high;

an ornate ceiling, one cubit high;

above that, two cubits were left empty to allow dripping [water] to collect [and to be drained off]; this was called the Beit Dilpa;

the roof above the Beit Dilpa was a cubit thick;

the plaster, a cubit high;

an upper storey was built on it; its walls were 40 cubits high;

its roof included an ornate ceiling one cubit high;

a Beit Dilpa, two cubits high;
a roof, one cubit high;
plaster, one cubit high;
a guard rail, three cubits high;
a sheet of iron resembling a blade, a cubit high, was placed all around the guard rail so that birds will not rest upon it. It was called the Kaleh Orev.
The total of the above is 100 cubits.

4 From the west to the east, there were 100 cubits as follows:
There were four walls, one within the other, with three vacant spaces between them:
Between the western wall and the wall inside of it, five cubits,
Between the second and third walls, six cubits,
Between the third and fourth walls, six cubits.
These measurements include the width of the wall and the space between it and the following wall.
The length of the Holy of Holies was 20 cubits.
Between the two curtains separating the Holy of Holies and the Sanctuary, one cubit.
The length of the Sanctuary was 40 cubits.
The width of the eastern wall in which the entrance was positioned was six cubits.
The Entrance Hall was eleven cubits [long].
The wall of the Entrance Hall was five cubits thick.
Thus, the total is 100 cubits.

5 From north to south, there were 100 cubits:
The width of the wall of the Entrance Hall was five cubits.
There were ten cubits from the wall of the Entrance Hall until the wall of the Sanctuary.
The Sanctuary had six walls, one within the other, with five vacant places between them:
Between the outer wall and the second [wall], there were five cubits;
Between the second and the third, three cubits;
Between the third and the fourth, five;
Between the fourth and the fifth, six; and Between the fifth and the sixth, six.
Thus, these [walls and chambers encompassed] a total of forty cubits on both sides [of the Temple building.] The width of the Temple inside was 20 cubits.
The total was 100 cubits.

6 A wicket is a small gateway. The Sanctuary had two wickets on the sides of the great gate in the middle, one on the north and one on the south.
No one ever entered through the southern [wicket]. Explicit [reference] to this [is made] by [in the Book of] Ezekiel [44:2]: "This gate will be closed. It will not be opened."
[Every morning, the priests] would enter [through the wicket] on the north and proceed between the two walls until reaching an opening to the Sanctuary on the left. [From there], they would enter the Temple, proceed to the great gate, and open it.

7 The great gate was ten cubits wide and twenty cubits high. It had four doors: two to the inner [chamber,] and two to the outside. The outer gates opened into the doorway, covering the breadth of the walls. The inner [gates] opened into the Sanctuary, covering the [wall space] behind the doors.

8 The opening to the Entrance Hall was forty cubits high and twenty [cubits] wide. It did not have gates.

Five oak beams were [positioned] above this entrance. The bottom [beam] extended beyond the entrance, one cubit on either side. Each of the five [beams] extended one cubit on either side of the [beam] below it. Thus, the uppermost beam was thirty cubits [long]. There was a tier of stones between each beam.

9 The structure of the Temple was wide in its front and narrow in its rear, like a lion.

Balconies [extended] from the wall of the winding stairwell and surrounded the Temple on all sides. The lowest balcony was five [cubits long.] The pavement above it was six cubits long. The middle projection was six cubits, and the pavement above it seven cubits. The upper balcony was seven cubits, as it is said (I Kings 6:6 : "The lowest balcony...." Thus, three balconies surrounded the Temple from three sides.

Similarly, [there were projections] from bottom to top, around the wall of the Entrance Hall. The [pattern] was as follows:

one vacant cubit,

a projection of three cubits,

one vacant cubit, and then,
a projection of three cubits.
This pattern was followed until the top [of the wall.] Thus, the projections surrounded the walls. Each projection was three cubits wide until the top [of the wall], and between each projection was a [vacant] cubit. The uppermost projection was four cubits wide.

10 All the vacant spaces between the walls are called cells. Thus, five cells surrounded the Sanctuary on the north, five on the south, and three on the west.
There were three levels [of cells,] one level above the other. Thus, there were fifteen cells on the south; five above five, with five above them. Similarly, in the north, there were fifteen cells.
There were eight cells in the west; three above three, with two above them on one level. Thus, there were a total of 38 cells.

11 Each cell had three entrances: one to the cell on the right, another to the cell on the left, and one to the cell above it.
The cell in the northeast corner of the second storey had five entrances: one to the cell on its right, one to the cell above it, one to the winding stairwell, one towards the cell with the wicket, and one to the Temple.

12 The winding stairwell with which one would ascend to the roofs of the cells began its rise from the northeast corner towards the northwest corner [of the Temple]. One ascended on the winding stairwell facing the west and traversed the entire length of [the Temple's] northern side until reaching the west.

When he reached the west, he would turn towards the south. He walked across the entire length of the western side until he reached the south. When he reached the south, he turned to the east. He walked eastward until reaching the entrance to the Temple's upper storey, since the entrance to the upper storey was on the south.

13 At the entrance to the Temple's upper storey, there were two cedar beams upon which one could climb to the roof of the upper storey. Marking posts in the upper storey differentiated between the roof of the Sanctuary and the roof of the Holy of Holies.

Apertures in the upper storey [led to] the Holy of Holies, through which craftsmen would be lowered in boxes, so that they would not satiate their eyes [gazing at] the chamber of the Holy of Holies.

Once a year, from Passover to Passover, they coated the Temple building with cement.

Chapter 5

1 Mount Moriah, the Temple Mount, measured 500 cubits by 500 cubits. It was surrounded by a wall. [The earth beneath it was hollowed out to prevent contracting ritual impurity] due to Tumat Ohel. Arches above arches were built underneath [for support]. It was entirely covered, one colonnade inside another.

2 Five gates led to the [Temple Mount]: One from the west, one from the east, one from the north, and two from the south. Each gate was 10 cubits [wide] and twenty cubits high. [Each gate] had doors.

3 Further within, a latticework partition, 10 handbreadths high, surrounded it on all sides.
The Chayl [a rampart] ten cubits high, was located further inside this partition. It is referred to in the [Book of] Lamentations [2:6]: 'The wall and the rampart mourned.' [This wall] refers to the wall surrounding the Temple Courtyard.

4 Further inward, beyond the chayl, was the Temple Courtyard. The Temple Courtyard was 187 [cubits] long and 135 [cubits] wide.
It had seven gates. Three were on its north side, close to the west, and three were on the south side, close to the west. One [gate] in the east was positioned in the center, [directly] opposite the Holy of Holies.

5 Each gate was ten cubits wide and twenty cubits high. Each one had gold-plated doors, except for the eastern gate which was plated with bronze that resembled gold. This was called the Upper Gate. It was [also called] the gate of Nicanor.

6 The Temple Courtyard was not situated directly in the center of the Temple Mount. Rather, it was set off further from the southern [wall] of the Temple Mount than from [the wall of] any other direction. It was closer to the western [wall] than to [the wall of] any other direction. There was a greater distance between it and the northern [wall] than between it and the western [wall]. [Similarly,] there was a greater distance between it and the eastern [wall] than between it and the northern [wall].

7 The Women's Courtyard was in front of the Temple Courtyard on the East and was 135 cubits long and 135 cubits wide. It had four chambers, each forty cubits [by forty cubits, one] in [each of] its four corners. They did not have roofs, nor will they in the Messianic Age.

8 For what purpose were they used?
The southeastern chamber was [called] the Chamber of the Nazirites. There, they cooked peace offerings and shaved their hair.
The northeastern chamber was [called] the Chamber of the Woodshed. There, the priests who [were disqualified from the Temple service] because of physical deformities checked the wood [brought for the Altar] for worms. If a worm was found, it was unfit for use.
The northwestern chamber was [called] the Chamber of Those Afflicted with Tzara'at.
The southwestern chamber was used to store wine and oil. It was called "The Chamber of the Oils."

9 The Women's Courtyard was surrounded by balconies so that women could look on from above and the men from below without intermingling.

10 Outside the Temple Courtyard, on its northern side, was a large structure between the Courtyard and the chayl. It was built with a dome and [its inner walls] were surrounded with stone protrusions. It was called the Chamber of the Hearth.

It contained two entrances: one to the Temple Courtyard and one to the chayl.

There were four chambers inside it. Two were consecrated and two were not. Marking posts separated the consecrated [chambers] from those which were not consecrated.

For what purpose were they used?

The southwestern [chamber] was the Chamber of the Lambs.

The southeastern [chamber] was the Chamber of the Bakers of the Showbread.

[In] the northeastern [chamber], the Hasmoneans entombed the stones of the Altar which were defiled by the Greek kings.

[In] the northwestern chamber, [a stairwell] descended to the mikveh.

11 One who descended from this chamber to the mikveh proceeded along a winding stairway located under the entire Temple complex. Candles were kindled on both sides [of the passageway, to illuminate the way] until reaching the mikveh.

This [chamber] also contained the hearth and the seat of dignity. This was the dignity associated with it. If one found it locked, he knew it was occupied by another person [and did not enter].

12 The Temple Courtyard was 187 cubits long from east to west. The measurement can be broken down as follows:

Eleven cubits from the western wall of the Courtyard to the wall of the Temple building.

100 cubits, the length of the Temple building.

22 cubits between the Entrance Hall and the Altar.
22 cubits, [the length of] the Altar.
Eleven cubits, the area where the priests could walk. This was called the Priestly courtyard.
Eleven cubits, the area where Israelites could walk. This was called the Courtyard of Israel.

13 The Courtyard was 135 cubits wide, from north to south. The measurement can be broken down as follows:
Eight cubits from the northern wall until the butchering area.
Twelve and one half cubits, the width of the butchering area. There, they would suspend the sacrificed animals [on posts] and remove their hides.

14 At its side was the place for the tables; it was eight cubits wide. It had marble tables on which the severed limbs were placed. The meat was washed [there] before it was cooked. There were eight tables.
The area of the rings [was positioned] next to the location of the tables. It was 24 cubits [wide]. There, they slaughtered the sacrifices.

15 There were eight cubits between the Altar and the area of the rings. The Altar was 32 cubits wide. The ramp was 30 cubits [long]. There were twelve and a half cubits between the ramp and the southern wall.
[The area] from the northern wall of the Temple Courtyard until the wall of the Altar, was sixty and a half [cubits] wide. The length of this area, from the wall of the Entrance Hall until the eastern wall of the Courtyard, was 76 [cubits].

16 The entire rectangle [described above] is called "the northern portion." The sacrifices of the most sacred order of holiness were slaughtered there.

17 The Courtyard of the Israelites had eight chambers: three in the north and three in the south. In the south, were the Chamber of Salt, Parve's Chamber, and the Washing Chamber.

The salt for the sacrifices was stored in the Chamber of the Salt. The hides of the sacrifices were salted in Parve's chamber. Its roof had a mikveh, used by the High Priest on Yom Kippur. The internal organs of the sacrifices were washed in the Washing Chamber. It had a winding rampway leading to the roof of Parve's chamber.

The three [chambers] in the north were the Chamber of Hewn Stone, the Chamber of the Bowl, and the Chamber of Wood.

The Supreme Sanhedrin sat [in judgment] in the Chamber of Hewn Stone. Half was consecrated and half was not. The Sanhedrin sat in the half that was not consecrated.

The Chamber of the Bowl had a well from which water was drawn with a bowl. This [well] supplied water to the entire Temple Courtyard.

The Chamber of Wood was situated behind these two. It was the Chamber of the High Priest and [also] called "the Chamber of Parhedrin."

The roofs of these three chambers were on the same level.

The Courtyard of the Israelites had two other chambers: one to the right of the eastern gate, [called] the Chamber of Pinchas, the clothes-butler; and one to the left. It was [called] the Chamber of the Bakers of the chavitin.

Chapter 6

1 The entire Temple complex was not built on flat ground, but rather on the incline of Mount [Moriah.] Thus, a person who entered from the Eastern Gate of the Temple Mount would proceed to the end of the chayl on one level.

He would ascend from the chayl to the Woman's Courtyard on twelve steps. Each step was half a cubit high and half a cubit wide.

2 One proceeded through the entire Women's Courtyard on one level. From it, one ascended to the Courtyard of the Israelites, which is the beginning of the Temple Courtyard, using fifteen steps. Each step was half a cubit high and half a cubit wide.

3 One would proceed through the entire Israelites' Courtyard on one level and ascend from it to the Priestly Courtyard [using] one step, one cubit high.

Above [that step] was a platform of three steps. Each step was half a cubit high and half a cubit wide. Thus, the Priestly Courtyard was two and a half cubits higher than the Courtyard of the Israelites.

4 One would proceed through the entire Priestly Courtyard, [the area of] the Altar, and the space between the Entrance Hall and the Altar on one level. From there, one would ascend to the Entrance Hall using twelve steps. Each step was half a cubit high and half a cubit wide.

The Entrance Hall and [the remainder of] the Temple building were both on the same level.

5 Thus, the ground [on which] the Temple building [was located] was 22 cubits higher than the ground [on which] the Eastern Gate [was located].
The Eastern Gate was twenty cubits high. Accordingly, a person standing opposite the Eastern Gate could not see the Temple building. For this reason, the wall above this gate was low. Thus, the priest [who offered the Parah Adumah] could see the opening of the Temple when he sprinkled its blood, while standing on the Mount of Olives.

6 There were chambers under the Courtyard of the Israelites opening up to the Women's Courtyard. There, the Levites stored their harps, lyres, cymbals, and other musical instruments.
The Levites stood on the platform which ascends from the Courtyard of the Israelites to the Courtyard of the Priests, when they chanted songs over the sacrifices.

7 [Regarding] the chambers that were built on consecrated ground, but which opened up to an area that was not consecrated: If [their roofs] were on the same level as the earth of the Courtyard, their inner space is not consecrated, but their roofs are consecrated.
If they are not on the same level [as the Courtyard], their roofs are also not consecrated, for the roofs and the upper floors [of the structures in the Temple Courtyard] were not consecrated.
Therefore, sacrifices of the highest degree of sanctity may not be eaten on these roofs, nor may sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity be slaughtered there.

8 [Regarding the chambers] which were built on unconsecrated ground, but were open to consecrated ground: Their inner space was considered consecrated when eating sacrifices of the most holy order. However, the sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity were not slaughtered there. [Similarly,] a person who enters while ritually impure is not required [to bring a sin offering].

The roofs [of these chambers] are considered as unconsecrated ground in all respects.

9 The underground passageways which open to the Temple Courtyard are consecrated. Those that open to the Temple Mount [outside the Courtyard] are not consecrated.

The windows and the width of the wall are considered within [the Courtyard] in regard to partaking of the sacrifices of the most holy order and [entering while] ritually impure.

10 If the Sanhedrin desires to add to [the city limits of] Jerusalem or the Temple Courtyard, they may. They may extend the Temple Courtyard to any place they desire on the Temple Mount. [Similarly, they may] extend the walls of Jerusalem to any place they desire.

11 We may not expand [the limits] of the city [of Jerusalem] or of the Temple Courtyard unless receiving the consent of the king, a prophet, the Urim V'Tumim, and the Sanhedrin of 71 judges, as [Exodus 25:9] states: "According to all that I show you, [the design of the Sanctuary]...so shall you make it." [The latter phrase was interpreted by our sages to mean that the same conditions should apply in] future generations.

[The presence of a king is required] because Moses, our teacher, was a king.

12 How do we extend [the limits of] the city? The Sanhedrin must offer two thanksgiving offerings. [Then, two priests] take the leavened breads from these offerings [and proceed]. The Sanhedrin would follow the thanksgiving offerings. The thanksgiving offerings [would not proceed together, but] one would follow the other.

They would stand on each and every corner and every single stone in Jerusalem, [playing] harps, lyres, and cymbals, and reciting [Psalms 30]: "I exalt you, Lord, for You have uplifted me...."

[They would proceed] until reaching the end of the place [which they desired to] consecrate. There, they would stand and eat one of the two thanksgiving offerings. The other was burnt. A prophet would determine which was eaten and which was burnt.

13 Similarly, [if the Sages desire] to extend the [limits of the] courtyard, they must consecrate it with the remaining portion of the meal offering. Just as the thanksgiving offering, which must be eaten inside Jerusalem consecrates it, so, too, the remaining portion of the meal offering, which may only be eaten inside the Temple Courtyard, consecrates it. It is to be eaten at the end of the space which they desire to consecrate.

14 Any place which was not [consecrated] with all the above [elements] and according to the above procedure is not thoroughly consecrated. Though Ezra offered two thanksgiving offerings [to dedicate the city,] he merely carried out a testimonial act. The Sanctuary was not consecrated through his deeds, for neither a King nor the Urim V'Tumim were present there.

[If so,] how was [the Second Temple] consecrated? With the first consecration performed by Solomon, for he consecrated the Temple Courtyard and Jerusalem, for that time and for eternity.

15 Therefore, we may offer all the sacrifices [on the Temple site], even though the Temple itself is not built. Similarly, sacrifices of the most holy order can be eaten in the entire [area of the] Courtyard, even though it is in ruin and not surrounded by a divider.

We may also eat sacrifices of lesser sanctity and Ma'aser Sheni throughout Jerusalem, even though [it is not surrounded by] a wall, for through its original consecration, it was consecrated for that time and for eternity.

16 Why do I say that the original consecration sanctified the Temple and Jerusalem for eternity, while in regard to the consecration of the remainder of Eretz Yisrael, in the context of the Sabbatical year, tithes, and other similar [agricultural] laws, [the original consecration] did not sanctify it for eternity?

Because the sanctity of the Temple and Jerusalem stems from the Shechinah, and the Shechinah can never be nullified. Therefore, [Leviticus 26:31] states: "I will lay waste to your Sanctuaries." The Sages declared: "Even though they have been devastated, their sanctity remains."

In contrast, the [original] obligation to keep the laws of the Sabbatical year and tithes on the Land stemmed from the fact that it was conquered by the [Jewish people, as a] community. Therefore, when the land was taken from their hands [by the Babylonians,] their [original] conquest was nullified. Thus, according to Torah law, the land was freed from the obligations of the Sabbatical year and of tithes because it was no longer Eretz Yisrael.

When Ezra returned [to Eretz Yisrael] and consecrated it, it was not sanctified by means of conquest, but rather through Chazzakah. Therefore, every place which was repossessed by the [exiles returning from] Babylon and consecrated when Ezra consecrated [the land] the second time, is sacred today.

Thus, as explained in Hilchot Terumah, it is necessary to keep the laws of the Sabbatical years and the tithes [on this land] even though it was taken from [the Jewish people in later years].

1 There is a positive commandment to hold the Temple in awe, as [Leviticus 19:30] states: "And you shall revere my Sanctuary." Nevertheless, it is not the [physical building of] the Temple which must be held in awe, but rather, He who commanded that it be revered.

2 How is reverence for it manifest? A person should not enter the Temple Mount holding a staff, or with sandals on his feet, or wearing only underwear, with dust on his feet, or with money wrapped in his kerchief.

It is superfluous to say that it is forbidden to spit on the entire Temple

Mount. If one must spit, he should let it be absorbed in his clothing.
One should not take a shortcut through the Temple Mount, by entering from one gate, and leaving from the opposite one, in order to shorten the way. Rather, one should walk around from the outside, entering only for the purpose of a mitzvah.

3 All who enter the Temple Mount should [face] the right side, walk around [in that direction], and leave on the left side. [This applies to everyone] except to one to whom [a grievous] event occurred. He would circle around towards the left side. Therefore, [those who met him] would ask him: "Why are you circling towards the left?"
"Because I have become a mourner," [he would answer].
"May the One Who rests in this House comfort you," [they would reply].
[Or he might answer:] "Because I have been ostracized."
[In which case, they would reply:] "May the One Who rests in this House bring about a change in your heart and thus, you will follow the words of your colleagues. Then, they will draw you near."

4 Anyone who has completed his service [in the Temple and desires] to leave, should not [turn around and] leave with his back to the Temple. Rather, he should walk backwards slightly and [then], walk slowly, and [turn] to his side until leaving the Temple Courtyard.
Similarly, the members of the priestly watch, the representatives of the Jewish people, and the Levites [when they descend] from their platform, should leave the Temple in this manner, similar to one who steps backwards after his prayers. All these [are expressions of] reverence for the

5 A person should not act frivolously before the gate of Nicanor, the eastern gate of the Temple Courtyard, for it is positioned opposite the chamber of the Holy of Holies.

Everyone who enters the Temple Courtyard should walk in a dignified manner, in the region where he is permitted to enter. He should conceive of himself as standing before God, as [I Kings 9:3] states: "My eyes and My heart will be there forever."

One should walk with awe, fear, and trembling, as [Psalms 55:15] states: "We would walk in the House of the Lord with fervor."

6 It is forbidden for anyone to sit in the Temple Courtyard, [for] sitting in the Temple Courtyard is prohibited except for the Kings of the House of David, as [II Samuel 7:18] states: "And King David entered and sat before the Lord."

The Sanhedrin met in the half of the Chamber of Hewn Stone which was not consecrated.

7 Even though, the Temple is now in ruin because of our sins, a person must hold its [site] in awe, as one would regard it when it was standing.

[Therefore,] one should only enter a region which he is permitted to enter. He should not sit in [the area of] the Temple Courtyard, nor should he act frivolously when standing before [the place of] the eastern gate, as [implied by Leviticus 19:30]: "You shall observe My Sabbaths and you shall revere My Sanctuary." [Explaining the analogy between the two commands, the Sages comment:] "Just as the observance of the Sabbath [applies] for eternity, so too, the reverence for the Temple must be eternal. Even though it is in ruin, it remains holy."

8 When the Temple is standing, a person may not act frivolously in the area from Mt. Scopus, which is outside of Jerusalem, and inwards [towards the city. This prohibition only applies] when he can see the Temple, and there is no fence between him and the Temple.

9 At all times, a person may not defecate or sleep [with his body positioned] between the east and the west. It is superfluous to state that one should not place a toilet between the east and the west in any place [throughout the world,] for the Temple is in the west. Therefore, one should not defecate to the west nor to the east, for it is opposite the west. Rather, we should always defecate and sleep [with our bodies] to the north and south. Whoever urinates from Mt. Scopus inward to the city should not sit facing the Temple. Rather, [he should position himself] to the north or to the south, or have the Temple at his side.

10 A person may not make a house according to the Temple's design, a porch with the design of the Entrance Hall, a courtyard resembling the Temple Courtyard, a table according to the design of the Table for the Showbread, or a lamp in the design of the Menorah. However, one may make a lamp [resembling the Menorah] with five branches or with eight branches [even] with seven branches if it is not made of metal.

11 The [encampment of the Jewish people] in the desert[was divided into] three areas:

the camp of Israel, which was itself subdivided into four camps;

the camp of the Levites about which [Numbers 1:50] states: "They shall camp around the Sanctuary;"

and the camp of the Shechinah [which included the area] beginning at the entrance to the courtyard of the Tent of Meeting inwards.

Correspondingly, for [future] generations:

[The area] from the entrance to Jerusalem to the Temple Mount is comparable to the camp of Israel.

[The area] from the entrance to the Temple Mount until the entrance to the Temple Courtyard, the gate of Nicanor, is comparable to the camp of the Levites.

[The area] from the entrance to the Temple Courtyard inward, is comparable to the camp of the Shechinah.

The chayl and the Women's Courtyard were regions of increased sanctity which were first instituted in the Temple.

12 The entire land of Eretz Yisrael is more sanctified than all other lands. How is its holiness expressed?

The Omer offering, the two loaves (offered on Shavuot), and the first fruits must be brought from its [territory] and cannot be brought from other lands.

13 Eretz Yisrael has ten gradations of holiness, each higher than the preceding level. The cities which are surrounded by a wall are holier than the rest of the Land.

[How is this holiness expressed?]

Those afflicted by tzara'at are sent out of [these cities].

A corpse cannot be buried inside them until the entire city or its seven chosen representatives agree.

If a corpse has been taken outside a city, it should not be returned, even though all of the inhabitants are willing.

If the inhabitants of a city desire to disinter [a corpse] and remove it from the country, they may. The graves [of any individual] may be disinterred except for those of a king or of a prophet.

[The following rules apply in the case of a grave which was originally placed outside a city. Afterwards, the city grew in size to the point where] it surrounded the grave on all four sides, or merely on two sides which faced each other. If [originally,] there was more than 50 cubits between the grave and the city on either side, [the corpse] cannot be disinterred from the grave until every inhabitant of the city agrees. If a smaller distance [had originally been left,] it may be removed.

14 Jerusalem is holier than other walled cities. We must eat the sacrifices of lesser sanctity and the second tithes within its walls.

[Because of this holiness], the following [restrictions] were enacted in regard to Jerusalem:

No corpse is left within [its boundaries] overnight.

Human bones may not be transported within it.

Homes cannot be rented within it.

A resident alien may not be given the opportunity to settle in the city.

No graves may remain within [its boundaries] except for the graves of the House of David and the grave of Chuldah, the prophetess, which were there from the days of the first prophets.

We should not plant gardens or orchards within the city. It cannot be sowed or plowed [as a field], so that it will not smell foul. No trees may be maintained within it, except for a rose garden which was there from the days of the first prophets.

We may not maintain a garbage dump there, because of creeping animals.

We may not [build] balconies or protrusions extending into the public domain because of Tumat Ohel.

We may not create furnaces within it because of the smoke.

We may not raise chickens within it, because they may cause ritually pure articles [to become impure]. Similarly, a priest may not raise chickens throughout Eretz Yisrael, because they cause ritually pure articles [to become impure].

A house in the city which is sold is never designated as the permanent property of the buyer.

A house in the city is never designated as leprous.

It cannot be judged as an "apostate city."

An Eglah Arufah is never brought from it.

[The latter four statements apply] because [Jerusalem] was never divided among the tribes.

15 The Temple Mount is holier than [the city of Jerusalem]. Zavim, Zavot, Niddot, and women who have given birth may not enter there. [However,] a corpse may be brought into the Temple Mount and one has contracted ritual impurity from a corpse may definitely enter there.

16 The chayl is holier than the Temple Mount. Gentiles and those who contracted impurity through contact with a corpse or engaging in sexual relations with a Niddah may not enter there.

17 The Women's Courtyard is holier than the chayl. A person who has immersed himself in a mikveh, but must wait until the sun sets to become ritually pure, may not enter there.
This prohibition was instituted by the Sages. According to Torah law, such a person may enter the camp of the Levites. [Similarly,] a person who contracted ritual impurity through contact with a corpse and who entered the Women's Courtyard, is not liable for a sin offering.

18 The Courtyard of the Israelites is holier than the Women's Courtyard. A person who has purified himself, but has not brought the required sacrifices, may not enter there. Similarly, an impure person who enters there is liable for karet.

19 The Priestly Courtyard is holier than [the Courtyard of the Israelites]. An Israelite may only enter there when required for:
a) Semichah, c) slaughtering, b) confession, tenufah.

20 [The area] between the Altar and the Entrance Hall is holier than the area mentioned above. Priests who have physical deformities, have grown long hair, or whose [priestly] garments are torn may not enter there.

21 The Temple building is holier than [the area] between the Altar and the Entrance Hall. Only a priest who has sanctified his hands and feet may enter there.

22 The chamber of the Holy of Holies is holier than it. Only the High Priest may enter there, on Yom Kippur, while he is involved in the Temple service.

23 There was a place in the upper storey [of the Temple]which was located directly opposite the Holy of Holies. It was entered only once in seven years, to [inspect it] and find out what is necessary for its repair.

When builders [are required] to enter the Temple building to construct or repair it, or to remove an impure object, it is a mitzvah for the [craftsmen] who enter to be priests who do not possess any disqualifying physical deformities.

If no [capable craftsmen meeting those criteria] can be found, priests with disqualifying deformities should enter.

If none are found, Levites should enter.

If none are found, Israelites should enter.

It is a mitzvah for [those who enter] to be ritually pure. If no [capable craftsman] who are ritually pure can be found, impure [craftsmen] may enter.

[If there is a choice between a craftsman] who is impure and a priest with a disqualifying deformity, the priest with the deformity should enter, for [although the prohibitions against] ritual impurity are put aside in regard to matters which concern the entire people, [they are not relaxed completely].

All those who enter to repair the Temple should be lowered down inside crates [from the upper floor]. If no crates are available or if it is impossible [to make arrangements for them to enter] using crates, they may enter through the [usual] entrances.

Chapter 8

1 There is a positive mitzvah to guard the Temple. [This mitzvah applies] even though there is no fear of enemies or thieves, for the guarding [of the Temple] is an expression of respect for it. A palace with guards is [much more impressive] than a palace without guards.

2 The mitzvah of guarding [the Temple] applies throughout the night.
The priests and Levites shall serve as guards, as [Numbers 18:2] states: "And you and your sons [shall be] before the tent of the testimony," i.e., you shall keep watch over it. Also, [ibid. 18:4] states: "And they [the Levites] shall watch over the Tent of Meeting," and [ibid. 3:38] states: "And Moses, Aharon, and his sons shall camp before the Sanctuary towards the east, and they will be the guardians of the holy watch."

3 Anyone who nullifies this watch transgress a negative commandment, as [Numbers 18:5] states: "And you shall take care to keep the Holy Watch." Any form of the verb, shemar, "take care," implies a warning against transgressing a negative command.
Thus, guarding [the Temple fulfills] a positive command and nullifying its watch [represents the violation of] a negative command.

4 The mitzvah of guarding [the Temple] is [as follows:] The priests stood guard from the inside and the Levites from the outside. 24 groups of guards stood watch over it continuously, each night, in 24 [different] places. The priests stood guard in three places and the Levites, in 21 places.

5 Where did they keep watch? The priests kept watch in the Chamber of Avtinas, the Chamber of the Spark, and the Chamber of the Hearth.
The Chamber of Avtinas and the Chamber of the Spark were two-storey structures built at the sides of the gates of the Temple Courtyard. The young priests kept watch there.
The Chamber of the Hearth was a large, domed structure, surrounded [on the inside] with projections of stone. The elders of the priestly watch of that day slept there with the keys to the Temple Courtyard in their hands.

6 The priests on watch did not sleep in the priestly garments. Instead, they folded them, placed them at their heads, and wore their own clothes.
They slept on the ground. It is customary for all those who stand watch over the courtyards of kings not to sleep on beds.

7 If one of them had a seminal emission [in his sleep], he would proceed down the winding underground stairwell. [There was no prohibition involved], because the underground passageways that opened up to [the portion of] the Temple Mount [outside the Courtyard] were not consecrated.
[There,] he would immerse himself. [He would then] return and sit among his fellow priests until the gates were opened in the morning. [At that time,] he would leave and proceed [to his own affairs].

8 Where would the Levites stand watch?
Inside the five gates to the Temple Mount;
At its four corners [of the wall surrounding the Temple Mount] from the inside;
At the outside of four corners of the Temple Courtyard, for it is forbidden to sit in the Temple Courtyard;
At the outside of five [of the seven] gates to the Temple Courtyard, for the priests stood watch at [the remaining two gates], the Chamber of the Hearth and the Gate of the Spark;
a total of eighteen locations.

9 They also stood watch in the Chamber of the Sacrifices, the Chamber of the Parochet, and behind the Holy of Holies.

10 An overseer was appointed over all the watches of guards. He was called: "The officer of the Temple Mount."
Throughout the night, he checked on all the watches. Torches were lit before him. If a guard did not stand before him and greet him: "Peace be unto you, officer of the Temple Mount," he would assume that he was sleeping, and would strike him with his staff. He was even granted permission to burn [a sleeping guard's] clothing.
Thus, it was commonly said in Jerusalem: "What is the noise in the Temple Courtyard [at night]? It must be the voice of a Levite being beaten and his clothes burned because he slept on his watch."

11 In the morning, shortly before dawn, the overseer of the Sanctuary came and tapped to awaken the priests sleeping in the Chamber of the Hearth. [When] they opened [the gate] for him, he took the keys and opened the small gate leading from the Chamber of the Hearth to the Temple Courtyard.

[Then] he entered the Courtyard, and the priests followed him. They held two torches of fire in their hands and divided into two groups. One proceeded eastward and the other, westward.

They walked on, checking the entire Temple Courtyard. Both groups [met when they] reached the Chamber of the Bakers of the Chavitin. When both groups reached [that point], they declared: "Peace be unto you. Everything is at peace." [Afterwards,] they prompted the bakers of the Chavitin to begin their work.

12 This pattern was followed each night except on Sabbath eve. [Then,] they did not hold torches in their hands. Rather, they checked by the light of the candles, which remained burning from the Sabbath eve.

Mishneh Torah, Vessels of the Sanctuary and Those Who …

1 It is a positive commandment to prepare the anointing oil so that it will be ready [to use] for those articles that require anointing, as [Exodus 30:25] states: "And you shall make it as the oil of sacred anointment."

2 While in the desert, Moses our teacher [had] it prepared. He took the equivalent of 500 shekel of the holy shekalim of musk, cinnamon, and costus and the equivalent of 250 shekel of fragrant cane. The Torah's statement [ibid.:23]: "And fragrant cinnamon, half its measure, 250," implies that [the entire quantity] should be weighed out in two measures, 250 each time. Each one should be ground separately, mixed together and then soaked in pure, sweet water until all of its power was extracted into the water. A hin - which is equivalent to twelve log with each log comprising four revi'iot - of oil was placed above the water. The entire mixture was then cooked over fire until the water boiled off and only the oil remained. It was then set aside for [future] generations.

3 Musk refers to the blood contained with a wild beast from India that is of universal renown which people everywhere use as a fragrance. Cinnamon is a tree that comes from the Indian islands which has a pleasant fragrance and which people use as incense. The term kidah refers to costus. Fragrant cane, this refers to thin canes like red straw that come from the Indian islands and have a pleasant fragrance. They are types of herbs which doctors place in balsam.

4 One who willfully prepares anointing oil in this manner and with these measurements without adding or reducing [the quantity of the herbs] is liable for karet. If he prepares it unknowingly, he must bring a fixed sin-offering, [as ibid.:34] states: "One who makes such a compound shall be cut off from his nation." [The above applies] provided he prepared it for anointment. If, however, he prepared it for practice or to give to other people, he is exempt.

5 One who anoints himself with an olive-sized portion of the oil of anointment willfully is liable for karet. If he [anoints himself] unknowingly, he must bring a fixed sin-offering, [as ibid.] states: "And one who applies it to an unauthorized person, shall be cut off from his nation."

One is liable only for anointing oneself with the oil of anointment made by Moses, as the prooftext states "from it," from [the oil] of which [ibid.: 31] states "This will be oil for sacred anointing for Me." No other [anointing] oil was ever made aside from that made by Moses.

6 [One is liable] whether he anoints himself or others, as [the prooftext] states: "And one who applies it to an unauthorized person." One who spreads it on utensils, an animal, a gentile - who is [halachicly equivalent] to an animal - or who spreads it on a corpse, is exempt, as [implied by ibid.:32]: "It should not be spread on the flesh of a man."

7 For all time, we do not [use this oil] except to anoint the High Priest, the priest who leads the nation in war, and kings from the House of David. Even a High Priest who is the son of a High Priest should be anointed, as [Leviticus 6:15] states: "The priest from his sons anointed in place of him...."

8 Since there was no anointing oil [during] the Second Temple [era], the High Priest was installed in his office by putting on the garments of the High Priest alone.

9 How was the High Priest anointed? The oil should be poured on his head and applied between his eyes in the form of the Greek letter chi, like this C as [Leviticus 8:12] states: "And he poured the anointing oil on Aaron's head and anointed him to sanctify him." The kings of the Davidic dynasty are anointed [with the oil] spread as a crown on their foreheads. They should not be anointed on other places [on their bodies], nor should one use an excessive amount of oil.

10 A person who places the anointing oil on a king or High Priest who had been anointed previously is exempt, for [the prooftext] speaks of "one who applies it to an unauthorized person." And these individuals are not unauthorized with regard to this oil.

If, however, one - even a king or a High Priest - spreads it [on his flesh], he is liable, for [the prooftext] states: "It should not be spread on the flesh of a man." This implies all men. When a High Priest takes the anointment oil from his head and spreads it on his belly, he is liable for karet, provided he spreads an olive-sized portion.

11 A king should only be anointed next to a spring. We do not anoint the king who is the son of a king, for the kingship is a hereditary position for the king for all time, as [Deuteronomy 17:20] states: "[Thus] he and his descendants [will prolong their reign] in the midst of Israel." If there is a controversy, he should be anointed to resolve the controversy and to notify to all that he alone is the king, as Solomon was anointed because of the controversy [stirred up by] Adoniyahu. Yoash was anointed because of Atal'ya, and Yehoachaz was anointed because of his brother Yehoyakim. When Elisha had Yehu anointed, he did not have him anointed with the anointment oil, but with balsam oil. This is an accepted tradition among the sages.

12 All of the vessels of the Sanctuary that were fashioned [at the command] of Moses were sanctified only by being anointed with the anointing oil, as [Numbers 7:1] states: "And he anointed them and sanctified them." This practice was not followed in the coming generations. Instead, all of the utensils became sanctified when they were used for their purpose in the Temple, as [implied by Numbers 4:12] "...that they will serve with them in the Sanctuary," i.e., through service, they are sanctified.

13 The spoons and the bowls used to contain the meal offerings and similarly, the basins used to receive the blood, and the other vessels used [in the Sanctuary] were all made of silver and gold. It was permitted to make them from other metals, as we explained. They receive their holiness by being used for the [desired] tasks. If they were broken, they should be smelted down and another utensil made from them, for their holiness never departs from them.

14 If the sacred utensils became perforated or cracked, the cracks are not plugged close. Instead, the utensils should be smelted down and new utensils made.

15 When a knife has become dislodged from its shaft or blemished, it is not returned to its shaft, nor is it sharpened. Instead, it should be entombed on the side of the Temple, between the Sanctuary and the Entrance Hall on the south and new ones should be made. For [conduct bespeaking] poverty is not [appropriate] in a place where wealth [is in place].

16 There were two containers for dry measure in the Temple: an isaron and a half an isaron. The isaron was for the meal offering and the half isaron to separate the meal offering brought by the High Priest every day.

17 There were seven containers of liquid measure: a hin, a half a hin, a third of a hin, a fourth of a hin, a log, a half a log, and a fourth of a log.
Why were there measures of a half a hin, a third of a hin, a fourth of a hin? To measure out the wine libations for the sacrifices. A log was necessary to measure the oil for the meal offerings. A half a log was necessary to measure out the oil for every lamp of the lamps of the Menorah. And a fourth [of a log] to divide the oil for [the High Priest's] chavitan offering.

18 There is nothing that is measured with a hin. Why [then] was it there? [It remained, because] it had been in the Sanctuary from the time of Moses who used it to measure the oil for the anointing oil. With the measure of a half a log that was in the Temple, water was measured for the Sotah water and oil for the thanksgiving offerings. With the measure of a fourth [of a log], oil was measured for the bread brought by a nazirite and water for the purification of a metzora. It is not that through these deeds the measures became sanctified, but rather because of the tasks [performed] in the Sanctuary that were mentioned [in the preceding halachah].

19 All of these measures are consecrated and are considered as sacred utensils. [There is, however a difference between them.] The liquid measures were anointed on both the inside and the outside, while the dry measures were anointed only on the inside. Therefore the overflow of the liquid measures was consecrated, and the overflow of the dry measures was not consecrated.

1 The incense offering was prepared every year. Preparing it fulfills a positive commandment, as [Exodus 30:34] states: "And you take spices...." Four of the spices are explicitly mentioned in the Torah. They are balsam, onycha, storax, and frankincense. The others were communicated as a halachah communicated to Moses at Sinai.

2 [The requirement for] eleven spices was communicated to Moses at Sinai. They would prepare them with an exact weight and add to them - without weighing them: Salt of Sodom, Jordanian amber, and an herb that would produce smoke. Only select people would know its identity and that knowledge was conveyed as halachah from person to person.

3 This is the weight of the eleven spices: balsam, onycha, storax, frankincense, 70 maneh from each one. A maneh is 100 dinarim,musk, cassia, spikenard, and saffron, 16 maneh, costus, 12 maneh, cinnamon, 9 maneh, Ceylonese cinnamon 3 maneh. The weight of the entire mixture was 368 maneh.

The entire mixture was ground very thin. A fourth of a kab of the salt of Sodom and a small amount of Jordanian amber and the smoke raising herb were added. A maneh of it was burned every day on the golden altar. There were 365 maneh, corresponding to the 365 days of the year. The three remaining maneh were ground again on the day before Yom Kippur very finely for [the High Priest] to take a handful to offer on Yom Kippur. The remainder is the remainder of the incense that was mentioned in [Hilchot] Shekalim.

4 Nataf mentioned by the Torah are the balsam trees that produce balsam oil. Onycha is tziporen which people include in incense. Storax is like black honey and it produces a disagreeable odor. It comes from the sap of the trees grown in Greece. These are the names of the spices in Arabic: od balasan, atzpar tiv, miyah, lican, muski, ketziyah, sanbali alnaturin, saffron, kosht, od, kesser silica, and anber.

5 How is the incense offering prepared? Nine kabbin of vetch lye are brought and the onycha is rubbed with it. Afterwards, the onycha is soaked in 21 kabbin of caper wine or a very strong, aged white wine. Afterwards each of the spices is ground very finely alone. While he is grinding, he should say: "Grind thoroughly. Grind thoroughly," for the entire time that he is grinding. Then he mixes them all together.

6 All of the acts involved in its preparation are performed in the Sanctuary, in the Temple Courtyard, [using ingredients that] have been consecrated. When one prepares the incense offering from unconsecrated ingredients or in an unconsecrated utensil, it is unacceptable.

7 Twice a year, the incense would be returned to the grinder. In the summer, it would be spread out so that it would not become musty. In the rainy season, it is stored away lest its fragrance be weakened.

8 If one included any honey in it, it is disqualified. If one omits any of its spices, he is liable for death, for it is considered as foreign incense. If one prepared it little by little in appropriate proportions, it is acceptable. Even if one prepared half [a maneh] in the morning and half in the afternoon, [it is acceptable].

9 When a person prepares incense from these eleven spices according to these proportions to smell its fragrance, he is liable for karet for its preparationif he prepared it willfully, even if he did not actually smell its fragrance. If he did so inadvertently, he is liable for a fixed sin offering. Even if he did not prepare the entire quantity [of 368 maneh], but merely a half or a third, since he prepared it according to the above proportions, he is liable for karet, as [Exodus 30:38] states: "You shall not make

10 If he prepared it to learn or with the intent of giving it to the community, he is not liable. If he smelled its fragrance, but did not prepare it, he is not liable for karet. Instead, he is bound by the laws applying to all of those who derive benefit from consecrated property. The Torah obligated a person for karet only when he prepared it according to its formula for the sake of smelling it.

11 The incense offering is offered on the Golden Altar in the Temple each day. No other entity is offered on it. If one offered any incense other than this or offered this incense, but it was donated by an individual or a group, or one offered a sacrifice on it, or poured a libation on it, one is liable for lashes, as [ibid.:9] states: "You shall not offer upon it foreign incense, a burnt offering, or a meal offering."

12 When the ark is transported from place to place, it should not be transported on an animal or on a wagon. Instead, it is a mitzvah for it to be carried on one's shoulders. Since David forgot and had it transported on a wagon, there was an outbreak [of Divine anger] at Uzzah. Instead, it is a mitzvah to carry it on one's shoulders, as [Numbers 7:9] states: "For the holy task is their obligation. They shall carry it on their shoulders."

13 When [the Levites] carry the ark on their shoulders, they should carry it face to face, with their backs pointed outward and their faces inward. They must be careful that the staves of the ark are not removed from the rings. Anyone who removes one of the staves from the rings is liable for lashes, as [Exodus 25:15] states: "The staves shall be in the rings of the ark. They shall not be removed from it."

1 The descendants of Levi were singled out for service in the Sanctuary, as [Deuteronomy 10:8] states: "At that time, God separated the tribe of Levi." It is a positive commandment for the Levites to be free and prepared for the service of the Sanctuary, whether they desire to do so or not, as [Numbers 18:23] states: "And the Levite shall perform the service of the tent of meeting." When a Levite accepts all the mitzvot of the Levites with the exception of one matter, he is not accepted unless he accepts them all.

2 Their service was to guard the Temple. Among [the Levities], there were gate-keepers who would open the gates of the Temple and close its doors. And there were singers who would accompany the sacrifices with song each day. [The latter concept is derived from the exegesis of Deuteronomy 18:7]: "And he shall serve in the name of God, his Lord, as all of his Levite brethren." Which service involves [invoking] the name of God? I would say: song.

When were songs recited? At the time that the wine libations [accompanying] all the communal burnt offerings, and the peace offerings brought on Shavuous, were brought. Song was not recited over the freewill burnt offerings that the community would bring for "the dessert of the altar," nor on the wine libations that are brought independently.

3 A Levite who is in an acute state of mourning is permitted to perform his service and sing. There should never be less than twelve Levites standing on the duchan each day to recite the songs over the sacrifices and their number could be increased without end. The songs were sung vocally without musical instruments, for the fundamental dimension of the song is vocalization. Others would stand on [the duchan] and play melodies with musical instruments: some of them were Levites and some of them were Israelites of distinguished lineage, fit to marry into the priesthood. For only a person of distinguished lineage was allowed to ascend to the duchan. The people who play musical instruments are not included in the number of the twelve singers [required].

4 On what instruments would they play? On lyres, flutes, harps, trumpets, and a cymbal. There should not be less than two lyres, nor more than six. There should not be less than two flutes, nor more than twelve. There should not be less than two trumpets, nor more than one hundred and twenty. There should not be less than nine harps and there is no upper limit. There should only be one cymbal.

5 On all the days of the festivals and on the Rashei Chadashim, the priests would sound the trumpets while the sacrifice was being offered and the Levites would recite songs, as [Numbers 10:10] states: "On the day of your celebration, on your festivals, and at the beginning of your months, you shall sound the trumpets."

Each trumpet was made from a block of silver. If it was made from scraps of silver, it is acceptable. If it is made from other metals, it is unacceptable.

The flutes on which they would play would have cane reeds, because they produce a sweet sound. The melody would always be played by a single flute, because it produces a pleasant sound.

6 Twelve days a year, the flute would be sounded before the altar: During the slaughter of the first Paschal sacrifice, and during the second Paschal sacrifice, on the first day of Pesach, on the first day of Shavuot, and on the eight days of Sukkot. [The sounding of] the flute on these occasions supersedes the Sabbath [prohibitions], because it is associated with a sacrifice and the sounding of a flute associated with a sacrifice is an act of Temple service and supersedes the Sabbath prohibitions.

7 A Levite may not enter the Temple Courtyard to perform his service until he studied for five years beforehand. [This concept is derived as follows. Numbers 8:24] states: "This is [the edict] with regard to the Levites: From the age of 25..." and [ibid. 4:30] states: "From the age of 30...." How can [this apparent contradiction be resolved]? They study for five years and they do not enter the service until they fully mature and attain manhood [as ibid.:19] states: "Each man to his service."

8 The Torah's statement [Numbers 8:25]: "At the age of 50, he will turn back from the ranks of the workers [of the Sanctuary]," applied only in the era when the Sanctuary was carried from place to place. It is not an [ongoing] mitzvah for future generations. For future generations, a Levite is not disqualified because of age or because of physical blemishes, only due to a change in voice, i.e., if his voice spoils because of his advanced age, he is disqualified from serving in the Temple. It appears to me that he is disqualified only from serving as a singer, but he could become one of the doorkeepers.

9 Samuel the Seer and King David divided the Levites into 24 watches. Each week, a different watch would serve [in the Temple]. The head of the watch would divide all the men of the watch into different "clans." On each day of the week, designated men would serve. The heads of the clans would assign the workers on the day that they were designated to work, [allotting each] one appropriate tasks.

All of the Levites are warned [not to participate in] the service of the altar, as [ibid. 18:3] states: "But to the holy utensils and to the altar they should not draw close so they do not die." [This prohibition implies] that they should not draw close to the service [of the Sanctuary], but they may touch [the sacred utensils].

10 Just as the Levites were warned not to perform the service of the priests, so too, the priests are warned not to perform the work of the Levites, as [the above verse] states: "Also they, also you [shall not die]." Similarly, the Levites themselves were warned that each one should not perform the task incumbent on a colleague. Thus a singer should not assist a door-keeper, nor a door-keeper a singer, as [ibid. 4:49] states: "Every man, according to his service and his burden."

11 When Levites perform the service of the priests or one Levi assisted in a task that is not his, they are liable for death at the hand of heaven, for [ibid. 18:3] states: "shall not die." When, by contrast, a priest performs the service of a Levite, he is not liable for death. Instead, he violates merely a negative commandment.

Chapter 4

1 The priests were set aside from the Levites as a whole [to perform] the sacrificial service, as [I Chronicles 23:13] states: "And Aaron was set apart to sanctify him as holy of holies." It is a positive commandment to distinguish the priests, make them holy, and prepare them for the sacrifices, as [Leviticus 21:8] states: "And you shall sanctify him because he offers the food of your God."

2 It is necessary for every Jewish person to show them much honor and to give them priority for every matter of holiness, to begin [reading] the Torah first, to recite the blessings first, and to take a desirable portion first.

3 Moses divided the priests into eight watches: four from Elazar and four from Itamar. This continued until [the days of] Samuel the prophet. At that time, he and King David divided them into 24 watches. For each watch, there was one who served as the leader. A watch would ascend to Jerusalem to serve for the entire week. They would switch on the Sabbath day. The previous watch would depart and the one which follows would enter. [This cycle would continue] until its completion and then they would start again.

4 It is a positive commandment for all the watches to share equal status during the pilgrimage festivals. Any one of the priests who comes during the pilgrimage festivals and desires to serve [in the Temple] may serve and receive a portion [of the sacrifices]. We do not tell him: "Go and [wait] until your watch [receives its turn]," as [Deuteronomy 18:6] states: "When the Levite will come from one of your cities... [to the place that God will choose, he shall serve..."].

5 In which context does the above apply? With regard to the sacrifices of the festivals, the division of the showbread, and the two loaves [offered on] Shavuot. Vowed offerings, freewill offerings, and the daily offerings are offered only by the watch that serves at that time. [This applies] even during the pilgrimage festivals, as [ibid.:8] states: "Portion for portion shall they eat, except for what was transacted by the ancestors." The implication is that they will partake "portion for portion" of the communal offerings, but not of the other sacrifices. For these were already divided by their ancestors and established for each watch in its week.

6 Similarly, the service involved with the showbread is performed by the watch whose turn is established. The service involved with the two breads [of Shavuos] is performed by all the watches.

How do we know that [the verse cited above] is speaking only about the festivals? Because it states: "from one of your cities among all Israel." [One can infer] that it is speaking about a time when the entire Jewish people enter through one gate.

How do we know that it is speaking about priests? For it states: "Portion for portion shall they eat" and there are no presents to be eaten allotted in the Temple except to the priests.

7 Similarly, when a priest has a sacrifice [of his own], he may come to the Temple and offer it on any day that he desires, as [that verse] states: "He shall come at any [impulse] of his heart's desires and serve." He may even offer his sin offering and guilt offering and bring about atonement for himself. [In such an instance,] the right to the hide and to partake of the sacrifice belongs to him. If he desires he may give his sacrifice to any priest he desires to sacrifice it. [In such an instance,] the right to the hide and to partake of the sacrifice belongs to the priest to whom he gave it.

8 If the priest who brings the sacrifice is physically blemished, he should give his sacrifice to the [priests of] the watch serving that week and the hide belongs to them. If he was ill or sick to the extent that he could serve only with difficulty, he may give the sacrifice to any priest he desires, the hide and the service belong to the [priests of] the watch serving that week. If he cannot serve at all, the sacrifice belongs to the [priests of] the watch serving that week in its entirety.

9 If [all the priests of the watch] are impure and a communal sacrifice is involved and all of the priests were impure, the sacrifice may be given to the priests of that watch who were ritually pure, but have physical blemishes. The hide and the service belong to [the priests of] the watch serving that week [even though they are] impure.

10 If the sacrifice belonged to the High Priest and he was in a state of acute mourning, he may give it to any priest he desires. The hide and the service belong to [the priests of] the watch serving that week. [The rationale is that] since a High Priest is fit to perform service in a state of acute mourning, as will be explained, he may appoint an agent for his sacrifice.

11 The head of every watch divides his watch into clans so that [the priests] in each clan will serve on one of the days of the week, one on one day, another on the next, and another on the next. Each of the clans had a head who was appointed over it.

12 A High Priest is appointed [to serve as] the head of all of the priests. He is anointed with the anointing oil and clothed in the garments of the High Priest, as [Leviticus 21:10] states: "And the priest who was elevated over his brethren, over whose head was poured [the anointment oil]...." If there is no anointment oil, he is initiated into office merely by [wearing] the garments of the High Priest, as [the above verse] states: "...over whose head was poured [the anointment oil] and who was initiated to wear the garments." [Implied is that] just as he is initiated with the anointment oil, so too, he is initiated with the garments [of the High Priesthood].

13 How is he initiated with the garments? He puts on the eight garments [of the High Priest] and [later] removes them and does so again on the morrow for seven days, as [Exodus 29:30] states: "The priest from his sons who serves in his stead shall put them on for seven days." Just as he puts on the clothes for seven consecutive days, so too, he is anointed with the oil for seven consecutive days. If he performed service before he was initiated by wearing the clothes for all seven days or before he was anointed for all seven days, his service is acceptable. Since he was initiated or anointed once, he is a High Priest with regard to all matters.

14 There is no difference in [the laws pertaining to] a High Priest who was anointed with the anointment oil and [those applying to] one who was initiated by wearing the garments of the High Priest except [the obligation] for the High Priest to bring a bull [as a sacrifice] if he inadvertently violated one of the mitzvot for which a sin offering is required, as [Leviticus 4:3] states: "If the anointed priest will sin...." With regard to other matters, they are identical.

15 A High Priest should be appointed only by the court of 71 judges. He should be anointed only during the day, as [ibid. 6:13] states: "On the day of his anointment...." Similarly, if he was initiated merely by wearing the priestly garments, the initiation should only take place during the day. Two High Priests should not be initiated together.

16 We also appoint a priest who will serve the High Priest like a viceroy, he is called the segen and he is also called "the appointed one." He should stand at the right hand of the High Priest at all times. This honor is given to him. All of the other priests are under his authority.

17 In addition, katikolin are appointed to serve the segen as the segen serves the High Priest. There should be no less than two of them. No less than seven amerkalin should be appointed, The keys to the Temple Courtyard are in their hands. If one desires to open [the courtyard], he cannot until all the amerkalin gather and open it.

18 Treasurers are appointed under the amerkalin. There should be no less than three. They collect the consecrated articles, redeem those which should be redeemed, and use the proceeds for purposes that require these expenses.

19 A High Priest who was anointed receives precedence over one who was installed by wearing the garments [of the High Priesthood]. One installed by wearing the garments who is prepared to serve receives precedence over an anointed [High Priest] disqualified because of a seminal emission. One disqualified because of a seminal emission receives precedence over one disqualified because of a physical blemish. One disqualified because of a physical blemish receives precedence over the priest anointed to lead the nation in war. The priest anointed to lead the nation in war receives precedence over the segen. The segen receives precedence over a katikol, a katikol over an amerkal, an amerkal over a treasurer, a treasurer over a head of a watch, a head of a watch over a head of a clan, and a head of a clan over an ordinary priest. Thus there are eight rungs in the priesthood, one above the other.

20 When the king, the High Priest, or any other official dies, his son or anyone fit to inherit him is appointed in his stead. Those who are higher in the order of inheritance receive precedence with regard to receiving the position of the deceased, provided he is equivalent [to the deceased] in wisdom, or in the fear of God, even if he is not comparable in wisdom. For [Deuteronomy 17:20] states with regard to a king: "He and his descendants in the midst of Israel." This teaches that the kingship is inherited. This applies with regard to any office amidst the Jewish people. If one acquires it, he acquires it for himself and for his descendants.

21 The position of being the priest anointed to lead the nation in war is not transferred to one's son. Instead, the son is like all other priests. If he is anointed as the leader in war, he is anointed. If he is not anointed, he is not anointed. When the priest who was anointed to lead the nation in war serves in the Temple, he serves wearing four garments like the other priests.

A person should be promoted to a higher position than the one he holds and should not be demoted to a lower position, for one must ascend with regard to holy matters and not descend. A person should never be removed from a position of authority within the Jewish people unless he acted in an unsuitable manner.

22 When a High Priest violates a transgression that is punishable by lashes, he should be given lashes in a court of three judges as is the law regarding others liable for lashes. He then returns to his position of eminence.

1 The High Priest must surpass all of his priestly brethren in beauty, power, wealth, wisdom, and appearance. If he does not have wealth of his own, all of his priestly brethren should give him according to their financial capacity until he is wealthier than all of them.

2 None of the above is an absolute requirement; instead, all of this is merely

[the optimum way of fulfilling] the mitzvah. If he was, nonetheless, initiated, his initiation is valid.

3 The High Priest must conduct himself with dignity. He should not act frivolously with the people at large. They should not see him naked, nor in the bathhouse, nor in the toilet, nor while he is having his hair cut, as [Leviticus 21:6] states: "the priest greater than his brethren." This teaches that he is regarded with great honor. [Nevertheless,] if he desires that others bathe with him, he may [allow them to do so].

4 He should not enter a celebration or a public feast even if they are associated with a mitzvah. If he desires, however, he may go to a house of mourning. If he goes, he does not go walking together with the other priests. Instead, the priests surround him and display honor to him and the segen arranges the contact between him and the people. The segen and an anointed priest who was removed from his position stand at his right and the head of the clan [serving in the Temple], the mourners, and all others are to his left. He tells the mourners: "Be comforted" and they honor him according to their capacity.

5 If one [of the relatives for whom he must mourn] dies, he does not go out to the funeral procession, nor does he depart from the entrance of his home or the Temple. All of the nation come to his home to comfort him. He stands for the line of comforters with the segen at his right and the head of the clan to his left. [The people tell him]: "We are atonement for you" and he tells them: "May you be blessed from heaven."

6 When the meal of comfort is served to him, all of the people sit on the ground and he sits on a low bench. He does not rend his garments over his dead, as do the other priests, as [Leviticus 21:10] states: "He shall not rend his garments." If he rends them, he is liable for lashes. He may, however, tear them from below towards his feet.

He may never let his hair grow long, as [ibid.] states: "He shall not allow [the hair of] his head to grow long." [This applies] even at times when he does not enter the Sanctuary. Instead, he should have his hair cut every Friday. He should not have his hair cut with a razor, rather with scissors. [He should have] the top of one hair [cut] when it reaches the base of the hair above it so that it appears that they grew as one, as [indicated by Ezekiel 44:20]: "They shall not shave their heads, nor should they let their hair grow long. [Instead,] they shall keep their heads trimmed."

7 There was a chamber prepared for him in the Sanctuary which was called: "The Chamber of the High Priest." The glory and the honor of [the High Priest] would be to remain in the Sanctuary the entire day and to go to his private home only at night or for an hour or two during the day. His home should be in Jerusalem and he should never depart from there.

8 A High Priest may act as a judge and he is judged. Testimony may be delivered against him. Capital cases against him are judged in the High Court alone, as [implied by Exodus 18:22]: "Any great matter (hadavar hagadol) will be brought to you."

9 If he knows testimony, he is not obligated to deliver it, even in the High Court. For going to testify does not enhance his honor. If it was testimony involving a King of the Jewish people, he should go to the High Court and testify concerning him.

10 We already explained in the fifth book that [the High Priest] is forbidden [to marry] a widow and commanded to marry a virgin. He may not have two wives. If he marries two, he may not carry out the service on the fast [of Yom Kippur] until he divorces one.
He may perform chalitzah and [either] chalitzah or yibbum are performed with his wife. If he divorces a women, she is permitted to marry another person.

11 When the High Priest enters the Sanctuary to prostrate himself, three support him: one on his right side, one on his left side, and one [holding] the jewels on the hind side of the ephod. He enters the Sanctuary and prostrates himself. When the segen hears the sound of the feet of the High Priest as he departs, he lifts up the curtain. After he departs, his priestly brethren enter, prostrate themselves, and depart.

12 On any day he desires, he may offer the incense offering. He receives the first portion of any sacrifice offered in the Temple. What is implied? If he desires, he may say: "This sin offering is mine" or "This guilt offering is mine." He does not seek to be chosen for service by lot. Instead, whenever he desires to offer a sacrifice, he may offer [any sacrifice] he desires. With regard to consecrated [produce] from Eretz Yisrael, he is like all other priests.

13 When the High Priest desired to offer a sacrifice, he would ascend the ramp with the segen on his right. When he reached the midpoint of the ramp, the segen would hold him by the right hand and help him up. The priest who would carry the head of the burnt offering would extend the limbs [he is carrying] to [the High Priest] and [the High Priest] would lean upon them and then toss them to the fire.

14 Similarly, all of the other limbs would be extended to him. All of those carrying the limbs would give the limbs they were carrying to the first priest and he would give them to the High Priest. He would lean upon them and toss them to the fire. If he desired to merely lean upon them and have another priest toss them to the fire, he may.

There is no concept of leaning on individual limbs except when the High Priest [offers a sacrifice]. [This is an expression of] honor to him. All of the [other] leanings, by contrast, are performed on living animals.

15 As soon as a priest matures and attains majority, he is fit to serve in the Temple. Nevertheless, his priestly brethren would not allow him to serve in the Temple until he reached the age of 20. He should not enter the Temple Courtyard to perform service for the first time except during a time when the Levites are chanting songs.

16 A priest does not perform Temple service - nor does a High Priest perform Temple service - until he brings [a meal offering of] a tenth of an ephah from his own possessions and offer it himself, as [Leviticus 6:13] states: "This is the sacrifice of Aaron and his descendants which they will offer to God on the day that he will be anointed."

If one performs any of the Temple service before he brings [this meal offering] or if a High Priest serves as a High Priest before he brings [this meal offering], his service is acceptable.

17 If a priest who had never performed Temple service before is appointed as the High Priest, he should bring [a meal offering of] a tenth of an ephah and offer it himself as is the training for every ordinary priest at the outset. Afterwards, he offers a second [such meal offering] as the training of a High Priest. And then he offers a third [such meal offering] which is the chavitin offering of the High Priest which he offers every day, as will be explained. The manner in which all three are offered is identical.

1 It is impossible for the sacrifice of a person to be offered without him standing in attendance. [Now,] the communal offerings are the sacrifices of the entire Jewish people, but it is impossible for the entire Jewish people to stand in the Temple Courtyard at the time they are being offered. Therefore, the prophets of the first era ordained that there be selective upright and sin-fearing Jews who should serve as the agents of the entire Jewish people to stand [and observe the offering of] the sacrifices. They were called "the men of the maamad."

They divided them into 24 ma'amadot, equaling the number of watches of the priests and Levites. Over each of the watches was one who was appointed as [the supervisor] of them all. He was called the head of the ma'amad.

2 Each week, the members of the ma'amad of that week would gather together. Those [living] in Jerusalem or close to it would enter the Temple with the priestly and Levitical watch of that week. When [the week of] their ma'amad arrived, those members of the ma'amad who [lived] in distant places would gather in the synagogues of their locale.

3 What would those who gather together - both in Jerusalem and in the synagogues - do? They would fast on the Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday of their week. They would not fast on Friday out of respect for the Sabbath and not on Sunday, so they would not make a transition from the pleasure of the Sabbath to a fast.

4 On every day of the week that was their ma'amad, they would recite four prayer services: the morning service, the afternoon service, the neilah service, and another prayer service between the morning service and the afternoon service which was additional [and unique] for them. In the ma'amad, the priests bless the people three times, in the morning service, in this additional service, and in the neilah service.

They would have three men read from the Torah twice a day: in the morning service and in the second service that they would add. In the afternoon service, they would not read the Torah. Instead, they would recite [the passages] by heart as one recites the Shema. They would not gather for the afternoon service on Friday, for they were busy [with their preparations] for the Sabbath.

5 Their gathering together for each of these prayers of these four services and their standing in prayer, supplication, and petition and reading the Torah is called a ma'amad.

6 What would they read [from the Torah]? The narrative of creation. On the first day, they would read: "In the beginning," "Let there be a firmament;" On the second day, "Let there be a firmament" and "Let [the waters] be gathered;" on the third day, "Let [the waters] be gathered" and "Let there be luminaries;" on the fourth day, "Let there be luminaries" and "Let the waters teem;" on the fifth day, "Let the waters teem" and "Let the earth produce;" on the sixth day, "Let the earth produce" and "[The heavens and the earth] were completed."

7 A large passage would be read by two men, a small passage, by one. The two passages that were read in the morning would be read during this second service from a scroll. They would then be read again during the afternoon service by heart.

8 During the eight days of Chanukah, the men of the ma'amad would not carry out a ma'amad in the morning service. On any day when there was a Musaf sacrifice, there was not a ma'amad during their second service, nor in the afternoon service, only during the morning and neilah services. On any day when there was a sacrifice of wood, there was not a ma'amad during the neilah service, only during the morning, second, and afternoon services.

9 What was a sacrifice of wood? Certain families had a fixed time on which they would go out to the forests and bring wood for the arrangement [on the altar]. On the day designated for this family to bring their sacrifices, they would bring voluntary burnt offerings. This was called the sacrifice of the wood. It was like a festival for these families and they were forbidden to have eulogies delivered, fast, and perform work on that day. This was a custom.

10 Even a private individual who gave wood or logs for the arrangement [of the altar] is forbidden to have eulogies delivered, fast, and perform work on that day. This was a custom.

11 The men of the ma'amad are forbidden to have their hair cut and to launder [their clothes] throughout the week [they serve in the Temple]. On Thursday, they were permitted in honor of the Sabbath. Why were they forbidden to have their hair cut and to launder [their clothes]? So that they would not enter their ma'amad while they were unkept. Instead, they would have their hair cut and launder [their clothes] beforehand.

Chapter 7

1 There were fifteen officers in the Temple and similarly, an officer would always be appointed over these fifteen matters. They are [responsible for]:
a) the time [for the offering of the sacrifices],
b) the locking of the gates,
c) the guards,
d) the singers,

e) the cymbals and the other musical instruments,

f) the lotteries,

g) the pairs [of doves],

h) the seals,

i) the wine libations,

j) the sick,

k) the water,

l) the preparation of the showbread,

m) the preparation of the incense offering,

n) the preparation of the curtains,

o) the preparation of the priestly garments.

2 Each one of these officers has many men under his command in order to arrange the task over which he is appointed.

The one [appointed] to supervise the times: He and his men watch the times. When the time comes for a sacrifice to be offered, he or one of the men under his charge announce: "Priests arise to the [Temple] service. Levites [go] to the platform, Israelites, to the ma'amad." When his voice was heard, everyone would proceed to his task.

3 The one [appointed] to supervise the locking of the gates: At his command, the gates would be locked and opened. Those who sound [the trumpets] every day for the opening of the gates sound them only by his instruction. Every day, [the trumpets] were sounded three times at the opening of the gates [in the following manner]: a tekiah, a teruah, and a tekiah.

4 The one [appointed] to supervise the guards: He is "the officer of the Temple Mount" who would walk around [checking] the Levites [who would guard the Temple] every night. Whenever anyone would sleep at his post, he would strike him with his staff and burn his garment.

5 The one [appointed] to supervise the singers: Each day, he would chose singers to stand on the duchan to sing melodies. At his command, [the trumpets] would be sounded for the sacrifices. There were never less than 21 trumpet blasts sounded each day in the Temple: three at the opening of the gates [of the Temple Courtyard], nine for the daily offering of the morning, and nine for the daily offering of the afternoon. On a day when a Musaf offering is brought, nine trumpet blasts are added for the Musaf offering. If Rosh Chodesh or a festival falls on the Sabbath or Rosh HaShanah falls on the Sabbath - in which instance three Musaf offerings are brought- we do not sound the trumpets for each Musaf offering individually. Instead, nine trumpet blasts are sounded for all the Musaf offerings.

6 On Friday, six trumpet blasts are added: three to [notify] the people [when] to cease work and three to make a distinction between the holy and the mundane. On the pilgrimage festivals, three are added [to announce] the opening of the lower gate, i.e., the gate to the Women's Courtyard, and three [to announce] the opening of the upper gate, i.e., the Gate of Nicanor.

Why is it called the upper gate? Because it is higher than the Women's Courtyard. On Sukkot, three trumpet blasts are added [to announce] the filling of [a vessel with] water which is used for a libation on that holiday. The trumpets are not sounded for the filling of the water on the Sabbath. Three trumpet blasts are added upon the altar while the water libation is being offered.

All of these trumpet blasts were sounded under the direction of the officer in charge of the singers and at his command. All of these blasts were sounded with trumpets.

7 The one [appointed] to supervise the cymbal: He would arrange all the musicians who would help the Levites together with their instruments, as we explained.

8 The one [appointed] to supervise the lotteries, he would conduct the lotteries between the priests every day until each one would perform the work that he acquired through the lotteries. There were four lotteries conducted every day. In Hilchot Temidim, I will explain how these lotteries were conducted.

9 The one [appointed] to supervise [the sale of] the pairs of doves: He is the one with whom a price is determined to sell pairs [of doves] for the sacrifices, so-and-so many doves for a sela. Everyone who was obligated to [bring] turtle doves or doves [as a sacrifice] would bring the money for them to the Temple. This officer would give the pairs [of doves] to the people bringing the sacrifices. He would make a reckoning with the treasurers and they would provide him with [the doves].

Every thirty days, a price was established with him. If the price decreases

[during that month], [the Temple treasurers] supply him with them according to the lower price. If it increases, they provide them at the price established [originally], for the Temple is always given the upper hand [in business transactions]. Similarly, if a pair of doves is discovered to be unacceptable or was disqualified before it was offered, [this officer] must provide another in its place.

10 The one [appointed] to supervise [the sale of] the seals: He would receive the money for the wine libations from those obligation to bring libations and give them seals. The one [appointed] to supervise the wine libations would sell the wine libations.

11 What is implied? There where four seals in the Temple, one which had "calf" written on it, a second which had "male" written on it, a third which had "kid" written on it, and a fourth that had "sinner" written on it.

12 Whoever would bring his sacrifices to the Temple would give the money for the wine libations to the officer in charge of the seals. He would give him seals according to the number of sacrifices he brought. If a person afflicted with tzara'at was wealthy, he should give him one seal with "sinner" written upon it. The recipient then takes the seals to the officer in charge of the wine libations and he gives him wine libations according to the number of seals he has and what is written upon them. In the evening, [the two officers] meet and one gives the other seals and receives money in exchange for them.

If there is extra money, it is given to the Temple treasury. If there is less money, the officer in charge of the seals must pay from his own resources. When a person loses a seal, he should wait until the evening. If there is found an extra amount of money equivalent to the seal that he claims, it is given to him. If not, it is not given to him.

The date of each day is written on the seal [to protect against] deceivers [to prevent] one from keeping a seal in his possession until the price of the libations increases.

13 Every thirty days, a price for the wine and the flour is established with the officer in charge of the wine libations. If the price of the wine libations increases, he must supply them according to the price established beforehand. If their price decreases, he must supply them according to the lower price.

The profit the Temple treasury makes on these [fluctuations in] price is called "the windfall of the libations." It is used to purchase burnt offerings as "the dessert of the altar." Burnt offerings of doves are not used for this purpose, because doves are not used for communal offerings.

14 Since the priests stand on the floor at all times, eat much meat, and during their Temple service, they are not covered by any garments other than one cloak, they [often] suffer digestive ailments. Therefore an officer is appointed to check them and heal all their illnesses. He and the people in his charge are involved with them at all times.

15 Similarly, an officer is appointed to dig cisterns and reservoirs and fix the cisterns for people at large so that there will be water available in Jerusalem for all of its inhabitants and for all those who come on the pilgrimage festivals.

And there was one appointed for all the craftsmen who prepare the showbread and he supervises all their work. And there is one appointed over the craftsmen who prepare the incense offering and he supervises all their work.

16 The one [appointed] to supervise [the making of] the curtains would be in charge of all those who wove the curtains and embroidered [designs] on them so that they would be prepared for the Temple and the gates.

Each year, they would make two curtains to separate between the Sanctuary and the Holy of Holies. The strands of these curtains were all six-fold. They were of four types of fabric: linen, sky-blue dyed wool, purple dyed wool, and crimson dyed wool. Each one was six fold. Thus there were 24 strings. The curtains were a hand-breadth thick. They were woven with 72 heddles. Its length was forty cubits and its width was 20 cubits.

17 There were thirteen curtains in the Second Temple: Seven over the seven gates to the Temple Courtyard, one over the opening of the Entrance Porch, one over the entrance to the Sanctuary, two to serve as the d'vir between it and the [most] holy chamber, and two corresponding to them in the upper storey.

18 When a curtain becomes impure [due to contact] with a derivative of impurity, it should be immersed within [the Temple Courtyard]. It was brought into [the Temple] immediately, because there is no need to wait until the evening. If it became impure because of contact with a substance that is a source of impurity, it should be immersed [in a mikveh] outside [the Temple Courtyard] and it is spread out in the chayl, because it must wait until sunset [for its impurity] to depart. If it was new, it would be spread over the colonnade so that the people could see its embroidery for it was attractive.

19 All of the utensils in the Temple had copies and copies of the copies so that if the original contracted impurity, the second could be used in its place.

20 The one [appointed] to supervise [the making of] the priestly garments: He is occupied with the preparation of the garments of the ordinary priests and the garments of the High Priests and their being woven. Everything [necessary for them] is done under his authority. He had a chamber in the Sanctuary.

1 There are three types of priestly garments: the garments of an ordinary priest, [the High Priest's] golden garments and his white garments. An ordinary priest has four garments: a tunic, leggings, a hat, and a sash. They are all made from white linen with six-fold threads.The sash alone was embroidered with wool.

2 The golden garments are the garments of the High Priest. There were eight garments: The four of an ordinary priest, the cloak, the ephod, the breastplate, and the forehead plate. The sash of the High Priest was embroidered and was made in a similar manner as that of the ordinary priest. Similarly, the turban [the Torah] mentions with regard to Aaron corresponds to the hat mentioned with regard to his sons. [The difference is that the] turban of the High Priest is worn like fabric swathed around a hernia. The hat of the ordinary priest, by contrast, is worn like an ordinary hat; hence, its name.

3 The white garments are the four garments that the High Priests would wear on Yom Kippur. They are: a tunic, leggings, a sash, and a turban. They are all white, their threads are six-fold, and they are made from linen alone. The High Priests had two other tunics for Yom Kippur: one he would wear in the morning and one he would wear in the evening. Both of them cost 30 maneh. They were purchased with communal funds. If he wished to add to their value, he must add from his own funds. He would consecrate the additional money and then use it to have the tunic made.

4 It is a mitzvah for the priestly garments to be new, attractive, and to hang low like the garments of the men of stature, as [implied by Exodus 28:2 which states that they must be made]: "for honor and for beauty." If they were soiled, torn, longer than his appropriate measure, shorter than his appropriate measure, hoisted up by the sash, and a priest performed service while wearing them, his service is invalid. If they were worn-out or they were too long and he hoisted them with the sash so that they would be appropriate to his measure, his service is valid.

5 Whenever any of the priestly garments become soiled, they are not bleached or laundered. Instead, they are left to be used for wicks and he should wear new ones. When the garments of the High Priest become worn out, they should be entombed. The white garments which the High Priest wears on the day of the fast should not be worn a second time at all. Instead, they are entombed in the place where he removes them, as [Leviticus 16:23] states: "And he shall leave them there." It is forbidden to benefit from them.

6 They would make wicks from the leggings and the sashes of the ordinary priests that wore out. They were used to kindle lamps in the Temple for the rejoicing that accompanied the water libation. The tunics of the ordinary priests that wore out were used to make wicks for the Menorah which lit continually.

7 All of the priestly garments come from communal funds. When one individual donates one of the priestly garments, he may donate it to the community and then it is permitted to be used. Similarly, the sacrificial vessels and the wood for the altar arrangement that an individual donated to the community are acceptable. Even all the communal sacrifices which an individual donates from his own resources to the community are acceptable, provided he gives them to the community.

8 They would make many sets of clothes for ordinary priests. There were 96 lockers in the Temple in which to place the clothes, four lockers for each watch. The name of each watch was written on the lockers and they were all closed. When the men of the watch began their priestly service on the Sabbath, they would open their lockers throughout their week and take their garments. When they departed, they would return the clothes to their lockers and close them.

9 Why did they make four lockers for each watch? So that the garments would not be intermingled. Instead, all of the leggings were [stored] in one locker on which was written: Leggings. Similarly, the sashes were [stored] in one locker on which was written: Sash. Similarly, the hats and the tunics each had their own locker.

10 The High Priest would leave his golden garments in his chamber at night or when he left the Temple.

11 It is permitted to derive benefit from the priestly garments. Therefore [the priests] wear them on the day of their Temple service even when they are not performing service with the exception of the sash, because it is shaatnez.

12 It is, however, forbidden for an ordinary priest to wear it except during his service. The [clothes] the priests wear for their service are of wool and linen alone.

13 Whenever the Torah uses the word sheish or bad, it is referring to flax, i.e., linen. Whenever the term techeilet is used, it refers to wool which is dyed sky-blue, i.e., lighter than dark blue. The term argaman refers to wool that is dyed red. And tola'at sheni refers to wool dyed with a gnat.

14 Whenever the Torah uses the term sheish or "spun sheish," it is necessary that the strand be sixfold. Where the term bad is used, it is valid, if one strand alone is used. [Even in such situations,] the most desirable manner of performing the mitzvah is that it be sixfold. Whenever the term meshizar is used alone, the intent is a thread that is eightfold.

15 Whenever the Torah uses the term "a work of embroidery," the intent is that the design which is woven will be seen on one side of the fabric. When it uses the term "a work of craft," the intent is that the design will be seen on both sides of the fabric, front and back.

16 How are the clothes made? The tunic - whether of the High Priest or an ordinary priest - was made with a boxlike knit. The knit had sequences of squares as is the structure of an animal's maw, in the manner which weavers make firm garments. Its sleeve was woven separately and then sown to the body of the tunic.

17 The length of the tunic extended until slightly above the heel. The length of the sleeve extended until his wrist and its width was the width of his hand.

18 The leggings - whether of the High Priest or an ordinary priest - extend from the loins until the thighs, i.e., from above the navel, close to the heart, until the end of the thigh, i.e., until the knee. They had straps. They did not have a special feature for the anus, nor for the male organ.

Instead, they would surround the body like a pouch.

19 The turban - whether of an ordinary priest or a High Priest - was sixteen cubits long. The sash was about three fingerbreadths wide and 32 cubits long. [The priest would] wrap it around himself, winding after winding. The priestly garments were not sown, rather they woven, as [Exodus 39:22] states: "weavers' craft."

Chapter 9

1 How is the forehead plate made? We make a plate of gold two fingerbreadths wide that extends [over the forehead of the High Priest] from one ear to the other. Upon it is written, קדש לה'ה in two lines, קדש on the lower line and לה'ה on the upper line. If [the words] were written on one line it was valid. There were times when they were written on one line.

2 The letters would project outward. How was this done? [A craftsman] would engrave the letters on the back of the plate while it was pressed to beeswax until they project.
It had holes on each of its ends. There was a strand of sky-blue wool below it that ran from hole to hole so that it could be tied with this strand at the nape [of the neck].

3 The cloak was made entirely of sky-blue colored wool. Its strands were twelve-fold. Its opening was woven, and that is where its weave began. It did not have an opening for his arms. Instead, it was divided into two flaps from below the throat and downward like all cloaks. It is joined only directly below the throat.

One who tears the border of the opening of the cloak is liable for lashes, as [Exodus 28:32] states: "It shall not be torn." This applies to all the priestly garments. One who tears them with a destructive intent is liable for lashes.

4 He should then bring sky-blue wool, red wool, and scarlet wool, the strands of each of these spun eight-fold. [This is necessary,] because [Exodus 39:24] states that [the pomegrantes on the cloak's] hem [should be made from strands that are] "twisted."Thus there are twenty four threads used for the hem of the cloak. They should be fashioned into shapes resembling pomegranates whose mouths are not openand hung from the cloak. He brings 72 cups with 72 clappers that are made entirely of gold and suspends them from the hems, 36 from the hem of one flap and 36 from the hem of the other flap. The cup with the clapper hanging in it are together called a bell. From the hems on both sides of [the flaps of the cloak are suspended series of] bells and pomegranates, bells and pomegranates.

5 The gold that is woven in the ephod and the breastplate which is mentioned in the Torah was made in the following manner. A strand of pure gold was taken and placed together with six strands of sky-blue wool and [then] the seven strands were spun as one. He would do the same with one strand of gold and six of red wool, with one strand [of gold] with six of scarlet wool, and with one strand of gold with six of linen.

Thus there would be four strands of gold and there would be a total of 28 strands.

[This is reflected by Exodus 39:3]: "And they hammered out thin sheets of gold [and cut strands] to fashion into the sky-blue wool, into the red wool, into the scarlet wool, and into the linen." This teaches that there was a strand of gold woven in them.

6 How was the breastplate made? He would weave a garment that was a work of craft from gold, sky-blue wool, red wool, scarlet, linen, with 28 strands, as we explained. It is a cubit long and zeret wide and it should be folded into two. Thus it was a square a zeret long and a zeret wide. In it should be affixed four rows of stones as described by the Torah. Each stone should be square and set in a setting of gold that encompasses it from below and from the four directions.

7 He should engrave on the stones the names of the tribes according to their order of birth. Thus on the ruby, the name Reuben is engraved and on the jasper, Benjamin is engraved. At the outset, above Reuben, he should write [the names] Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob and below Benjamin, he should write, שבטי יה so that all the letters are found there.

8 Four golden rings are made on the four corners of the breastplate. In the two upper rings from which the breastplate is suspended, two golden cords are placed. They are called chains. In the two lower rings that are opposite [the High Priest's] breast are placed two cords of sky-blue wool.

9 The width of the ephod is the width of a person's back from shoulder to shoulder. Its length extend from one's elbows to his feet. It has two bands extending from it on either side with which it is fastened. They are called the belt of the ephod. The entire garment is woven with gold, sky-blue wool, red wool, scarlet wool, and linen with 28 threads as described with regard to the breastplate.He should sew to it two shoulder straps so that it will extend to [High] Priest's shoulder. He should affix to each shoulder a square sardonyx stone set in a setting of gold. The names of the tribes should be engraved on the two stones, six on one stone and six on the other according to the order of their birth. Joseph's name would be written as יהוסף. Thus there would be 25 letters on one stone and 25 letters on the other stone. They would be written in this manner.

The stone on which Reuven's name was written was placed on his right shoulder and the stone on which Shimon's name was written was placed on his left shoulder. On each shoulder, he should make two rings: one above, one the top of the shoulder and one below the shoulder above the belt. The two golden cords should be placed in the the two upper rings, they are called chains. This is the form of the ephod.

10 Afterwards, he places the ends of the cords of the breastplate in the upper rings that are on the shoulders of the ephod and he should place the two strands of sky-blue wool that are on the hem of the breastplate into the rings that are above the belt of the ephod. The chains that are in the rings on the shoulders of the ephod should descend until they reach the upper rings of the breastplate so that they will cleave to each other and thus the breastplate will not be separate from the ephod. Anyone who separates the breastplate from the ephod and disrupts their connectionwith a destructive intent is worthy of lashes.

11 Thus when he wears the ephod together with the breastplate, the breastplate will be flat over his heart and the ephod will be behind him. The belt of the ephod is tied over his heart below the breastplate. The two shoulders of the ephod lie on his two shoulders. The two cords of gold extend down from his shoulders on either side from the shoulders of ephod to the rings of the breastplate. The two strands of sky-blue wool are tied below his elbows from the two lower rings of the breastplate to the two lower rings of the shoulders of the ephod which are above the belt.

1 What is the order in which the priestly garments should be put on? [The priest] should put on the leggings first, tying them above his navel, over his loins. Afterwards, he puts on the tunic and then puts on the sash at elbow height. He should wind it fold after fold until it ends and then tie it.

2 With regard to the sash, [where it should be placed can be understood from] the received tradition. [Ezekiel 44:18] states: "They shall not gird themselves bayeza, [interpreted to mean] "in a place where one perspires." Yonason, the son of Uziel, received the same tradition from the prophets and translated the phrase: "They will gird themselves over the heart." Afterwards, he should arrange the headpiece as a hat.

3 After the High Priest girds himself with the sash, he puts on the cloak, and on the cloak, the ephod and the breastplate. He girds himself with the belt of the ephod over the cloak, below the breastplate. Therefore [the cloak] is called "the cloak of the ephod," the cloak that is girded closed with the ephod.

Afterwards, he winds the headgear like a turban. He ties the forehead plate [behind his head,] above the turban. His hair was visible between the forehead plate and the turban and it is in that place that he would wear his tefillin between the forehead plate and the turban.

4 It is a positive commandment to make these garments and for the priests to serve in them, as [Exodus 28:2] states: "And you shall make holy garments," and [ibid. 29:8] states: "And drew near his sons and dress them in tunics."

When a High Priest serves with less than these eight garments or an ordinary priest serves with less than these four garments, he is called lacking garments. His service is invalid and he is liable for death at the hand of Heaven, like a non-priest who serves. [This is indicated by ibid.:9 which states:] "And you shall gird them with a sash... and their priesthood shall be for them...." [Implied is that] when their garments are upon them, their priesthood is upon them. [Conversely,] if their garments are not upon them, they are like non-priests, concerning whom [Numbers 1:51] states: "A non-priest who draws close [to the service of the Sanctuary] shall die."

5 Just like a priest who is lacking garments is liable to die and invalidates the service he performs, so too, one who wears extra garments - e.g., he wears two tunics, two sashes, or an ordinary priest who wears the garments of the High Priest and performs service - profanes his service and is liable for death at the hand of Heaven.

6 It is said with regard to the priestly garments: "on his flesh and he shall wear them." [Implied is that] nothing should intervene between his flesh and the garments. Even if there is one thread, earth, or a dead louse between his flesh and the [priestly] garment, it is considered an intervening substance and his service is invalid. Therefore a priest cannot serve [in the Temple wearing] his arm tefillin, because they intervene. The head tefillin, by contrast, do not intervene and if he desires to wear them at the time of his Temple service, he may.

7 [A priest] must be careful at the time that he puts on [the priestly garments] that there be no dust, nor a louse - even if it is alive - between his flesh and the garment. Nor should air enter between his flesh and his garment during the time of service so that the garment will become distant from his flesh. He should not place his hand in his bosom under his tunic. He should not remove his hair from the garment, nor should there be a strand hanging loose from the garment. [Although] one these factors occurs, his service is acceptable.

8 [The following rules apply if a priest] wrapped a cloth on his flesh in a place [untouched by the priestly] garments, e.g., he wrapped it on his finger or on his heel. If it is three fingerbreadths by three fingerbreadths, it is considered as an intervening substance and it invalidates [the service]. If it is smaller than that, it is not considered as an intervening substance. A small belt, since it is considered as an independent garment, invalidates [one's service] even if it is not three fingerbreadths by three fingerbreadths in area.

9 When the finger of a priest is wounded, he is permitted to tie a reed or a cloth that is not three fingerbreadths by three fingerbreadths around it on the Sabbath and perform his service. If he intends to release blood, it is forbidden. [Leniency is granted,] provided the reed or the cloth does not intervene between his flesh and a sacred utensil at the time of service.

10 In the Second Temple, they made the Urim and the Tumim to complete the eight garments [of the High Priest] even though inquiry was not made of them. Why was inquiry not made of them? Because the Holy Spirit was not vested there. And whenever a priest does not speak with the Holy Spirit and the Divine Presence does not rest there, inquiry is not made.

11 How was inquiry made? The [High] priest would stand facing the Ark. The person making inquiry was behind him, facing the [High] Priest's back. The inquirer would ask: "Should I go up [to war] or not?" He would not ask in a loud voice, nor would he merely think about the matter in his heart. Instead, [he would speak] in a low voice, like someone praying to himself. Immediately, the Holy Spirit will enclothe the [High] Priest. He will look at the breastplate and with the spirit of prophecy see "Go up" or "Do not go up" written in letters emerging from the breastplate toward his face. The [High] Priest would then answer [the inquirer], telling him: "Go up" or "Do not go up."

12 Two matters should not be asked about at once. If they are, one replies only to the first. Inquiry should not be made [of the Urim and Tumim] by an ordinary person, only by a king, the court, or one who the community at large requires. [This is derived from Numbers 27:21:] "Before Elazar the priest shall he stand... [he and all the children of Israel with him, and the entire congregation]." "He" refers to the king; "all the children of Israel" to the priest anointed to lead the people in war, or someone whom the people need to make inquiry for them; and "all the congregation" refers to the High Court.

13 The statements found in the words of the prophets that the priests would wear an ephod of linen does not mean that they were High Priests. For the High Priest's ephod was not of linen [alone]. For the Levites would also wear such a garment, for the prophet Samuel was a Levite, and [I Samuel 2:18] describes him as "a youth, girded with a linen ephod." Instead, this ephod was worn by the students of the prophets and those who were fit to have the Holy Spirit rest upon them to make it known that such a person reached a rung equivalent to that of the High Priest who speaks with the Holy Spirit via the medium of the ephod and the breastplate.
Blessed be the Merciful One Who grants assistance.

Mishneh Torah, Admission into the Sanctuary

1 Whenever a priest who is fit to perform Temple service drinks wine, he is forbidden to enter the area of the Altar or [proceed] beyond there. If he entered [that area] and performed service, his service is invalid and he is liable for death at the hand of heaven, as [Leviticus 10:9] states: "[Do not drink intoxicating wine...] so that you do not die."

The above applies provided one drinks a revi'it of undiluted wine at one time, provided the wine is over 40 days old. If, however, one drank less than a revi'it of wine, one drank a revi'it intermittently, one mixed it with water, or one drank even more than a revi'it of wine from the vat, i.e., within 40 days of its being brought into being, he is exempt and his service is not profaned. If he drank more than a revi'it of wine, even though it was diluted and even though he drank it intermittently, he is liable for death and his service is invalidated.

2 If a person is intoxicated from beverages other than wine, he is forbidden to enter the Temple. If he enters and performs service while intoxicated from other beverages - even if he is intoxicated from milk or figs - he is liable for lashes, but his service is valid, for one is liable for death only when drinking wine at the time of service and one does not invalidate service unless he is intoxicated from wine.

3 Just as a priest is forbidden to enter the Temple while intoxicated, so too, it is forbidden for any person, whether priest or Israelite, to render a halachic ruling when he is intoxicated. Even if he ate dates or drank milk and his mind became somewhat confused, he should not issue a ruling, as [the above passage (ibid.:11)] continues: "And to give instruction to the children of Israel." If he gave a ruling concerning a matter that is explicitly stated in the Torah to the extent that it is known by the Sadducees, he is permitted. For example, he ruled that a sheretz is impure and a frog is pure; [he ruled that] blood is forbidden, or the like.

4 It is permitted for a person who is intoxicated to teach Torah, even Torah law and the interpretation of verses, provided he does not deliver a ruling. If he was a sage who delivers rulings on a regular basis, he should not teach, for his teaching constitutes the delivery of a ruling.

5 When a person drank precisely a revi'it and it was diluted with the slightest amount of water, he slept a bit, or he walked a mil, the effects of the wine will have worn off and he is permitted to serve [in the Temple]. If, however, he drank more than a revi'it even if it was diluted, sleeping slightly or journeying adds to his drunkenness. Depending on how intoxicated he was, he must wait until there is no trace of his drunkenness whatsoever.

6 The men of the priestly watch are permitted to drink wine at night, but not during the day, during the week [they serve in the Temple]. Even the members of the other clans who were not scheduled to work on a particular day [are forbidden], lest the Temple service overburden the members of the clan who serve that day and they require other members of the watch to help them.

The members of the clan of a particular day are forbidden to drink both during the day and night of that day, lest they drink at night and arise to their service in the morning without the effects of the wine having worn off.

7 Whenever a priest knows the watch from which he descends and the clan from which he descends, and he knows the day on which the members of his clan were scheduled to serve [in the Temple], he is forbidden to drink wine that entire day. If one knows from which watch he is descended, but does not know his clan, he is forbidden to drink wine the entire week during which his clan worked.

If [a priest] does not know [the identity of] his watch or his clan, the law would dictate that he should never be allowed to drink wine. Nevertheless, his difficulty leads to his solution and he is permitted to drink wine at all times, for he is not allowed to serve [in the Temple] until his clan and watch are established.

8 A priest who lets his hair grow long is forbidden to enter the area of the Altar or [proceed] beyond there. If he enters this area and performs service, he is liable for death at the hand of Heaven like an intoxicated [priest] who serves, as [indicated by Ezekiel 44:20-21]: "None of the priests shall drink wine. They shall not shave their heads, nor allow their hair to grow long." Just as [priests who serve] intoxicated from wine are liable to die, so too, those who allow their hair to grow long are liable to die.

9 [Priests who] let their hair grow long do not disqualify their service. Even though they are obligated to die, their service is valid.

10 Just as the priests are not warned against drinking wine except at the time they enter the Temple, so too, they are forbidden to grow their hair long only at the time they enter the Temple.

To whom does the above apply? To an ordinary priest. A High Priest, by contrast, is forbidden to let his hair grow long and rend his garments forever, for he should be in the Temple at all times. Therefore with regard to him, [Leviticus 21:10] states: "He should not let [the hair of] his head grow long, nor should he rend his garments."

11 What is meant by growing one's hair long? [Leaving it uncut for] 30 days like a Nazirite, concerning whom [Numbers 6:5] states: "He shall let the mane of the hair of his head grow long" and a nazirite vow is not less than 30 days. Therefore an ordinary priest who serves [in the Temple] must cut his hair every 30 days.

12 The priests of the watch [serving in the Temple that week] are forbidden to cut their hair and launder their garments during that week, so that they will not enter the Temple when they are unkempt. Instead, they should cut their hair, wash, and do their laundry before coming [to the Temple].

13 When a priest's watch is concluded in the midst of a festival, he is permitted to cut his hair in the midst of the festival. If, however, his watch concludes on the day preceding a festival, he should cut his hair only on that day.

14 The laws [applying to a priest who enters the Temple with] torn garments are the same as those [applying to one with] long hair, as [Leviticus 10:6] states: "Do not let [the hair on] your heads grow long or rend your garments lest you die." Thus if [a priest] served with torn garments, he is liable for death at the hand of Heaven although his service is valid and was not profaned.

15 It appears to me that any priest who is fit to serve who enters the area of the altar or [proceeds] beyond there while intoxicated due to wine, drunk due to other alcoholic beverages, with long hair, or with torn garments as one tears because of a person's death, he is liable for lashes, even if he did not perform service. [The rationale is that] he is fit for service and entered [the Temple] at the time of service in such an unkept manner although he was warned not to enter.

16 The laws that apply to someone who enters beyond the altar and the laws that apply to ones who depart from there are the same. What is implied? One drank a revi'it of wine between the Ulam and the altar or tore his garments there and departed, he is liable for lashes. Similarly, if he performed service as he departed, he is liable for death.

17 Similarly, it is forbidden for any person, whether a priest or an Israelite, to enter the entire Temple area, from the Courtyard of the Israelites and onward when he is intoxicated from wine, drunk [from other beverages], with unkept long hair or with torn garments. Although there is no explicit warning [against this in the Torah], it is not a sign of honor or reverence to the great and holy house to enter it unkept. If, however, an Israelite lets his hair grow until it is formed into a weave and it was not unkept, he is permitted to enter the Courtyard of the Israelites.

1 The High Priest enters the Holy of Holies each year only on Yom Kippur. An ordinary priest may enter the Sanctuary for service every day.

2 The priests were all warned not to enter the Sanctuary or the Holy of Holies when they are not in the midst of the service, as [Leviticus 16:2] states: "He shall not come to the Holy Chamber at all time" - this refers to the Holy of Holies. "...Within the curtain" - this warns [the priests against unwarranted entry] into the entire Temple.

3 A priest - whether an ordinary priest or a High Priest - who enters the Holy of Holies on any of the other days of the year, or a High Priest who enters there on Yom Kippur outside the time of service, he is liable for death at the hand of heaven, as [ibid.] states: "And he shall not die."
How many times does he enter on Yom Kippur? Four, as will be explained in the appropriate place. If he enters a fifth time, he is liable for death at the hand of heaven.

4 One - whether an ordinary priest or a High priest - who enters the Sacred Chamber outside the Holy of Holies, not for the sake of service, nor prostrating oneself, is liable for lashes, but is not liable for death. [This is derived from the above verse which states:] "Before the covering [that is upon the Ark] so that he will not die." [Implied is that] for [unauthorized entry into] the Holy of Holies, he is liable for death, but [entering] the remainder of the Sanctuary is merely the violation of a negative commandment and is punishable by lashes.

5 A priest - whether an ordinary priest or a High priest - who departs from the Temple is liable for death [at the hand of heaven] only in the midst of his service, as [ibid 10:7] states: "From the entrance to the Tent of Meeting, you shall not depart, lest you die." Implied is that you should not abandon the service and leave hastily and in panic because of this decree. Similarly, the charge [issued to] the High Priest [ibid. 21:12]: "He shall not depart from the Temple," applies only in the midst of his service, i.e., that he should not abandon his service and depart.

6 If so, why was this warning repeated for the High Priest? [Because there is a difference between the laws that apply to him and those which apply to an ordinary priest]. When an ordinary priest was in the midst of his service in the Temple and he heard that a person for whom he is obligated to mourn has died, he should not perform sacrificial service, even though he does not leave the Temple, because he is in an acute state of mourning. if he performed service while in an acute state of mourning, he profanes his service, whether he is offering an individual sacrifice or a communal offering. A High Priest, by contrast, performs sacrificial service while he is in a state of acute mourning, as [implied by ibid.]: "From the Temple, he should not depart and not profane." Implied is that he should remain [in the Temple] and perform the service with which he was involved and it does not become profaned.

7 What is the source that teaches that the service of one in an acute state of mourning is invalid? [It is derived from] an inference from a less severe situation to a more severe one. A priest disqualified because of a physical deformity may partake of sacrificial foods. Nevertheless, if he performs service, he profanes it. How much more so should one who is in acute mourning and thus forbidden to partake of sacrificial foods - as [Deuteronomy 26:14] states: "I did not eat from it in a state of acute morning" - profane his service [if he performs it].

8 Although a High Priest may perform service while he is in a state of acute mourning, he is forbidden to partake of sacrificial food, as [Leviticus 10:19] states: "If I had partaken of the sin-offering today, would it have found favor in God's eyes." Similarly, he does not participate in the division of the sacrificial foods so that he could partake of the food in the evening.

When a person in an acute state of mourning performs sacrificial service, he is not liable for lashes. He is permitted to touch sacrificial foods even though he did not immerse himself [in a mikveh], for this safeguard was enforced only with regard to eating. With regard to touching [objects], he is considered as pure, as will be explained in the appropriate place.

9 What is meant by a person in an acute state of mourning? One who lost one of the relatives for whom he is required to mourn. On the day of the person's death, he is considered in acute mourning according to Scriptural Law. And at night, he is in acute mourning according to Rabbinic Law.

10 When [it was necessary] to wait several days and [only] afterwards, a corpse was buried, for all those days after the day of the deceased's passing, [his relative] is considered in an acute state of mourning according to Rabbinic Law. This also [applies] with regard to the day of burial, but not the following night.

Therefore if [a close relative of a priest] dies and he buries him after the day of his death, throughout the day of the burial, he may not offer or partake of sacrifices according to Rabbinic Law. He should then immerse himself and partake of sacrifices at night. The day on which a person hears a report that a relative of his died within 30 days and the day on which he gathers his bones is considered as the day of one's burial, but [the restrictions] do not apply at night. On the day of [a close relative's] death, by contrast, just as it is forbidden to partake of sacrificial foods during the day according to Scriptural Law, so too, it is forbidden for him to partake of them that night according to Rabbinic Law. [The only] exception is the Paschal sacrifice which he may eat at night, as will be explained in the appropriate place.

11 Throughout the seven days of mourning, a mourner should not send sacrifices [to be offered in the Temple]. [Indeed, he should not send] even wine, wood, or frankincense. Similarly, a person afflicted with tzara'at should not send his sacrifices [to be offered in the Temple]. For as long as he is not fit to enter the camp [of the Levites], he is not fit for his sacrifices to be offered. There is an unresolved question whether a person under a ban of ostracism may send his sacrifices [to be offered] or not. Hence, if they were offered on his behalf, [his obligation] is satisfied.

12 A person who is impure because of contact with a dead lizard or the like and an uncircumcised person may send their sacrifices and they are offered with the exception of the Paschal sacrifice. That sacrifice may not be offered for a person who is impure because of contact with a dead lizard. Nor may a Paschal sacrifice be offered for an uncircumcised person, as will be explained. No sacrifices at all are offered for a person who is impure because of contact with a corpse until he becomes ritually pure.

1 It is a positive commandment to send all impure persons away from the Temple, as [Numbers 5:2] states: "And they shall send away from the camp all those with tzara'at and zav [afflictions] and all those who are impure because of contact with a corpse.

2 "The camp" cited refers to "the camp of the Divine presence," i.e., from the entrance to the Courtyard of the Israelites onward. Should one infer that a person with tzaraat or zav ailments and one impure due to contact with a corpse are all three sent to the same place? With regard to one inflicted with tzara'at, [Leviticus 13:46] states: "He shall abide alone outside the camp where he dwells." [The camp from which he is sent] refers to the camp of the Israelites which parallels the area from the entrance to Jerusalem and beyond. [From this we conclude,] just like a person who is afflicted with tzara'at, because his impurity is more severe, is sent away in a more severe manner than others, so too, any individuals whose state of impurity is more severe than others should be sent out in a more severe manner.

Therefore a person afflicted with tzara'at is sent outside of all three camps, i.e., outside of Jerusalem. [His impurity is considered more severe,] because he causes [a house] to be considered impure when he enters it. This does not apply with regard to a zav.

3 Men with a zav condition, women with a zavah condition, niddot, and women who gave birth are sent outside two camps, i.e., outside the Temple Mount. [The rationale for this severity is that] they cause an entity upon which they are seated or upon which they are lying to become ritually impure, even if it is under a stone. [This does not apply] with regard to impurity [contracted] from a corpse.

4 A person who is impure because of contact with a human corpse - and even a corpse itself - is permitted to enter the Temple Mount. [This is derived from Exodus 13:19]: "And Moses took the bones of Joseph with him." "With him" [implies] into the camp of the Levites.

5 From the chayl, gentiles, those who contracted impurity from a human corpse, and those who had relations with a niddah are sent away. A person who immersed that day may enter there, for he has already immersed.

6 From the Women's Courtyard, one who immersed himself that day is sent away, but not one who has not completed the purification process. For [the day on which] a person who has not completed the purification process [immersed himself] has already passed. The prohibition against a person who has immersed himself entering [this portion of] the camp of the Levites is Rabbinic in origin.

7 From the Courtyard of the Israelites and onward even one who has not completed his process of purification should not enter, because his process of purification is not yet consummated. [This is evident from Leviticus 12:8 which, with regard to a woman who seeks purification after childbirth,] states: "And the priest will bring atonement for her and she will become pure." One can infer that until then, she was not pure.

8 An impure person who [must be] sent away from the Temple Mount, violates a negative commandment if he enters there, as [can be inferred from Deuteronomy 23:11 which] states: "And he shall go outside the camp" - this refers to the camp of the Shechinah - "and he shall not enter the midst of the camp" - this refers to the camp of the Levites. Similarly, a person afflicted by tzara'at who enters Jerusalem is liable for lashes. If, however, he enters any of the other walled cities [in Eretz Yisrael], although he is not allowed to, as [implied by the verse]: "He shall abide alone," he is not liable for lashes.

9 If one afflicted with tzara'at entered the Temple Mount, he is liable for 80 lashes. If, however, one who is impure because of contact with a human corpse or one who immersed himself that day entered the Women's Courtyard, or one who has not completed his process of purification entered the Israelites' Courtyard, he is not given lashes. He is, however, given stripes for rebellious conduct.

10 Just as there is a positive commandment to send impure persons out from the Temple, so too, if they enter, they violate a negative commandment, as [Numbers 5:3] states: "They shall not make your camp impure." This refers to the camp of the Shechinah.

11 What source teaches that one does not violate the prohibition unless he enters [the Temple], but that he is exempt if he touches the Temple Courtyard from the outside? [Leviticus 12:4] states with regard to a woman who gives birth: "She shall not enter the Sanctuary."

12 When an impure person willfully enters the Temple, he is punishable by karet, as [Leviticus 17:16] states: "If he will not clean [his garments] or wash his flesh, he will bear his iniquity." [If he enters] unknowingly, he is liable for an adjustable guilt offering, as [ibid. 5:2] states: "Or a soul that will touch any impure entity." One is liable for karet or a sacrifice only when one enters from the Israelites' Courtyard or onward or into an addition to the Courtyard that was sanctified in a consummate manner, as we explained.

13 What are the types of impurity for which one is liable [for entering] the Temple [while impure]?

a) Anyone who became impure through contact with a human corpse in a manner which would require a nazirite to shave [his head] because of them; these are explained in [Hilchot] Nizirut;

b) one who touched a person or a utensil that became impure through those types of impurity for which a nazirite must shave [his head]; for such a person is considered as a second level of impurity to a primary object of impurity that touched a corpse;

c) one who became impure through contact with another primary source of impurity as mandated by Scriptural Law, as will be explained in their appropriate places.

14 The general principle is: Anyone who is required to immerse himself in water according to Scriptural Law is liable for karet for entering the Temple [while impure] even after he immersed himself until nightfall [that day]. If, however, one became impure due to impurity stemming from a human corpse that does not require a nazirite to shave [his head], he is exempt for entering the Temple, even though his impurity lasts for seven days.

15 Similarly, if one touches utensils that touched a human corpse or touches a person who is touching utensils that touch a corpse, even though he is considered as impure to the first degree with regard to terumah and with regard to imparting impurity to sacrificial foods, he is exempt for entering the Temple. For these matters are laws received through the Oral Tradition. Although he is exempt, he is given stripes for rebellious conduct.

16 A person who brings a dead teeming animal or the like into the Temple or when he brings an impure person into the Temple, he is liable for karet, because he made God's sanctuary impure. If, however, he threw impure utensils into the Temple - even if they were utensils that touched a corpse - he is exempt from karet, but liable for lashes, as [implied by the prooftext cited above]: "If he will not clean [his garments]...." According to the Oral Tradition, [for entering the Temple without] washing his body, he is liable for karet. [For entering without] cleaning his garments, he receives 40 lashes.

17 It appears to me that he is liable for lashes only for his clothes that are a source of ritual impurity, i.e., clothes that were touched by a person who became impure through contact with a corpse that themselves become a source for ritual impurity, as will be explained. If, by contrast, one brings a garment which is of first degree impurity into the Temple, he is not liable for lashes. He does, however, receive stripes for rebellious conduct.

18 Similarly, when an impure person inserts his hand [alone] into the Temple, he is given stripes for rebellious conduct. Similarly, anyone who purposely enters the Temple before immersing himself while he is impure because of contact with objects that are sources of ritual impurity by virtue of Rabbinic decree, because he ate impure foods, or because he drank impure beverages is given stripes for rebellious conduct.

19 When an impure person enters the Temple through the rooftops, he is exempt. [This is derived from the prooftext cited above:] "He shall not enter the Temple." [Implied is that] the Torah held him liable [only when he entered in] the way one usually enters. Although he is exempt for karet, he is given stripes for rebellious conduct.

[This exemption applies] even if he enters in a compartment flying in the air, whether he entered the Temple in this compartment through the roofs or through the entrances.

20 In all places where one is liable for karet for a willful transgression or a sacrifice for an unknowing transgression, should an impure object be found there on the Sabbath, it should be removed. In other places, it should be covered with a utensil until after the Sabbath. When it is removed, it should be removed only with flat wooden utensils which do not contract ritual impurity, so that there should not be an increase in ritual impurity.

21 Both an impure person who entered the Temple when it was pure and a pure person who entered the Temple when there was impurity within it - e.g., a corpse was lying under a shelter in the Temple and he entered under that shelter - are liable for karet. [In the latter situation,] his entrance and his impurity occur at one time.

If one enters the Temple and becomes impure there after he enters, even if he purposely made himself impure, he should hurry, and depart in the shortest way possible.

22 It is forbidden for him to tarry, to bow, or to depart via a longer way. If he tarried or departed via a longer way even though he did not tarry, or he turned his face to the Sanctuary and bowed even if he did not tarry, he is liable for karet. If he acted unknowingly, he must bring a sacrifice.

23 If he did not turn his face [toward the Sanctuary], but bowed as he was departing toward the outside area, he is not liable unless he tarrys.
How long a delay [creates a liability]? Enough time to read the verse: "And they bowed with their faces to the ground on the floor, prostrating themselves and giving thanks to God who is good and whose kindness is everlasting." This is the measure of the delay [for which one is liable].

24 What is meant by [departing] via longer way? Any way for which it is possible to depart from the Temple via a shorter way.
If one departed via a shorter way, even if he did not run, but instead walked [slowly], positioning his heel by his toes, although it takes the entire day, he is exempt. If he took a longer path, even though he ran and pressed himself with all of his power and thus the amount of time it took for him to leave in this manner was less than it would take other men via the shorter way, he is liable, because he departed via the longer path.
If he departed via the shorter path, but walked some, then stood, tarried some, [and continued this pattern] until all of his delays together amount to the time it takes to bow, he is not liable for lashes if he acted willfully, nor is he liable for a sacrifice if he acted unknowingly, because there is an unresolved question concerning the matter. He is, however, given stripes for rebellious conduct.

1 When an impure person serves in the Temple, he desecrates his service and is liable for death at the hand of heaven for [performing] this service even if he did not tarry there, as [indicated by Leviticus 22:2]: "so that they draw back for the sanctified objects of the children of Israel and not desecrate My holy name." This is a warning for a person who serves while ritually impure.

Further on, [ibid.:9] states: "They will die because of it, because they desecrated it." Just as in the latter instance, desecration makes one liable for death at the hands of heaven, so too, with regard to [offering sacrifices while impure, desecration] makes one liable for death at the hand of heaven. Lashes are given for [the violation of] all negative commandments punishable by death at the hand of heaven.

2 Although one who serves in a state of impurity is liable only for lashes in court, his priestly brethren would not bring him to the court. Instead, they would take him outside [the Temple] and split open his brain. They would not be rebuked for this.

3 How is it possible for a priest to perform service without tarrying so that he will be liable only for death at the hand of heaven and not karet? For example, he contracted impurity in the Temple Courtyard and departed in the shortest way possible, but as he was leaving, he used a cylinder in his hand to turn over a limb [from a sacrifice] on the fire of the altar and thus hasten its consumption by the flames. [The rationale is that] any contribution to the Temple service is considered as equivalent to that service.

4 Similarly, if one who was impure immersed in the mikveh and then performed service before nightfall of that day, his service is invalid and he is liable for death at the hand of heaven, as [ibid 21:6] states: "They shall not desecrate the name of their God." According to the Oral Tradition, we learned that this is a warning to a person who [was impure, but] immersed himself that day who performs service [in the Temple], for he is still impure. [This is derived from ibid. 22:7]: "And the sun sets and he will become pure." Implied is that until then, he was not pure. A person whose atonement process was not completed who performs service [in the Temple] is exempt [from punishment] even though his service is invalid and it desecrates [the sacrifice].

5 What is the source that teaches that such service is impure? [With regard to a woman impure due to childbirth, Leviticus 12:8] states: "And the priest shall atone for her and she shall become pure." Implied is that until now, she was not pure. The same applies to all others whose atonement process is not complete.

6 [The following laws apply if] a priest performed service and afterwards, it became known that he was impure. If the source of impurity was known, all of the sacrifices that he offered are invalid, for his work is defiled. If, however, he became impure due to the impurity [likened to] the depths, the forehead plate brings about appeasement and all the sacrifices he offered are accepted. Even if he became aware of the fact that he was impure before the blood was sprinkled on the altar and then he sprinkled the blood, it brings about appeasement. For the forehead plate brings about appeasement for the impurity [likened to] the depths even though he [transgresses] intentionally. We have already explained the impurity [likened to] the depths in Hilchot Nizirut.

7 Similarly, the forehead plate brings atonement if the objects being sacrificed are impure, as [Exodus 28:38] states: "And it shall be on the forehead of Aaron and Aaron will bear the sins of the sacred objects." It does not, however, bring about appeasement if the portions of the sacrifices that are eaten are impure or if the one [offering the sacrifice] is impure when he became impure because of a known source of impurity unless the impurity was superseded by a communal obligation, in which instance the forehead plate generates appeasement for it.

8 The forehead plate does not bring about appeasement unless it is on the High Priest's forehead, as [the above verse] continues: "It will be on his forehead at all times, for appeasement before God."

9 [The offering of] any sacrifice that does not have a set time does not supersede [the observance of] the Sabbath or [the laws of] ritual impurity. [The rationale is that] if it is not sacrificed today, it will be sacrificed tomorrow or afterwards. [The offering of] any sacrifice that does have a set time, whether it be a communal offering or an individual offering, supersedes [the observance of] the Sabbath and [the laws of] ritual impurity. It does not supersede all types of ritual impurity, however, only those stemming from contact with a human corpse.

10 All of the communal sacrifices have a fixed time when they must be offered. Hence [offering them] supersedes [the observance of] the Sabbath and [the laws of] ritual impurity stemming from contact with a human corpse.

11 All of the sacrifices that were brought in a state of ritual impurity are not eaten. Instead, the elements of the sacrifice that are fit to be consumed by fire are offered on the fire [of the altar]. The remaining portions that would [ordinarily] be eaten are burnt in the same manner as are other sacrifices that became impure.

12 What is meant by saying it supersedes [the laws of] ritual impurity? If the time when that sacrifice is to be offered arrives and the majority of the people offering it were impure due to contact with a human corpse, or the people at large were pure, but the priests offering it were impure due to contact with a human corpse, or both of these were pure, but the Temple utensils were impure due to contact with a human corpse, [the sacrifice] should be offered in a state of impurity. Both the impure and the pure should be involved in its offering together and enter the Temple Courtyard.

Those who are impure because of other reasons, zavim, zavot, women in their menstrual state, those after childbirth, those who came in contact with the corpse of a teeming animal or large animal, or the like should not be involved [in the sacrifice] and should not enter the Temple Courtyard even though sacrifices are being offered in a state of impurity. If they transgressed and took part [in the sacrifice] or entered the Temple Courtyard, they are liable for karet for entering [the Courtyard] or death

[at the hand of Heaven] for [carrying out] the service. For only the impurity stemming from contact with a human corpse was superseded [by the obligation to offer these sacrifices].

13 When a Paschal sacrifice is offered in a state of impurity and those who were impure due to contact with a human corpse pressed on and entered the Sanctuary, they are exempt even though they were only permitted to enter the Temple Courtyard. Since the charge [Numbers 5:3]: "Send them beyond the camp" does not apply to them, they are exempt.

14 If a portion of the priests of the clan scheduled to serve in the Temple that day were impure and a portion were pure, even if the majority were impure due to contact with a human corpse, only those who are pure should offer the sacrifices. If all the priests of that clan were impure, the priests of another clan should be brought [to serve]. If all the priests of that watch were impure due to contact with a human corpse, we look for [those of] another watch. If most of the priests who entered Jerusalem at a given time were impure, [the appropriate sacrifice] should be offered in a state of impurity.

15 Why do we search for a priest who is pure from another clan? Because [the prohibition against serving while] impure was not released entirely [in order to offer] the communal [sacrifices]. Instead, the prohibition is still standing, it is merely superseded temporarily, because of the pressing situation. We do not override any prohibitions that may be superseded except in a situation where there is no alternative. For this reason, the forehead plate is required to bring about appeasement.

16 What is the source that teaches that [the prohibitions against] ritual impurity are superseded [to bring] communal [offerings]? [Numbers 9:6] speaks of: "Men who were impure because of a [deceased] human soul." According to the Oral Tradition, it was taught: Particular individuals are deferred to Pesach Sheni if they were impure. If, however, the community at large is impure due to contact with a human corpse, it is not deferred. Instead, [the prohibition against] ritual impurity is superseded and the Paschal sacrifice should be offered in a state of impurity. The same applies to every sacrifice that has a fixed time like the Paschal sacrifice: [the obligation to offer it] supersedes [the prohibition against] ritual impurity.

17 This concept is explicitly stated in Scripture [II Chronicles 30:17-18]: "For a multitude of the congregation had not sanctified themselves and the Levites presided over the slaughter of the Paschal sacrifice for all who were not pure.... For many of the people, many from Ephraim, Menasheh, Issachar, and Zevulon had not purified themselves."

What then is meant by the statement (ibid.): "They partook of the Paschal sacrifice not in accordance with what was written"? Because they made that year a leap year because of ritual impurity, as [ibid.:2-3] states: "And the king, his officers, and all the congregation in Jerusalem had conferred [and decided] to offer the Pesach... in the second month, because they were not able to offer it at its time because there were not enough priests who had sanctified themselves." As we explained already in Hilchot Kiddush HaChodeh, as an initial preference, we do not declare a leap year because of ritual impurity.

18 There was another [difficulty] that year. King Chizkiya made the year a leap year on the thirtieth day of Adar which was fit to be Rosh Chodesh Nissan. Instead, he made it the thirtieth of Adar. The Sages did not agree with him, for a leap year should not be declared on this day, as we explained in [Hilchot] Kiddush HaChodesh.

Because of these two matters which were not done as prescribed by Jewish Law, it was said: "They partook of the Paschal sacrifice not in accordance with what was written."[Chizkiya] entreated for mercy for himself and for the Sages who concurred with his actions, as [ibid.:18] states: "For Yichezkiyahu prayed for them, saying: 'May God Who is good atone for those....' [ibid.:20] states: 'God heeded Yichezkiyahu and healed the people.'[Implied is that] their sacrifice was accepted.

1 It is a positive commandment for a priest who serves [in the Temple] to sanctify his hands and feet and afterwards perform service, as [Exodus 30:19] states: "And Aaron and his sons will wash their hands and their feet from it." A priest who serves without having sanctified his hands and feet in the morning is liable for death at the hand of heaven, as [ibid.:20] states: "They shall wash with water and not die." Their service - whether that of a High Priest or an ordinary priest - is invalid.

2 Which source teaches that his service is invalid? [Ibid.:21] states: "It will be an eternal statute for him and his generations," and with regard to the Priestly garments [ibid. 25:43] also uses the expression: "An eternal statute." Just as [a priest] who is lacking the priestly garments invalidates his service, as we explained, so, too, one who did not wash his hands invalidates his service.

3 A priest does not have to sanctify [himself] between every service [that he performs]. Instead, he consecrates [his hands and feet] once in the morning and may continue serving throughout the day and [the subsequent] night, provided he does not: a) depart from the Temple; b) sleep; c) urinate; or divert his attention [from his hands and feet]. If he does any of the above, he must sanctify his hands and feet again.

4 If a priest departed from the Temple, returned and then performed service without sanctifying [his hands and feet], his service is acceptable if he did not divert his attention. This general principle was followed in the Temple: No person would enter the Temple Courtyard to perform service unless he immersed [in the mikveh] even though he was ritually pure.

5 Anyone who defecates must immerse himself [in a mikveh]. Anyone who urinates must sanctify his hands and feet.

[The following rules apply when] one goes outside the walls of the Temple Courtyard. If he departed [with the intent of] staying outside for an extended time, he must immerse [in a mikveh]. If [his intent] was to return immediately, when he returns, all that is necessary is that he sanctify his hands and feet. If he did not immerse, nor sanctified his hands and feet and carried out [sacrificial] service, his service is acceptable since he did not divert his attention, nor did he defecate or urinate. If he merely placed his hands outside the Temple Courtyard, he is not required to sanctify them again.

6 If [only] a person's hands become ritually impure, he may immerse them and they are ritually pure. He need not sanctify them again.
If his body became impure because he partook of impure foods or drank impure beverages and immersed himself, even though he does not have to wait until nightfall [to become ritually pure], he must sanctify [his hands and feet] after immersing himself, for everyone who immerses himself must sanctify his hands and feet [before] serving. If he did not sanctify [his hands and feet], his service is not desecrated since he did not divert his attention.

7 When a High Priest does not immerse himself nor sanctify his hands and feet between his changes of clothes and between his different services on Yom Kippur and [continues] serving, his service is acceptable. [The rationale is that] since those immersions and sanctifications are not applicable equally to Aaron and his sons, as [Exodus 30:19] states: "And Aaron and his sons will wash from it." Only an obligation that is equally applicable to all the priests is an indispensable obligation, i.e., the first sanctification of one's hands.

8 If a person sanctified his hands on one day, he must sanctify them again on the following day even though he did not sleep at all that night, for the hands are disqualified because of the passage of the night. [Even] if he sanctified his hands at night and offered fats on [the altar's pyre] the entire night, he must go back and sanctify [his hands] on the next day for that day's service.

9 If a priest sanctified his hands and his feet for the removal of the altar's ashes, even though he sanctifies them before sunrise, he does not have to sanctify them again after daybreak, because he sanctified them at the beginning of the day's service.

10 It is a mitzvah to sanctify [one's hands and feet] from the basin. If, however, one sanctifies them from a sacred utensil, the sanctification is effective. Sanctification may not, however, be performed with an ordinary utensil. If one sanctified [his hands and feet] with a sacred utensil outside the Temple or did so with an ordinary utensil within the Temple and then performed service, his service is disqualified. One does not sanctify his hands and feet inside the basin or a sacred utensil, but from them, as [implied by the verse]: "Aaron and his son's will wash from it;" ["from it"] and not "inside of it." If one sanctified [his hands and feet] in such a utensil and performed service, he did not desecrate it.

11 If one immerses his hands and feet in the waters of a mikveh or even a spring, this is not considered as sanctification. One must wash them from a utensil. One may sanctify them using any sacred utensil whether or not it contains a revi'it.

12 All water is acceptable for the sanctification, whether water from a spring or water from a mikveh, provided its appearance has not changed and it is [thus] acceptable for immersion. Mud that can be poured, from which a cow would drink, can be used to fill the measure of the basin. This is the general rule: Any water that can be used to make up the measure of a mikveh can be used to make up the measure of the basin.

13 How much water must there be in the basin? At least enough for four priests to sanctify [their hands and feet] from it, as [indicated by Exodus 30:19 which] mentions "Aaron and his sons." Together with him, there were Elazar, Itamar, and Pinchas, a total of four.

14 The water in the basin is disqualified if left [in it] overnight, as we explained. What would be done [to prevent the water from being disqualified]? The basin would be submerged in a mikveh or a spring and on the following day, it would be raised or it would be filled each day in the morning.

15 The "sea" fashioned by Solomon had the status of a mikveh, because a channel of water from the Spring of Aitem would pass through it. Therefore, its waters were not disqualified with the passage of night like the water of the basin and [indeed,] the basin was filled from it.

One may not sanctify his hands while sitting, because [the sanctification] is comparable to the Temple service and the Temple service may be performed only when standing, as [Deuteronomy 18:5] states: "To stand and to serve."

17 Anyone who performs service while he is seated, desecrates his service and disqualifies it. He does not receive lashes, because the warning against doing so stems from a positive commandment.

Similarly, anyone involved with one of the Temple services must be standing on the floor. If there was anything intervening between himself and the ground, e.g., he was standing on a utensil, an animal, or a colleague's foot, [his service] is invalid. Similarly, if there was anything intervening between his hand and the utensil with which he was performing the service, it is invalid.

18 The Temple service may be performed only with one's right hand. If one performed service with his left hand, it is invalid. He is not liable for lashes.

[The following laws apply when] one of [a priest's] feet are on a utensil and one is on the floor, one is on a stone [that was not embedded in the floor] and one was on the floor. We evaluate [the situation]. Whenever he would be able to stand on his one foot if the utensil or the stone were taken away, his service is acceptable. If not, his service is invalid.

If he received [blood from a sacrifice] with his right hand and his left hand is supporting it, his service is acceptable, because we do not pay attention to [something that is] a [mere] support.

19 When one of the stones of the Temple Courtyard has become loosened, one should not stand upon it during one's Temple service until it is affixed in the ground. If he performed service, his service is acceptable, since it is located in its place.

1 Any priest who has a physical blemish - whether a permanent blemish or a temporary blemish - should not enter the area of the altar and beyond in the Temple, as [Leviticus 21:21-23] states: "[Any man from among the descendants of Aaron the priest who has a blemish...] shall not come near the curtain, nor may he approach the altar. If he transgresses and enters [this area], he is liable for lashes even if he did not perform any service.
If he performs service in the Temple, he invalidates and desecrates his service. He is worthy of lashes for the service as well, as [ibid.:17] states: "One who has a blemish shall not draw near [to offer...]." According to the Oral Tradition, we learned that this warning means that he shall not draw near to the Temple service.

2 Similarly, a person with a temporary blemish who performs service in the Temple invalidates [his service] and is liable for lashes, as [ibid.:18] states: "Any man who has a blemish shall not draw close...." According to the Oral Tradition, we have learned that this is a warning against [a priest] with a temporary blemish [serving]. [A priest] with a blemish who serves is not liable for death, only for lashes.

3 All physical blemishes - whether the priest had them from birth or acquired them afterwards, whether they will heal or they will not heal - disqualify [him] until they heal.

4 A permanent blemish is a broken leg or a broken arm. A temporary blemish is a dry skin eruption or a moist skin eruption also known as a chazizit. Not only the blemishes mentioned in the Torah, but any apparent bodily blemish disqualifies the priests, as [ibid.:21] states: "Any man who has a blemish," i.e., any type. Those mentioned by the Torah are merely examples.

5 There are three types of blemishes [involving humans]:
a) blemishes that disqualify a priest from serving and an animal from being offered [as a sacrifice];
b) blemishes that only prevent a man from serving;
c) blemishes that do not disqualify a priest, but because of the impression that would be created, [our Sages] stated that every priest who has such a blemish should not serve.

6 Whenever [a priest] who has a blemish that disqualifies both a person and animal serves, whether inadvertently or intentionally, his service is invalid. If he served intentionally, he is liable for lashes. Whenever [a priest] who has a blemish that disqualifies only a person serves, even though he is liable for lashes, his service is valid. If he has one of the blemishes that disqualify him because of the impression that could be created, he is not liable for lashes and his service is valid.

7 Only blemishes that are apparent disqualify a person. Blemishes that are within the cavity of the body, e.g., a person's kidney or his spleen was removed or his intestines were perforated, even though he becomes a treifah, his service is acceptable. [This is derived from the mention, Leviticus 21:19, of] "a broken leg or a broken arm." Just as these are apparent, all [disqualifying blemishes] must be apparent.

8 An uncircumcised person is like a foreigner [as Ezekiel 44:9] states: "Any foreigner with an uncircumcised heart and uncircumcised flesh." Therefore if an uncircumcised [priest] serves, he disqualifies his service and is liable for lashes like a non-priest who serves. He is not, however, liable for death.

9 A priest who married women sinfully may not serve until he is compelled by the court to take a vow dependent on the discretion of other people so that it cannot be nullified that he will not continue to sin. He may then perform the service, descend [from the altar], and divorce her. Similarly, if he would become impure due to contact with a human corpse, he is disqualified until he makes a resolution in court not to contract such impurity. If he transgressed and performed service before taking such a vow or making such a resolution, he does not disqualify his service even though he remains married in sin.

10 When a priest performed service and afterwards, his [genealogy] was checked and it was discovered that he was a challal, his previous service is acceptable, but he may not serve in the future. If, however, he does

[continue] to serve, he does not desecrate the service. [This is derived from Deuteronomy 33:11]: "May God bless His legion and find acceptable the work of his hand." [implied is that] He will find acceptable even the desecrated among them.

11 The High Court would sit in the Chamber of Hewn Stone. Their primary ongoing activity was sitting and judging the priests, e.g., examining the lineage of the priests and inspecting their blemishes. Whenever a disqualifying factor was found in the lineage of a priest, he would put on black clothes and wrap himself in black and leave the Temple Courtyard. Whoever is found to be bodily sound and of acceptable lineage puts on white garments and enters and serves with his priestly brethren.

12 [A priest] who is discovered to be of acceptable lineage, but was discovered to have a physical blemish should sit in the Chamber of Wood and [removes] worm-eaten wood for the [Altar's] pyre. He should be included in the division of the sacrifices with the members of his clan and may partake [of the sacrifices], as [Leviticus 21:22] states: "He may partake of the food of his God from [the sacrifices of] the most holy order and of the sacred foods."

1 There are a sum total of 50 physical blemishes that disqualify both humans and animals. In particular, they are:

2 Five involving the ear: a) one whose ear lobe has been blemished to the extent that one's nail would become held back by the blemish. There is, however, no concept of a blemish with regard to the skin which surrounds the lobe of the ear, whether it is perforated, marred, or cracked.

3 b) one whose ear has cracked to the slightest extent even though its substance has not diminished;

c) one whose [ear] lobe has been perforated, [leaving a hole] the size of a carshinah bean. Whether the hole is round or long, if its area is the size of a carshinah bean, it is considered a blemish.

d) one whose ear has dried to the extent that if it was perforated, it would not bleed;

e) one whose ear was double. [This applies] even to a goat kid whose ears are often extended and appear double, provided it has two lobes. If, however, it has only one lobe and it appears like one entity that is double-sized, it is acceptable.

4 There are three involving the eye-lashes:

a) one whose eye-lids are perforated even to the slightest extent;

b) one whose eye-lids are cracked even to the slightest extent;

c) one whose eye-lids are blemished even to the slightest extent.

These three blemishes are included in the term cherutz mentioned in the Torah.

5 There are eight involving the eye:

a) one who is blind, whether in one eye or in both eyes;

b) one who cannot see from both of his eyes or one of them, even though there is no apparent change in them, because he has water continuously descending into his eyes;

c) one who cannot see with both or one of his eyes clearly, because he has continuous nerve deterioration;

d) one who has a mound like a grape in his eye, even though he can still see;

e) one who has cataracts in his eyes which cover some of the pupil of the eye;

f) one who has the white of his eyes extended slightly into the pupil until the pupil is interrupted by the white of the eye. This is the meaning of the term tivlul mentioned in the Torah. If, however, the pupil is extended and enters the white of the eye, it is not considered a blemish, for there are no blemishes in the white of the eye;

g) one who has a white point in the midst of his pupil. This is the meaning of the term dak mentioned in the Torah. [The above applies] provided it appears floating on the pupil. If, however, it is not floating, or if it is submerged in the pupil, it is not a blemish. Similarly, if there was a black mark in the midst of the white, even if it appeared to be floating, it is not considered a blemish, for there are no blemishes in the white. If there was a black mark sunk in the pupil, it is also included in the blemish called dak. If, however, it appears to be floating, since it is black within black, it is not considered as a blemish.

6 There are three involving the nose:

a) One whose nose is perforated, even from only one side;

b) one whose nose is split;

c) one whose nose is blemished.

7 There are six involving the mouth:

a) One whose lip is perforated; this applies even if only one is perforated;

b) one whose lip is blemished;

c) one whose lip is cracked, provided the surface of the lip is split into two sides;

d) one whose lower jawbone extends even the slightest measure further than his upper jawbone;

e) one whose mouth is swollen congenitally, as part of the structure of his body. If, however, it is swollen because of the wind, it is not considered a blemish;

f) one from whom the majority of the free portion of the tongue was removed.

8 There are twelve involving the reproductive organs:

a-d) one whose member is crushed, mashed, severed, or cut off;

e-h) one whose testicles - or testicle - is crushed, mashed, severed, or cut off;

i) one who has only one testicle even though he has two sacs;

j) one whose two testicles are in one sac;

k) a person whose sexual organ is covered by flesh and his gender cannot be determined;

j) a hermaphrodite.

9 There are six involving the hands and the feet:

a) one who limps; b) one whose hip has been displaced. This is the meaning of the term serua used by the Torah;
c) one who has one hip attached at a higher place than the other;
d) one whose arm-bone is broken, provided it is apparent;
e) one whose leg-bone is broken, provided it is apparent. Even if it is not apparent when he stands, if it is apparent when he walks, it is a blemish;
f) one whose legs are swollen congenitally, as part of the structure of his body. If, however, they are swollen because of the wind, it is not considered a blemish.

10 There are four [types of blemishes] that may occur in any place in the body. They are:
a) one who has a dry skin eruption of even the slightest size. This is the meaning of the term gerev mentioned in the Torah;

11 d) Whenever there is a groove made in any bone that is apparent, it is considered a blemish. It is included in the category charutz mentioned in the Torah. The ribs are not considered as bones that are apparent.

12 There are also three other types of blemishes:
a) an elderly man who has reached the stage that he quivers and trembles when he stands;
b) a person who is sick and trembles because of his illness and the weakening of his strength.
A treifah is acceptable among humans, but is disqualified among animals. Similarly, one born through Caesarian section is acceptable among humans, but is disqualified among animals.

13 c) One who is foul-smelling. A priest who has a foul-smelling odor because of sweat may wash and rub perfume on his flesh and serve. If he has a foul odor emanating from his mouth, he may put pepper, ginger, or the like in his mouth and serve. If, however, he serves while his body is foul-smelling due to sweat or he had bad breath, he desecrates his service like one who has any of the other blemishes.

Chapter 8

1 There are a total of 90 physical blemishes that [disqualify] humans alone. In particular, they are: There are eight involving the head:

a) one who has the center of his forehead depressed below as if it was pushed down with one's hand;

b) one who has the center of his forehead raised up above, like an egg;

c) one who has the sides of his head emerge toward his face like a hammer;

d) one whose head projects outward abnormally from his neck;

e) one whose head is abnormally large to the extent that it sits on his neck like a turnip on top of its leaves;

f) one who is bald and has no hair whatsoever on his head. If, however, he has a row of hair extending across the back of his head from ear to ear, it is acceptable.

g) a person's whose hair extends from ear to ear on the front of his head, but he is bald on the remainder of his head, he is unacceptable;

h) a person whose hair extends around his entire head from the front and the back, but he has no hair on the top of his head. He also is deemed bald and is unacceptable.

2 There are two involving the neck. They are:

a) one whose neck is sunk [into his trunk] so much that it appears to be placed on his shoulders;

b) one whose neck is so long that it appears unconnected with his shoulders.

3 There are four involving the ears. They are:

a) one whose two ears are very small;

b) one whose two ears are very swollen like sponges;

c) one whose ears hang down low;

d) one who has one ear differ from another in appearance.

4 There are five involving the eyebrows. They are:

a) one who does not have any hair at all on his eyebrows. This is the meaning of the term gibein mentioned in the Torah;

b) one whose eyebrows hang low;

c) one who has only one eyebrow;

d) one who has more than two eyebrows;

e) one who has one eyebrow that is different in appearance than the other, whether the hair on one is long and on the other, short, or the hair on one is black and, on the other, white or red, since there is a difference in appearance, he is unacceptable.

5 There are four involving the eyelids. They are:

a) one who does not have any hair at all on his eyelids;

b) one who has very thick hair on his eyelids;

c) one who has an eyelid whose hair is different from that of the other eyelid, e.g., one is black and the other white, one is thin and the other is thick;

d) one whose eyelids are closed slightly and do not open wide like those of other people.

6 There are eleven involving the eyes. They are:

a) one whose two eyes are positioned above their appropriate place, close to his forehead;

b) one whose two eyes are positioned below their appropriate place;

c) one whose two eyes are round and are not extended slightly as other eyes are;

d) one whose eyes pop out like the eyes of a tiger and like the eyes of a person who looks at someone when he is very angry;

e) one whose eyes are very large, like those of a calf;

f) one whose eyes are small, like those of a duck;

g) one who is continuously tearing;

h) one who has fluid [continuously] dripping from the tip of his eyes near his nose or the ends of his eyes near his temples;

i) one who contracts his eyelids and squints slightly when he sees light or when he wishes to look at something carefully;

j) a person who is cross-eyed to the extent that he sees two storeys of the same building as one. This defect can be noticed when such a person is speaking with one person and it appears that he is speaking with another;

k) one who has one eye that is different than the other, whether in place, in appearance, e.g., one is black and the other is of mixed color, or one is small and one is large. Since there is a difference between them, he is unacceptable.

7 There are six involving the nose. They are:
a) one whose bridge of the nose is sunken, even [if it is not sunken] to the extent that he can apply ointment to both of his eyes at once. This is the meaning of the term charum mentioned in the Torah;
b) one whose middle of the nose projects upward;
c) one whose tip of the nose points downward;
d) one whose tip of the nose is crooked;
e) one whose nose is disproportionately large;
f) one whose nose is disproportionately small. How is this measured? With one's pinky. If one's nose is larger or smaller than his pinky, it is considered a blemish.

8 There are three involving the lips. They are:
a) one whose upper lip extends beyond his lower lip;
b) one whose lower lip extends beyond his upper lip;
c) one whose mouth [hangs] loosely and [hence,] spittle is continually descending from his mouth.

9 There are three involving the belly. They are:
a) one whose belly is swollen;

b) one whose navel projects outward, rather that being concave like that of other people;

c) one whose breasts are extended and lie on his stomach like the breasts of a woman.

10 There are three involving the back. They are:

a) one whose spine is crooked;

b) one who has a vertebra that slipped out of the spinal column, regardless of whether it projected outward, penetrated inward, or slipped to the side. This is included in the term baal chatoteret;

c) a person with a hunchback. Even though a vertebra has not slipped from its place, this is still considered a blemish.

11 There are six involving the hands. They are:

a) one who has an extra finger on his hands, even if he has six on each hand. If he cuts the extra finger off, he is acceptable. If, however, it had a bone, he is unacceptable, even if he cuts it off;

b) one who is lacking one of the fingers of his hand;

c) one who has two fingers webbed and connected until below the joint. If he cut and separated them to the joint, he is acceptable. Which joint is implied? The first joint that is next to the palm of one's hand;

d) one whose fingers are bent over each other;

e) one who has a projection emerging from his thumb;

f) a left-handed person. If he is ambidextrous, he is acceptable.

12 There are four involving the reproductive organs. They are:

a) one who has a very large and long scrotum that reaches his knees;

b) one whose organ is so long it reaches his knees;

c) one whose membranes surrounding his testicles were crushed;

d) one whose membranes surrounding his testicles are inflated. This is the meaning of the term miruach ashech mentioned in the Torah;

13 There are fifteen involving the thighs and the legs. They are:

a) one who is bow-legged to the extent that even when he stands with his feet together, his knees will not touch each other;

b) one whose ankle-bone projects outward. The ankle bone is the round bone that is above the heel, toward the inside of the body. It resembles the weaving needle with which women weave;

c) one whose heel juts outward to the extent that his shin appears to be in the center of his foot;

d) some whose feet are wide like a duck's even though they are not webbed like a duck's;

e) one who has a projection emerging from his large toe;

f) one who has an extra toe on his feet, even if he has six on each foot. If he cuts the extra toe off, he is acceptable, provided it does not have a bone;

g) one who is lacking one of the toes of his foot;

h) one whose toes are bent over each other;

j) one whose toes are webbed until below the joint. If they were connected and he cut and separated them, he is acceptable;

k) one whose foot is entirely straight; i.e., the width of his forefoot and his toes is the same as the width of his heels, and they appear as one straight unit;

l) one whose foot is curved so that his forefoot and toes and his heel appears as the two ends of a bow;

m) one whose foot is hollow; i.e., his mid-foot is upraised above the earth and it is as if he is standing on his heel and his toes;

n) one whose ankles click with each other when he walks;

o) one whose knees click with each other when he walks;

p) one who is left-footed.

14 There are four that involve the entire body:

a) one whose trunk is disproportionately larger than his limbs;

b) one whose trunk is disproportionately smaller than his limbs;

c) one who is extremely tall;

d) a dwarf, i.e., one who is extremely short, so that they are distinguished from people at large.

15 There are eight involving the skin. They are:

a) a Kushite;

b) an albino whose skin is white like cheese;

c) one who is red-skinned like scarlet;

d) one who has pure blotches on his skin, i.e., [the appearance of] the skin changed because of an internal factor, like a bohak;

e) [the appearance of] the skin changed because of an external factor, like the scarring of a burn; this is also one of the distinguishing marks that are pure [with regard to tzara'at];

f) one who has a facial mole that has hair, even if it is not the size of an isar, but rather of the smallest size;

g) one who has a facial mole the size of an isar or more; h) one afflicted with warts, [when] a person's flesh or skin should distend or the fluids in the skin should distend to any part throughout the body, this is a blemish.

16 There are four other blemishes possible for a human:

a) one who is deaf;

b) one who is intellectually or emotionally unstable;

c) an epileptic, even if his seizures come at far intervals;

d) one who suffers from severe depression, whether on a consistent basis or from time to time.

17 Thus there are a total of 140 blemishes that may disqualify a priest. They are: eight involving the head, two involving the neck, nine involving the ears, five involving the eyebrows, seven involving the eyelids, nineteen involving the eyes, nine involving the nose, nine involving the mouth, three involving the belly, three involving the back, seven involving the hands, sixteen involving the reproductive organs, twenty involving the legs, eight involving the entire body, eight involving the skin, seven involving the body's strength and odor. They have all been outlined one by one.

The following disqualify [a priest] because of the impression they may create:

a) one who has lost the hair of his eyelids even though the roots remain;

b) one whose teeth have been removed.

Chapter 9

1 When a non-priest serves in the Temple, his service is invalid and he is liable for death at the hand of heaven, as [Numbers 18:7] states: "A non-priest who draws close will die." According to the Oral Tradition, we have learned that one does not become liable unless he draws close to perform service. Where is the warning concerning this? [Ibid.:4] states: "A non-priest shall not draw close to you."

What is meant by a non-priest? Anyone who is not a male descendant of Aaron, as [Leviticus 1:8] states: "And the sons of Aaron shall arrange" and [Leviticus 3:8] states: "And the sons of Aaron shall set afire." [These service are performed by] "the sons of Aaron" and not the daughters of Aaron.

2 Although non-priests are warned not to perform any of the services associated with offering sacrifices, they are liable for death [at the hand of Heaven] only for performing "complete service," not on service that is followed by other service. [Thus] a non-priest is liable for death only for four services: a) sprinkling; b) setting afire [sacrifices on the altar]; c) pouring water [on the altar] on Sukkot, and d) pouring wine on the altar at all times.

3 How is one liable for sprinkling? Whether he dashed [blood] inside [the Temple building] or outside, [in the Temple Courtyard], performed one of the sprinklings of blood or performed one of the sprinklings of the sacrifices brought by a person afflicted with tzara'at, he is liable for death.

4 How is one liable for setting afire [sacrifices on the altar]? Whether he set afire limbs [of animal sacrifices], a handful of flour, or of frankincense on the altar - or even if he turned over limbs that had not been consumed by fire and hastened their being burnt, he is liable for death, provided he set afire an olive-sized portion of these entities. Similarly, if one sets afire incense on the golden altar, when he sets afire an olive-sized portion, he is liable. In contrast, one who sets fire to incense on Yom Kippur in the Holy of Holies is not liable for death for this until he sets fire to a handful, for that is the measure explicitly [required] by the Torah.

5 [A non-priest] who arranges two logs of wood on the altar's pyre is considered comparable to one who set [sacrificial] limbs afire and he is liable for death [at the hand of heaven for doing so]. For the wood is also considered as a sacrifice.

In contrast, [a non-priest] who pours [oil onto the flour offerings], one who mixes [the flour offerings with oil], one who breaks [the wafers of meal offerings] into pieces, one who salts [the sacrifices], one who waves [the sacrifices], one who brings [a meal offering] close to the altar, one who arranges the showbread or the bowls of incense on the [golden] table, one who prepares the lamps [of the Menorah], one who kindles light on the altar, one who takes a fistful [of flour or incense], and one who receives the blood [of a sacrifice], even though he disqualifies his service, he is warned against doing so and is liable for lashes for doing so, he is not liable for death at the hand [of Heaven]. [The rationale is that] all of these services are followed by another service and they do not represent the completion of the offering [of a given sacrifice].

6 The slaughter of sacrificial animals is acceptable if performed by non-priests. [This applies even to] sacrifices of the most holy order, both individual sacrifices and communal sacrifices, as [Leviticus 1:5] states: "And he shall slaughter the bull before God and the sons of Aaron shall offer it." Implied is that from receiving [the blood], the mitzvah belongs to the priesthood. Similarly, skinning an animal, cutting it up, and bringing wood to the altar are acceptable when performed by non-priests, for with regard to the limbs, [ibid.:9] states: "And the priest shall set afire everything on the altar," this refers to bringing limbs [from sacrificial animals] to the [altar's] ramp. [We may infer that] bringing such limbs requires a priest, but not bringing wood.

7 Similarly, the kindling of the lamps [of the Menorah] is acceptable if performed by a non-priest. Therefore, if a priest cleaned the lamps and brought them outside, a non-priest is permitted to kindle them.

8 The removal of the ashes [from the altar] must be performed by a priest, as [Leviticus 6:3] states: "And the priest will put on his linen fit tunic...." If an Israelite removes [the ash], he is liable for lashes.

He is not liable for death [at the hand of Heaven] even though this is a service that is not followed by another service. [This is derived as follows. The verse that speaks of the punishment of death at the hand of Heaven, Numbers 18:7,] speaks of "work of giving." [Implied is that] the work of giving must be performed by a priest alone. If a non-priest offered [a sacrifice], he is liable for death. The service of removal does not make a non-priest liable for death. Similarly, if a non-priest cleaned the inner altar or the Menorah, he is not liable for death.

9 [If a non-priest] arranged the wood on the altar, the arrangement should be taken apart and rearranged by a priest, because the [initial] arrangement is unacceptable.

10 An impure [priest], one with a disqualifying physical blemish, and one who did not wash his hands or feet are not liable except for services that a non-priest is liable for death. For other services, he [violates merely] a warning.

11 A priest who immersed that day who is lacking atonement, who became impure, who did not wash his hands and feet and yet served [in the Temple] is liable for each transgression. If he was a non-priest, he is liable for lashes only for serving as a non-priest.

12 When a non-priest performs [Temple] service on the Sabbath, he is liable for violating the Sabbath laws and for serving as a non-priest. Similarly, when a priest with a physical blemish serves while ritually impure, he is liable [both] for [serving] while impure and for serving with a blemish.

13 Any priest who served a false deity, whether willingly or inadvertently - even if he repented completely - may never serve in the Temple, as [Ezekiel 44:13] states: "They shall not draw near to Me, to serve Me." [This prohibition applies] whether [a priest] serves the false deity in its rites, e.g., he became a priest to the false deity, he bowed down to it, or acknowledged its [divinity] and accepted it as god. [In all these instances,]

he is disqualified [to serve in the Temple] forever.

If [such a priest] transgressed and performed service, his sacrifice is not considered as a pleasing fragrance even if he acted inadvertently when he served, bowed down to, or acknowledged [the false deity]. If, by contrast, one slaughtered an animal for a false deity inadvertently and then transgressed and offered a sacrifice [in the Temple], the sacrifice is considered a pleasing fragrance and is accepted, for he did not perform service for the false deity or become its priest; all he did was slaughter an animal for it and that was performed inadvertently. Nevertheless, as an initial preference, he should not perform service [in the Temple].

14 If one transgressed and built a shrine outside the Temple and offered a sacrifice to God there, it is not considered as a Temple to a false deity. Nevertheless, any priest who serves in such a shrine should never serve in the Temple. Similarly, utensils that were used there should never be used in the Temple. Instead, they should be entombed. It appears to me that if a priest who served in such [a shrine] performs service in the Temple, it does not invalidate it.

15 Thus there are eighteen factors that disqualify [a person] from serving [in the Temple]. They are: a) one who served a false deity; b) a non-priest; c) one with a disqualifying physical blemish; d) one who is uncircumcised; e) one who is impure; f) one who immersed that day [and must wait until nightfall to become pure]; g) one who is lacking atonement; h) one who is in a state of acute mourning; i) one who is intoxicated; j) one who is lacking the priestly garments; k) one who is wearing extra garments; l) one whose garments were torn; m) one whose hair has grown long; n) one who did not wash his hands and feet; o) one who sits; p) one who had an entity intervening between his hand and the sacred utensil [he is using]; q) one who had an entity intervening between his foot and the earth; r) one who served with his left hand.

All of the above are disqualified from serving and if they serve, they invalidate their service with the exception of those with long hair, those with torn garments, and one who slaughtered for a false deity inadvertently. If these individuals serve, their service is acceptable.

Mishneh Torah, Things Forbidden on the Altar

1 It is a positive commandment for all the sacrifices to be unblemished and of choice quality, as [Leviticus 22:21] states: "unblemished to arouse favor." This is a positive commandment.

2 [Conversely,] anyone who consecrates a blemished animal for the altar violates a negative commandment and is liable for lashes for consecrating it, as [ibid.:20] states: "Whatever has a blemish should not be sacrificed." According to the Oral Tradition, we learned that this is a warning against consecrating a blemished animal. Even one who consecrates such an animal for the money to pay for libations is liable for lashes, for this represents a disgrace to the sacrifices.

3 [When a person consecrates an animal and] intends to say [that it is consecrated as] a peace offering, but actually says "as a burnt offering," or [intended to consecrate it] as a burnt offering, but said, "a peace offering," his statements are of no consequence unless his mouth and his heart are identical. Therefore if one intended to consecrate a blemished animal as a burnt offering, but consecrated it as peace offering or intended to consecrate it as a peace offering, but consecrated it as burnt offering, he is not liable for lashes even though he intended to perform a transgression.

If someone thought that it was permitted to consecrate a blemished animal for the altar and did so, the consecration is effective and he is not liable for lashes.

4 One who slaughters a blemished animal for the sake of a sacrifice is liable for lashes, for [ibid.:22] states: "Do not offer these to God." According to the Oral Tradition, we learned that this is a warning to one who slaughters.

Similarly, one who pours the blood of blemished animals on the altar is liable for lashes, for, with regard to them, [ibid.:24] states: "Do not offer to God." According to the Oral Tradition, we learned that this is a warning to one who pours the blood of blemished animals on the altar.

And also one who sets afire the selected portions of blemished sacrifices on the altar is liable for lashes, for, with regard to them, [ibid.:22] states: "Do not place them as a fire offering on the altar." This refers to the fats. Thus we can deduce that one who consecrates a blemished animal, slaughtered it, poured its blood [on the altar], and set afire its selected portions is worthy of four sets of lashes.

5 One transgresses the above commandments whether the animal has a permanent blemish or a temporary blemish, he violates all of these commandments, as [Deuteronomy 17:1] states: "Do not sacrifice to God your Lord an ox or a sheep that has a blemish." According to the Oral Tradition, we learned that this is a warning [against offering] an animal with a temporary blemish, for example, an animal had a moist skin eruption or a boil. If he sacrificed, it, he is liable for lashes.

6 [The above applies], not only to sacrifices of the Jewish people, but also to the sacrifices brought by gentiles. If [a priest] offered [such sacrifices] and the animals were blemished, he is liable for lashes, as [Leviticus 22:25] states: "From the hands of foreigners, you may not offer the food of your God from all of these."

7 One who brings about a blemish in a sacrificial animal, e.g., he blinded its eye or cut off its hand, is liable for lashes. For with regard to a sacrifice, [Leviticus 22:21] states: "It shall not have any blemish." According to the Oral Tradition, we learned that this is a warning not to cause a blemish." Lashes are given [for the violation of this prohibition] only when the Temple was standing, for then [the animal] was fit to be offered as a sacrifice and [the person] disqualified it. In the present age, by contrast, even though one transgressed a negative commandment, he is not liable for lashes.

8 If a person brought about a blemish in a sacrificial animal and another person came and brought about a second blemish, the second person is not liable for lashes.

9 [This prohibition applies] both with regard to one who causes a blemish in sacrificial animals themselves or in animals to which their holiness was transferred with the exception of a firstborn or a tithed animal. In those instances, one who causes a blemish in an animal to which their holiness was transferred is not liable for lashes, for they are not fit to be sacrificed, as will be explained in the appropriate place. Similarly, one who causes a blemish in the ninth animal which was mistakenly called the tenth, is not liable for lashes.

10 Although one who consecrates a blemished animal [for the sacrifices of] the altar is liable for lashes, [the animal] becomes consecrated. It must be redeemed [after] evaluation by a priest. It then reverts to the status of an ordinary [animal] and its money should be used to purchase [an animal for the same type of] sacrifice. This law also applies when a consecrated animal contracts a disqualifying blemish.

It is a positive commandment to redeem sacrificial animals that contracted disqualifying blemishes and cause them to revert to the status of an ordinary animal so that one may partake of them, as [Deuteronomy 12:15] states: "Nevertheless, whenever your heart desires, you may slaughter and partake of meat." According to the Oral Tradition, we learned that the verse is speaking about consecrated animals that must be redeemed. We already explained in [Hilchot] Arachin that [Leviticus 27:11] states: "With regard to any impure animal of which a sacrifice should not be brought as an offering to God, [you shall have the animal stand before the priest...]", is speaking about blemished animals that have been redeemed.

11 What are the differences between [the laws pertaining to an animal] with a permanent blemish and one with a temporary blemish? If an animal with a permanent blemish gives birth while it is consecrated, the offspring must be redeemed; it then receives the status of an ordinary animal even if it is unblemished. [The rationale is that] a secondary entity should not be treated with greater severity than the primary entity. If it became pregnant before it was redeemed and it gave birth after it was redeemed, the offspring has the status of an ordinary animal. If [the consecrated animal that was blemished] died before it was redeemed, it should be redeemed after it died. [The rationale is that] holiness never encompassed its actual body, only its worth, because it had a permanent blemish.

If, by contrast, one consecrates an animal that possesses a temporary blemish or he consecrates an unblemished animal and after he consecrated it, it contracted a permanent blemish [different laws apply]. If it died before it was redeemed, it should be buried like other unblemished consecrated animals, because it must be stood before the court and evaluated, as we explained in [Hilchot] Arachin. If it was slaughtered before it was redeemed, it may be redeemed as long as it is making convulsive motions. Afterwards, one may partake of it. If it gave birth, its offspring may be sacrificed. If it became pregnant before it was redeemed and it gave birth before it was redeemed, the offspring is forbidden. It may not be redeemed. What should be done? Before the mother is redeemed, the offspring should be dedicated to the same [type of] sacrifice as its mother, because it may not be offered because of [the sanctification of] its mother, because its [holiness] comes from sanctification that was suspended.

12 Whenever a consecrated animal that was disqualified is redeemed, it may be slaughtered in a butchers' market and sold there, [after] being weighed with a scale like ordinary meat. [The only] exceptions are the firstborn animals and the tithes.

[The rationale for the distinction is that] selling the animal in the market causes its price to rise. Therefore other sacrifices whose value remains consecrated - for they are sold and the proceeds of the sale are used to bring another animal as a sacrifice - it should be sold in the market like an ordinary animal. In contrast, with regard to a first born animal and a tithed animal - since the proceeds of their sale do not remain consecrated, instead, the animals may be eaten [as ordinary meat,] because of the blemish, as will be explained - they may not be slaughtered in a butchers' market or sold there. Even if [the value of] the firstborn animal was consecrated, it should not be weighed on a scale and sold in a market. [The rationale is that] one may consecrate only an article that he has acquired in a complete and total manner.

1 There are a total of 50 blemishes that disqualify both a man and an animal. They have already been listed.

2 There are other blemishes that are unique to animals and are not appropriate to be found in humans at all. There are 23 of these; they are: a) the animal's eyeball's are round like humans; b) one eye is large like a calf's and the other is small like a duck's; if, however, one ear is large and one ear is small, even if it is small as a bean, it is acceptable; c) if there is an eruption in the white of the eye that has a hair growing from it; d) if the cartilage between its two nostrils was perforated in a place which can be seen; e) its mouth resembles that of a swine; i.e., its upper jaw overlapped its lower jaw, even though it is not pointed like a spit.

3 f) If its outer tonsils were perforated; g) their substance was reduced, even though a portion of them remained; h) they shriveled; i) its inner tonsils were removed; [this is considered a blemish], because when it opens its mouths and shriek, it will be seen that they are missing.

4 j) If its horns and their inner fibrous tissue was removed and nothing of it remained; a female animal that has horns is acceptable; k) if the substance of the skin which covers the male organ of an animal was blemished; l) if the substance of the female organ of an animal was blemished; m) if the substance of the tail is blemished from its bone; [if its substance is blemished] from its joint, it is not [a blemish]; n) if the tip of the tail was split into two with two separate bones; o) if there was a finger's breadth of flesh between every joint on the tail; p) if the tail was [overly] short.
To what extent? For a kid, one vertebra is a blemish, but two are not. For a lamb, a length of two vertebrae is a blemish, but three is acceptable. q) if the tail of a kid was soft and hanging loosely like that of a pig; r) if one of the tail bones was broken. If, however, one of the ribs are broken, it is acceptable, because [the blemish] is not visible.

5 A five-legged animal; t) a three-legged animal; u) the hooves of one of its hindlegs or forelegs was round like that of a donkey even if has split hooves; v) if the hooves of one of its hindlegs or forelegs was not split like that of a donkey. This is the meaning of the term kalut mentioned in the Torah; w) if its hoofs and the fibrous substance inside has shriveled, even though there remains some of that fibrous substance next to the flesh,

6 All of the 73 blemishes listed disqualify an animal from being offered as a sacrifice. If an animal that is consecrated contracts one of these blemishes, it should be redeemed and it becomes like an ordinary animal with the exception of an animal that is old, sick, or foul-smelling. Although such animals are unfit for sacrifice, they may not be redeemed. Instead, they should be maintained until they contract another permanent blemish. Then it should be redeemed. Similarly, a consecrated animal that contracts a temporary blemish should neither be redeemed, nor sacrificed.

7 There are four temporary blemishes [that disqualify] both a man and an animal: a) a moist skin eruption; b) a boil that does not resemble those of Egypt; c) water that descends in the eyes that is not a permanent condition; d) a degeneration of nerves in the eye that is not permanent.

8 The are four other ailments that if found in an animal [prevent] it from being sacrificed. [The rationale is that such an animal] is not from the "choice," and Scripture [Deuteronomy 12:11] states [that sacrifices must come] "from the chosen of your vows."

They are: a) an animal with an eruption in the white of its eye, but it does not have hair growing from it; b) the substance of the horns of an animal was reduced, but their inner fibrous tissue remained; c) the substance of its inner tonsils were reduced; or d) its inner tonsils shriveled.

If a consecrated animal had one of these blemishes, it is neither sacrificed not redeemed. Instead, it should be allowed to pasture until it contracts a [disqualifying] blemish. If it was sacrificed, it appears to me that it is acceptable.

9 Similarly, when a transgression was performed with a consecrated animal or it killed a person, but [was observed] only by one witness or by the owner, it is neither sacrificed not redeemed until it contracts a permanent blemish.

10 When an animal contracts one of the conditions that render it treifah and cause it to be forbidden to be eaten, it is forbidden [to be sacrificed on] the altar. For behold it is written [Malachi 1:8]: "Present it please to your governor. Would he be pleased with you or show you favor?" Although it is not fit to be sacrificed, it is not redeemed. [The rationale is that] we do not redeem sacrificial animals to feed [their meat] to the dogs. Instead, it should pasture until it dies and then be buried.

11 If it was slaughtered and discovered to be tereifah, it should be taken out to the place of burning. [This law also applies] if it is discovered that one of its internal organs is lacking even if this does not cause it to be deemed a tereifah, for example, it has [only] one kidney or its spleen has been removed. Such [an animal] is forbidden [to be offered] on the altar and must be burnt. [The rationale is] not because it is blemished, because an internal flaw is not considered as a disqualifying blemish. Instead, the rationale is that an animal that is lacking [an organ] should never be offered [as a sacrifice], as [Numbers 28:31] states: "They shall be perfect for you." [An animal] with an extra [organ] is considered as if it was lacking one. Therefore if three kidneys or two spleens are found in [an animal], it is unacceptable.

12 What is meant by a permanent degeneration of nerves in the eye? An animal which [was observed] for eighty days and it did not see. We inspect it three times: on the twenty-seventh day from the time when its difficulty was sensed, on the fifty-fourth day, and on the eightieth day. If its sight [returned and then was lost again], we count from the time it stopped seeing.

13 How is it known that the water [in its eyes] are permanent? When it ate fresh grass from Rosh Chodesh Adar until the first half of Nisan and then ate dried grass during Elul and the first half of Tishrei and was not healed. This indicates that the water is permanent.

14 How much of the fresh grass must be eaten in the season for fresh grass and the dried grass in the season for dried grass? At least an amount the size of a fig before its first meal in these three months. They must be eaten each day after drinking and it must be free [to roam] in the field while eating. It should not be alone, but with another animal for company. If all of this was done for it and it still was not healed, the water is definitely permanent. If one of these factors was lacking, there is a doubt concerning the matter and [the animal] should be neither offered, nor redeemed.

15 What is implied? It ate fresh grass as prescribed throughout Adar and during the first half of Nisan. Then it ate dried grass as prescribed during the second half of Nisan and the month of Iyar thus it ate the grasses for three months in the proper order. Or it ate a fig-sized amount of grass after eating or before drinking, or it was tied, alone, or located in a garden near a city. If it was not healed after all these treatments, there is an unresolved doubt whether [the blemish is considered] as permanent or temporary. Hence, if one blemished it in another manner, he is not liable for lashes. If it partook [of the grasses] in the prescribed manner during the prescribed times for eating and it was not healed, it is considered as permanently blemished.

16 There is an unresolved doubt whether it is considered as permanently blemished from the time it contracted the condition or from the time they despaired of its recovery. Therefore if someone redeems it before they despaired of its recovery and then derived benefit from the object used to redeem the animal after they despaired of its recovery, there is an unresolved doubt whether he derived unauthorized benefit from consecrated animals. Therefore he does not bring a sacrifice to atone for this transgression, as will be explained in the appropriate place.

1 Blemishes do not disqualify a fowl [as a sacrifice]. This applies both with regard to a male and to a female in the instance of a fowl, for the expression [Leviticus 22:18] "a perfect male" was stated only with regard to an animal.

When does the above apply? With regard to small blemishes. Nevertheless, if the wing of a fowl became dried out, its eye was lost, or its foot was cut off, it is forbidden to [be offered on] the altar, for an animal that is lacking a limb is never offered. Similarly, if it incurred one of the factors that cause it to be deemed tereifah and forbidden to be eaten, it is disqualified as a sacrifice.

2 Small turtle-doves and large ordinary doves are unacceptable as [can be inferred from Leviticus 1:14]: "from the turtle doves and the children of the doves." When it begins to sprout yellow feathers, it is unacceptable for both species.

Until when are young ordinary doves acceptable? As long as when one pulls out [a feather from] the wing, the place from which it was pulled out will fill with blood. Turtledoves are acceptable when [their feathers all] are of a golden hue.

3 Although there are no blemishes greater than that of a tumtum or an androgynus, they are not acceptable for the altar for another reason. Since there is an unresolved doubt whether they are males or females, they are considered of another type, and with regard to the sacrifices, it is said: "a perfect male" and "a perfect female." [Implied is that] they must be definitely male or definitely female. Therefore even a fowl which is a tumtum or an androgynus is unacceptable for the altar.

4 Similarly, a hybrid animal, one born through Caesarian section, and one that is lacking in age are unacceptable even if they are unblemished. [These are all excluded through the exegesis of Leviticus 22:27]: "An ox, a lamb, and a goat..." - [this implies] each of the species must be separate; an animal should not be a hybrid between a lamb and a goat. "When it gives birth..." - this excludes one born through Caesarian section. "It will be seven days..." - This excludes one that it is lacking in age. "Together with its mother" - This excludes an "orphan," i.e., an animal born after its mother was slaughtered.

5 An animal which looks like a different species is unacceptable [as a sacrifice] for the altar even though it is not a hybrid. What is implied? A ewe gave birth to an animal that resembled a goat or a she-goat gave birth to an animal that resembled a lamb. Even though it has some of the signs of its own species, it is unacceptable like an animal that has a permanent blemish. For there is no blemish greater than a change [in appearance].

6 Similarly, an animal that had relations with a person, which was sodomized, which was set aside for pagan worship, or which was worshipped, even though it is permitted to be eaten, is unacceptable as a sacrifice for the altar. [This is derived as follows: When describing animals unfit for sacrifices, Leviticus 22:25] states: "For their perversion is in them." [Implied is that] any [animal] characterized by perversion is forbidden. With regard to forbidden [sexual behavior, Genesis 6:12] states: "For all flesh has perverted [its path]." With regard to pagan worship, [Exodus 32:7] states: "For your nation has perverted itself." Similarly, an animal or fowl which killed a person are considered equivalent to one that had relations with a person or which was sodomized and they are unacceptable for the altar.

7 It appears to me that even though all of these types of animals are unfit to be brought as a sacrifice, if one transgressed and offered them as a sacrifice, he is not worthy of lashes according to Scriptural Law, because the prohibition [against using these animals as sacrifices] is not explicitly stated in the Torah. An animal given as a present to a harlot or exchanged for a dog are forbidden [as sacrifices] for the altar. One who offers a sacrifice from either of them or from both together is liable for one set of lashes, as [Deuteronomy 23:19] states: "Do not bring a present to a harlot or the exchange of a dog [to the house of God]." Why is one liable for only one set of lashes for them both? Because they are both mentioned in one prohibition.

8 It is a positive commandment to offer all of the sacrifices from the eighth day [of their lives] and onward, as [Leviticus 22:27] states: "It will be together with its mother for seven days and on the eighth day and onward, it will be desirable." Throughout these seven days, it is called lacking in age.

Although an animal that is lacking in age is unacceptable as a sacrifice, if one transgressed and offered one, he is not liable for lashes, because the negative commandment comes as a result of a positive commandment. The sacrifice, [however,] is not acceptable.

9 Turtle-doves that have not reached the stage of development when they are fit for sacrifice and young doves that matured beyond the appropriate stage are all considered as blemished [animals]. One who offers them is not liable for lashes, even though the sacrifice is invalid and is not acceptable.

10 One who consecrates an animal which is a tumtum, androgynus, tereifah, a hybrid, or born through Caesarian section to the altar is like one who consecrated stones or wood, for the holiness does not take effect with regard to its physical substance. It is considered as ordinary property in all contexts. It should be sold and the proceeds of the sale used to purchase any sacrifice one desires. It is not considered like a blemished animal, for a sacrifice may be brought from the species of a blemished animal.

When, by contrast, one consecrates an animal that had relations with a person, which was sodomized, which was set aside for pagan worship, which was worshipped, which was given to a harlot, or which was exchanged for a dog, it is considered as if he consecrated an animal with a temporary blemish. They should be left to pasture until they contract a permanent blemish for which they could be redeemed. Similarly, one who consecrates an animal that is lacking in age is considered as one who consecrates an animal with a temporary blemish. Nevertheless, he is not liable for lashes, as we explained.

11 Thus there are fourteen types of animals that are forbidden [as sacrifices] for the altar: a blemished animal, one that is not choice, one that is lacking an internal organ, a tereifah, a hybrid, one born from Caesarian section, one that had relations with a person, one that was sodomized, one that killed a person, one that was worshipped, one set aside for pagan worship, one given to a harlot as her fee, one exchanged for a dog, one which is lacking in age.

12 All of the animals which are forbidden [as sacrifices] for the altar are forbidden regardless of the proportion in which they are intermingled. Even if one of them becomes mixed together with ten thousand, they are all disqualified and unacceptable for the altar.

In all instances, the offspring [of these unacceptable animals] are acceptable [as sacrifices] for the altar, with the exception of the offspring of an animal that was sodomized, worshipped, set aside for worship, or which killed a person. The offspring of these animals are forbidden for the altar as they are.

13 When does the above apply? When the transgression was performed with it or it killed the person while it was pregnant, in which instance, the offspring was together with it when it became disqualified and was considered as one of its limbs. If, however, it became pregnant after the transgression was performed with it or it killed the person, its offspring is acceptable for the altar. Even if an animal was sodomized while it was consecrated and then it became pregnant, [the offspring is acceptable]. Needless to say, the offspring is acceptable if [the mother] was sodomized while it was of ordinary status and then it was consecrated and became pregnant. Similarly, a chick born from an egg from a tereifah is acceptable [as a sacrifice] for the altar.

14 When a person bows down to standing grain, its kernels are permitted to be used for meal offerings, for their [form] has changed. They resemble the offspring of animals forbidden [as sacrifices] for the altar. Similarly, an animal that was fattened with vetch from a false deity is permitted [as a sacrifice] for the altar, for the [form of the vetch] has changed.

15 [Animals for] any of the sacrifices may be purchased from gentiles. We do not suspect that [the animal] had relations with a person, had been sodomized, set aside for pagan worship, or worshipped unless it is known that it was disqualified. [Support for this concept can be brought from I Samuel 15:16:] "From the Amalekites, they were brought, for the people had mercy on the prime quality sheep and cattle, to sacrifice [them] to God your Lord."

1 An animal or a fowl that was sodomized, which killed a person, which was set aside for pagan worship, or which was worshipped, are all unacceptable [as sacrifices] for the altar.

2 When an animal or a fowl had relations with a person, was sodomized, or killed a person, it should be executed by stoning if [the act was observed] by two witnesses. It is forbidden to benefit from their flesh. Needless to say, such animals are forbidden [as sacrifices] for the altar.

With regard to which situations was it said that they are forbidden [as sacrifices] for the altar? When [the animals] were permitted to ordinary individuals, e.g., there was only one witness [who observed the transgression] and the owner remained silent or the owner testified [concerning the transgression] although no witnesses were present. If there was one witness who observed the transgression and the owner contradicts him, the animals are permitted, even [as sacrifices] for the altar.

3 When sport was made with an animal and it was trained to gore until it killed a person, it is acceptable [as a sacrifice] for the altar, because it is considered as having been compelled against its will.

An animal is not disqualified because it had relations with a person or because it was sodomized unless the male who sodomized it was nine years old. Whether it was sodomized by a Jew, a gentile, or a servant, since it was sodomized by a human, it is disqualified. If a human was the recipient of sex from an animal, [the animal] is not disqualified unless the female with whom it had relations was three years old or the male with whom it had relations was nine years old.

4 When is an animal or a fowl disqualified because it was set aside for pagan worship? When the priests perform a deed with it, e.g., they shear it or work with it for the sake of pagan worship. With words alone, by contrast, it is not considered as set aside for pagan worship, for an entity cannot be consecrated to a false deity.

5 An animal that had relations with a person or that was sodomized becomes forbidden [as a sacrifice] for the altar whether it belongs to the person with whom it shared relations or it belongs to a colleague and regardless of whether those relations were carried out under compulsion or voluntarily, whether they were willful or inadvertent, or whether they were performed before [the animal was] consecrated or afterwards.

When, by contrast, an animal is set aside for pagan worship, it becomes disqualified if it belonged to the person who set it aside and he set it aside for pagan worship before he consecrated it as a sacrifice. If, however, one set aside an animal belonging to a colleague or [even] his own animal after he consecrated it as a sacrifice, it is permitted [to be offered as a sacrifice]. [The rationale is that] a person cannot set aside an entity that does not belong to him [for pagan worship].

6 [When an animal] has been worshipped as a false deity, it is forbidden [as a sacrifice] whether one served his own animal or one belonging to a colleague, whether he acted under compulsion or voluntarily, willfullly or inadvertently, whether he did so before the animal was consecrated or afterwards. [In the latter instance,] it should be left to pasture until it becomes permanently blemished and then it should be redeemed, as we stated.

When an animal is worshipped, it and everything upon it are forbidden [as sacrifices] for the altar. For it is forbidden to benefit from all coverings of entities worshipped as false deities. If, however, [an animal has merely been] set aside for pagan worship, it is forbidden, but the entities on it are permitted [as sacrifices for the altar].

7 When a person bows down to a mountain, although he may benefit from it, its stones are forbidden to [be used as part of] the altar. Similarly, when one bows down to a flowing stream in his land, its water is invalid for use as a libation.

[Even though] an asherah has been nullified, one should not bring logs from it for the arrangement of wood on the altar. Similarly, when one bows down to an animal, just as it is disqualified [as a sacrifice] for the altar, its wool is disqualified for use in the priestly garments, its horns are disqualified for use as trumpets, its thighs are disqualified for use as flutes, and its intestines as strands [for the lyres]. Everything is unacceptable.

8 Anything that is connected with the name of a false deity should not be employed in the service of the Sanctuary even though it is permitted to benefit from it.

What is meant by a present given to a harlot? When one tells a harlot, "This entity is given to you as your wages." This applies to a gentile harlot, a maidservant, a Jewish woman who is forbidden to the man as an ervah or by a negative commandment. If, however, a woman is unmarried, the present given to her may be used [as a sacrifice] even if the man is a priest. Similarly, if a person's wife is a niddah, a present given to her may be used [as a sacrifice] even though she is an ervah.

9 If a man married one of the women forbidden to him because of a negative commandment, whatever he gives her for the sake of intimate relations is considered as "the present [of a harlot]" and is forbidden [to be offered as a sacrifice]. A present given [by a male to] a male [for the purpose of intimacy] is forbidden [as a sacrifice]. If a woman gives a present to a male for the purpose of intimacy, [it is not considered] "a present [of a harlot]" and is permitted [as a sacrifice].

10 When a person tells a colleague: "Here is an article for you. In return for it, have your [Canaanite] maidservant spend the night with my Jewish bondsman," it is considered "a present [of a harlot]." [The above applies] provided [the Jewish bondsman] does not have a wife and children. If, however, he does have a wife and children, he is permitted [to engage in intimacy] with a Canaanite maidservant, as will be explained. This also applies if one tells a harlot: "Here is an article for you. In return for it, engage in relations with so-and-so who is Jewish." [The present is considered as] "a present [of a harlot]."

11 If a person made an agreement to give a harlot one lamb and [instead,] he gave her many - even if he gave her 1000 - they are considered as "presents [to a harlot]" and are all forbidden [as sacrifices] for the altar.

If he gave her a present and did not engage in relations with her, but told her: "Let this be in your possession until I engage in relations with you," it becomes forbidden [as a sacrifice] when he engages in relations with her. If she had it sacrificed before he engaged in relations with her, it is acceptable and if she was obligated to bring a sacrifice, she has discharged her obligation, provided when he gave it to he told her: "When you accept my [proposition], you acquire it from the present time." If he did not tell her so, [it is not acceptable] because she cannot bring an article that does not belong to her as a sacrifice.

12 If she took the initiative and consecrated it [for a sacrifice] before he entered relations with her and afterwards, he engaged in relations with her [before it was sacrificed], there is an unresolved doubt whether it is considered "the present [of a harlot"] - because he engaged in relations with her before it was sacrificed - or whether it is not considered as such, since she consecrated it before relations. Hence, it should not be sacrificed, but if it is sacrificed, it is acceptable.

13 If he engaged in relations with her, but did not give her anything, and then afterwards - even many years afterwards - he gave it to her, it is considered "the present [of a harlot"].

When does the above apply? With regard to a gentile woman whom he told: "Engage in relations with me in exchange for this lamb," for she does not have to draw it into her domain [to acquire it] or with regard to a Jewish woman when the lamb was left in her courtyard and he told her: "If I do not give you money on this day, [the lamb] is yours." If, however, he told her : "Engage in relations with me in exchange for this lamb" without any further explanation and then engaged in relations and sent her the lamb afterwards, it is permissible [to be sacrificed; it is not considered] "the present [of a harlot]."

14 Only the actual physical substance of [the article given] is forbidden as "the present [of a harlot]" or "the exchange [for a dog]." Therefore [these prohibitions] apply only to articles that are [in essence] fit to be sacrificed on the altar, e.g., a kosher animal, turtle doves, small doves, wine, oil, and fine flour. If he gave her money and she bought a sacrifice with it, it is acceptable.

15 If he gave her grain and she had it made into fine flour; [he gave her] olives and she had oil made from them; [he gave her] grapes, and she had wine made from them, they are acceptable, because their form has changed.

If he gave her a consecrated animal as her present, it does not become forbidden to the altar. Even if he designated her as one of those to eat from his Paschal sacrifice or his festive offering as a present, the consecrated animals are not disqualified, for the Temple already acquired them at the time they were consecrated. Similarly, if he gave her an entity that did not belong to him, he did not disqualify it, for a person cannot cause an article that does not belong to him to be forbidden unless the owner despairs of its recovery.

If, however, he gave her doves, even though they are consecrated, they can be considered as "a present to a harlot." This concept was conveyed as part of the Oral Tradition.

16 What is meant by "an exchange for a dog"? A person tells a colleague: "Take this lamb in exchange for this dog." Similarly, if he exchanged a dog for several animals or fowl, they are all forbidden [as sacrifices] for the altar.

17 When two partners divided [their goods], one took ten lambs and one took nine lambs and a dog, [the lambs] that are with the dog are permitted [as sacrifices], but [there are restrictions with regard to] the ten given in exchange for them. If the value of one of them is equivalent to the value of the dog or greater, it should be set aside and it [alone] is considered as "the exchange [for a dog]." The remainder are permitted [as sacrifices]. If the value of each of them is less than the value of the dog, they are all forbidden.

18 If [the entity given in] exchange [for the dog] underwent a change, for example, he exchanged a dog for wheat and ground it into flour, it is permitted.

The present [given] to a dog and an exchange given for a harlot are permitted. "A present to a harlot" and "the exchange for a dog" are permitted to be given to the Temple, for they undergo a change. The actual substance of a present [to a harlot] should not be used as beaten metal for the Temple, as [implied by Deuteronomy 23:19]: "For every vow," [which is interpreted] as including sheet metal.

Chapter 5

1 Even the slightest amount of a leavening agent and sweet entity is forbidden [as an offering] for the altar, as [Leviticus 2:11] states: "For no leavening agent or honey shall be kindled... [as a fire-offering]." One is liable only if he set them afire together with a sacrifice or for the sake of a sacrifice.

Whether one sets afire these entities themselves or a mixture of them, he is liable for lashes for each one individually. If he set afire both of them at the same time, he is liable for only one set of lashes, because both of them are mentioned in the same prohibition.

2 If even the slightest amount of these substances fell into the incense offering, it is disqualified. If one set [the mixture] afire in the Sanctuary, he is worthy of lashes. Setting an entity afire is significant only if one sets afire an olive-sized portion.

3 If one brought a leavening agent or a sweetener on the altar alone as kindling fuel, he is exempt, as [ibid:12] states: "They should not be brought to the altar as a pleasant fragrance." [Implied is that] they should not be brought as "a pleasant fragrance," i.e., as a sacrifice, but they may be brought as kindling fuel. Even if one set afire an entity that is not ordained to be set afire together with a leavening agent or with a sweetener, he is liable since it is part of a sacrifice.

4 What is implied? When one causes [the following entities] to be consumed [by fire on the altar]: the meat of a sin-offering or a guilt-offering, the meat of sacrifices of a lesser order of sanctity, the remains of the meal offering, what is left-over from the omer or from a sin-offering from fowl, the showbread, the two loaves [offered on Shavuot], the log of oil brought by a leper - if one were to cause an olive-sized portion of any one of these entities to be consumed on the altar or on its ramp with a leavening agent or a sweetener, he is liable for lashes. Even though none of these entities are fit to be consumed by fire on the altar, since they are called sacrifices, one is liable for them, as [indicated by the initial clause of the verse cited above]: "You shall offer them as a first-fruit offering to God."

5 Similarly, it is forbidden to offer on the altar any entity from all those listed that is not fit to be consumed by fire, e.g., the meat of a sin-offering or a guilt-offering, the remains of the meal offering, or the like. According to the Oral Tradition, we learned that when there is an entity from which a portion is designated to be consumed by fire, it is forbidden to have the remainder [of that entity] consumed by fire.

6 A person who has the limbs of an impure animal consumed by fire on the altar is liable for lashes despite the fact that the prohibition against offering it is [merely] derived from a positive commandment. [This is derived as follows:] The Torah teaches us to partake of pure animals and to offer pure animals as sacrifices. One may conclude that an impure animal should not be eaten and should not be offered. Just as one is liable for lashes for partaking of an impure animal [although it is a prohibition] derived from a positive commandment as explained in the appropriate place, so too, he is liable for lashes for offering it. When, by contrast, one offers the limbs of a kosher wild beast, he violates a positive commandment, but he is not liable for lashes. What is the source that teaches that he violates a positive commandment? [Leviticus 1:2] states: "You shall offer your sacrifices from the domesticated animals: from cattle and flocks." From this, one can derive that one should not offer wild beasts as sacrifices. A prohibition derived from a positive commandment has the status of a positive commandment.

7 When one steals or obtains an object through robbery and offers it as a sacrifice, it is invalid and the Holy One, blessed be He, hates it, as [Isaiah 61:8] states: "[I am God Who...] hates a burnt offering [obtained] through robbery." Needless to say, it is not accepted. If the owner despairs of its return, the sacrifice is acceptable. [This applies] even if it is a sin-offering and thus the priests partake of its meat.

For the sake of the enhancement of the altar's [honor], it was decreed that if it became public knowledge that a sin-offering was obtained through robbery, it does not bring about atonement even if the owner despaired of its return, so that it will not be said that the altar consumes stolen property. Similar laws apply with regard to a burnt offering.

8 When a person steals an animal consecrated to be offered as a burnt-offering by a colleague and has it offered without any further explanation, the original owner receives atonement.

9 Meal offerings and wine libations may not be brought from tevel, from chadash before the omer was offered, or from miduma. Needless to say, they may not be brought from orlah or from mixed species in a vineyard, for that would be a mitzvah that comes as a result of a sin which God despises. If one brings such [an entity as a sacrifice], it is not sanctified to become fit to be offered as a sacrifice, but it is sanctified to be disqualified as are other consecrated entities that are disqualified.

10 As an initial preference, none of the meal offerings should be brought from chadash before the two breads [are brought on Shavuot], for [Leviticus 23:17] refers to them as "the first fruits unto God." If, however, [such a meal offering] was brought, it is acceptable. Wine libations may be brought from wine that was set aside on a festival.

11 It is a positive commandment to salt all the sacrifices before they are brought up to the altar, as [Leviticus 2:13] states: "On all of your sacrifices you shall offer salt." There are no entities that are offered on the altar without salt except the wine libations, the blood, and the wood. This matter was conveyed by the Oral Tradition, but there is no explicit verse to rely on.

It is a mitzvah to salt the meat very thoroughly like one salts meat before roasting it, in which instance one turns over the limbs and salts it. If, however, one applies even the slightest amount of salt, even one grain, it is acceptable.

12 If one offered a sacrifice without any salt at all, he is liable for lashes, as [the above verse] states: "You shall not withhold salt, the covenant of your God."

Even though he receives lashes, the sacrifice is valid and is accepted [Above] with the exception of the meal offering. For salt is an absolute necessity when taking a fistful of the meal offering, as [the above verse] states: "You shall not withhold salt, the covenant of your God from your meal offering."

13 The salt which is used to salt all of the sacrifices should be communal property like the wood. A private individual should not bring salt or wood for his sacrifice from his home.

There are three places where salt is stored for the sacrificial service: in the Chamber of Salt, on the ramp [ascending to the altar], and on the top of the altar itself. In the Chamber of Salt, the hides of the sacrificial animals would be salted. On the ramp, the limbs would be salted and on the top of the altar, the fistful of meal [taken from the meal offering], the frankincense [from the Showbread], the meal offerings which are burnt, and a fowl brought as a burnt offering are salted.

1 Just as it is a mitzvah for all the sacrifices to be unblemished and of the highest quality, so too, the accompanying offerings must be unblemished and of the highest quality, as [Numbers 28:31 states]: "They shall be perfect for you, as should be their accompanying offerings." Implied is that the accompanying offerings should also be unblemished. He should not bring wine libations that have been affected by smoke, nor flour that is worm-infested. Nor should he mix the flour with oil that is foul-smelling or foul-tasting.

2 Similarly, the wood for the arrangement [of the altar] should only be of the highest quality. They should not be worm-infested. Any tree that is worm-infested when it is fresh is unacceptable for the altar. If it became worm-infested after it dried out, one should scrape away the place that became worm-infested. Wood that comes from [a building that was] torn down is invalid. One should use only new wood.

3 There is an unresolved doubt when one consecrates invalid wine, flour, oil, or wood to the altar: Are they considered like a blemished animal in which instance, he would be liable for lashes or do they not resemble a blemished animal? Hence, he is not liable for lashes. He is, however, given stripes for rebellious conduct.

4 Fine flour, wine, oil, frankincense, fowl, wood, and sacred utensils that became invalid or impure should not be redeemed, as [can be inferred from Leviticus 27:11-12]: "He shall cause it to stand [before the priest]" and "have it evaluated." Whatever can be caused to stand [before a priest] can be evaluated. These cannot be caused to stand [before a priest]. Therefore they are never redeemed.

5 When does the above apply? When they became invalidated or impure after they became sanctified in a sacred vessel, but before they have been sanctified in a sacred vessel, they may be redeemed if they become impure or invalid. Pure objects, by contrast, should not be redeemed even if they were not consecrated in a sacred utensil with the exception of the flour brought as a sin-offering. [Concerning which] it is said [Leviticus 5:6] "of his sin-offering" and [ibid.:13] "concerning his sin-offering," as will be explained. [From the juxtaposition of the verses, it is inferred that] one may bring a sin offering from the money of his sin-offering. Therefore before it was consecrated in a sacred utensil it is considered as consecrated for its monetary value and it can be redeemed even though it is ritually pure.

A separate arrangement of wood should be made for all of the accompanying offerings that became impure and they should be burnt on the altar.

6 [The following laws apply with regard to] the water for the libation of Sukkot that became impure and then it was joined [to an acceptable mikveh], as will be explained with regard to [the Laws of] Purity. If he purified it and then consecrated it, it may be used for a libation. If, however, it was consecrated and then became impure, since it was disqualified, it should remain disqualified.

7 When olives and grapes became impure, they should be crushed less than an egg-sized portion at a time. The liquids that emerge from them are acceptable for the accompanying offerings. For these liquids are considered as [distinct and] set aside in the foods and it is as if they are not from their body.

8 Our Sages established an additional safeguard with regard to consecrated objects: When seeds became impure, even if they are sown, [the produce] that grows from them is not acceptable for the accompanying offerings, for sowing produce is not effective [in restoring ritual purity] for consecrated entities.

Similarly, with regard to wood and frankincense, even though they are inedible, they can become impure like foods with regard to the sacrifices. [In such an instance,] the wood and the frankincense become disqualified for the altar because of this impurity and they should not be offered.

9 These are the types of wine that are invalid as [libations] for the altar: sweetened wine, smoked wine, wine cooked over fire or in the sun until its flavor was changed by the cooking. The types of wine [to be listed] should not be brought [as libations] as an initial preference, but if they were brought, they are acceptable. They include: wine which was warmed in the sun, but its flavor did not change due to the cooking and similarly, raisin wine, wine from the vat that is less than 40 days old, wine from [grapes grown] on trellises, wine from a vineyard in an arid region or in a dungheap, wine from vines in which other produce was sown between them, or wine from a vineyard that was not tilled.

10 Wine that was left uncovered is not acceptable [as libations] for the altar. If one draped a vine over a fig tree, its wine is unacceptable for a libation, for its fragrance has changed and [Leviticus 23:37] states: "Sacrifice and libations," [equating the two]. Just as [the appearance of an animal offered as] a sacrifice may not have changed, the wine for libations may not have changed.

11 When the majority of fine flour has become worm-ridden or the majority of the kernels of wheat have become worm-ridden and [flour] was made from them, it is unacceptable. If the majority of one kernel of wheat became worm-ridden, there is an unresolved doubt [with regard to its acceptability]. Whenever flour dust remains in the fine flour, it is unacceptable.

12 How is the matter checked? The treasurer inserts his hand into the fine flour. If dust clings to it as he removes it, it is unacceptable until he sifts it again.

Fine flour from wheat that grew in an arid land, a dungheap, in an orchard, on land that was not left fallow and tilled should not be brought as an initial preference, if it was brought, it is acceptable.

13 When wheat kernels were collected from cattle feces and then sown in the ground, there is an unresolved doubt if their disgusting characteristic has departed because they were sown or they are still considered as disgusting. Therefore one should not bring meal offerings from [such flour] as an initial preference. If he brought, they are acceptable.

14 These are the oils which are unacceptable: oil from olives soaked in water or of pickled or cooked olives, oil from olive dregs, or foul-smelling oil. All of these are unacceptable. In contrast, oil from olives that were planted in a dungheap, in an arid region, which had another crop sown between them, or oil that was produced from olives that have not ripened and are still immature should not be brought as an initial preference, but if it was brought, it is acceptable.

15 All of the meal offerings and libations are acceptable whether from [produce grown in] Eretz [Yisrael] or from [produce grown in] the Diaspora. They are acceptable from fresh grain or grain from the previous years, provided it is of optimum quality. The only exceptions are the omer offering and the two loaves [brought on Shavuot]. They must be brought from fresh grain and from Eretz Yisrael.

1 Not every entity that is not unacceptable may be brought [as a sacrifice] as an initial preference.

What is implied? If one is obligated to bring a burnt offering, one should not bring a weak and unattractive sheep and [justify oneself saying]: "It does not have a blemish." Concerning this, can be applied [the words of censure, Malachi 1:14]: "Cursed be the deceiver... [who sacrifices a blemished animal to God]." Instead, anyone who brings a sacrifice should bring from the highest quality.

2 This is the practice that was observed in the era of the Temple: They would bring rams from Moab, broad-backed sheep from Chebron, calves from Sharon, young doves from Har HaMelech, wine from Korchayin and Chalutin, flour from Michmash and Yochanah and oil from Tekoa.

3 All virgin wood is acceptable for the altar. They would not bring wood from olive trees or grape vines [in consideration of] the settlement of Eretz [Yisrael]. They would frequently use boughs of fig trees that grow in forests of unsettled areas, those of nut trees, and those of fast-burning trees. The logs that Moses made [for the altar in the Sanctuary] were a cubit long and a cubit wide. Their thickness was like that of the leveling rod for an overflowing se'ah. In future generations, [logs] of the same measurements were used.

4 What would they do when sowing wheat for meal offerings and accompanying offerings? They would leave half a field fallow in the first year and sow the other half. In the second year, he should leave the portion he sowed in the first year fallow and he should sow the second half seventy days before Pesach. If the field had not been tilled, he should plow it twice and then sow it. He should choose the kernels of wheat carefully and then he should strike them and tread on them until their shells are removed.

5 All of the wheat used for the meal offerings must receive 300 blows and be tread on 500 times. He should give [the kernels] one blow and then tread on them twice; give them two blows and tread on them three times. Thus they will have received three blows and will have been tread on five times. He should then repeat the pattern until he completes all 300 blows and 500 treadings so that much of the shells will have been removed. As a stringency, extending and drawing back his arm is considered as one blow. After this process, he should grind and sift the flour very thoroughly.

6 Wine [should be made by] bringing grapes from vines growing at foot level from vineyards that were tilled twice a year. He should crush the grapes and collect [their juice] in small jugs. They should not be stored individually or in pairs, but instead in groups of three. The jug should not be filled to its rim in order that its fragrance will be perceived. He should not bring [libations] from the wine near the rim, because of the specks resembling flour that rise to the surface of the wine, nor from the bottom, because of the dregs. Instead, he should take from the middle third and from its middle portion.

7 A treasurer would sit [and watch] as the wine flowed from a hole on the side of a jug [of wine]. If he sees dregs flow out, he stops [the flow of wine] and does not complete the purchase.
At what point [in the aging process of wine] should it be brought? From 40 days after the grapes were tread upon until after two years and even slightly longer than that. If one brings wine that is even older, it is acceptable, provided its flavor has not spoiled.

8 There are nine categories of oil, depending on the process in which they were prepared. What is implied? When one picks olives at the top of an olive tree, selects them one by one, crushes them and puts them into a basket, the oil that flows from them is considered in the first category. If, afterwards, he loads a beam upon them [to press them], the oil which flows from them is of the second category. If he loads [a beam upon them] a second time, the oil which flows from them is of the third category.

When he picked olives in a mixture, brought them to the roof, selected them one by one, crushed them, and placed them into a basket, the oil which flows from them is of the fourth category. If, afterwards, he loads a beam upon them [to press them], the oil which flows from them is of the fifth category. If he loads [a beam upon them] a second time, the oil which flows from them is of the sixth category.

When he picks olives and loads them in the vat until they begin to decompose, he then takes them up [to the roof], dries them, crushes them, and places them in a basket. The oil which flows from them is of the seventh category. If, afterwards, he loads a beam upon them [to press them], the oil which flows from them is of the eighth category. If he loads [a beam upon them] a second time, the oil which flows from them is of the ninth category.

9 Even though they are all acceptable [to be brought] with the meal offerings, there is nothing that surpasses the first category. Afterwards, the second and the fourth are of equal quality. After them, the third, fifth, and seventh are of equal quality. After them, the sixth and the eighth are of equal quality. There is nothing inferior to the ninth.

10 Only the first, fourth, and seventh categories are acceptable for the Menorah, for [Exodus 27:20] states: "crushed for the light," i.e., for the Menorah, only that which flows after [the olives] are crushed alone are acceptable. They are all acceptable for meal offerings.

11 Since all of these categories of oil are acceptable, why were they listed as separate categories? So that one would know the superior category that nothing surpasses, those which are equal, and those which are inferior. In this way, one who desires to gain merit for himself, subjugate his evil inclination, and amplify his generosity should bring his sacrifice from the most desirable and superior type of the item he is bringing. For it is written in the Torah [Genesis 4:4]: "And Abel brought from his chosen flocks and from the superior ones and God turned to Abel and his offering."

The same applies to everything given for the sake of the Almighty who is good. It should be of the most attractive and highest quality. If one builds a house of prayer, it should be more attractive than his own dwelling. If he feeds a hungry person, he should feed him from the best and most tasty foods of his table. If he clothes one who is naked, he should clothe him with his attractive garments. If he consecrates something, he should consecrate the best of his possession. And so [Leviticus 3:16] states: "All of the superior quality should be given to God."

Blessed be God who offers assistance.

Mishneh Torah, Sacrificial Procedure

Trans. by Eliyahu Touger, Moznaim Publishing

Chapter 1

1 All of the sacrifices of living animals comes from five species alone: a) cattle, b) sheep, c) goats, d) turtle doves, and e) small doves.

2 All of the sacrifices - whether those brought by the community or by individuals - are of four types: a) burnt-offerings, b) sin-offerings, c) guilt-offerings, and d) peace-offerings.

3 There are also three other types of individual sacrifices: a) the Paschal sacrifice, b) the sacrifice of the firstborn, and d) the tithe sacrifice.

4 All of the communal offerings are burnt-offerings or sin-offerings. There are no communal peace-offerings except the two sheep offered with the bread that is waved on Shavuot. They are called "the sacrifices of communal peace offerings." The community never offers a guilt offering, nor a fowl.

5 The communal offerings are the two temidim offered every day, the additional offerings of the Sabbaths, Rashei Chodashim, and the festivals, and the sin-offering of a goat brought on Yom Kippur. Similarly, if [the High] Court inadvertently gave an erroneous ruling with regard to the worship of false deities, every tribe is required to bring a bull and a goat. The bull is brought as a burnt-offering and the goat as a sin-offering.

These goats are called "the goats of false deities." If they inadvertently gave an erroneous ruling with regard to other mitzvot, they bring a bull as a sin-offering. It is called "the bull associated with the overlooking of a matter by the community."

6 The sacrifices [brought by] individuals include: a) the firstborn offerings,
b) the tithe offerings,
c) the Paschal offerings,
d) the chagigah offerings, i.e., the peace offerings [brought in association with the pilgrimage festivals],
e) the pilgrimage offering which is a burnt-offering,
f) the sacrifice brought by a convert, that involves a burnt-offering from a domesticated animal, two small doves or two turtle doves; both of them are burnt-offerings, or two domesticated animals, one as a burnt-offering and one as a peace-offering,
g) one who vows or pledges a burnt-offering or a peace offering,
h) peace-offerings that are accompanied by bread; they are called thanksgiving offerings,
i) the sacrifices of a nazirite, which are a burnt-offering, a sin-offering, and a peace-offering,
j) the sacrifices of a metzora, which are a sin-offering, and a guilt-offering, and a burnt-offering,
k) the sacrifices of a zav a zavah, and a women after childbirth; they are a sin-offering and a burnt-offering,
l) the sacrifice brought by a person who inadvertently violated a negative commandment punishable by karet; it is a sin-offering,

m) if a person was unsure of whether he transgressed or not, that transgressor brings a guilt-offering; it is called a conditional guilt-offering,
n) there are certain sins for which one brings a guilt-offering [to atone for their transgression]; this is called a definite guilt-offering,
o) similarly, the ram brought as a burnt-offering and the bull the High Priest brings from his own resources as a sin-offering on Yom Kippur, are individual offerings; the bull is called "the bull of Yom Kippur."
All of these sacrifices are explicitly mentioned in the Torah and the laws governing each of them are explained in the appropriate places.

7 [The person bringing] any of the individual offerings is responsible for them and for their accompanying offerings with the exception of an animal pledged as sacrifice. [The community at large] is not responsible for sacrifices or their accompanying offerings. If a sacrifice was offered, they are responsible for its additional offerings. When an individual's sacrifice was required to be offered at a fixed time, it is like a communal offering and the person is not responsible for it.

8 All of the animals brought as burnt-offerings must only be male. It may be brought from sheep, goats, or cattle, whether large or small. They may also be brought from turtle doves and small doves, whether male or female.

9 A sin-offering may be brought from these five species, from both males and females, from small ones and large ones.

10 A guilt-offering may be brought only from male sheep. There are guilt-offerings that come from large members of this species and others which come from small members of this species.

11 Peace offerings may be brought from sheep, goats, or cattle, from males and females, whether large or small. A fowl may not be brought as a peace offering.

[When describing an animal as] small, [the intent] is one between the eighth day and a full year, from day to day. If the year was declared a leap year, [the extra month is included]. "Large" implies until three full years from day to day for cattle, for flocks, until two full years from day to day. From this age onward, [the animal] is considered as "old" and it should not be brought as an offering.

12 Although all of the sacrifices are acceptable if they are brought from the eighth day onward, as an initial preference, we do not bring [an animal] as a sacrifice until it is 30 days old or older with the exception of a firstborn offering, a Paschal offering, and a tithe offering. If one desires to offer these sacrifices from the eighth day onward, he may.

13 Hours are counted with regard to consecrated animals, i.e., if their [lives] were an hour longer or an hour was subtracted from their [lives], they are unacceptable.

What is implied? When it is required that a sacrifice be less than a year old, if an hour was added to its year, it is invalidated. Even if it was merely a year old when it was slaughtered and additional time was added before its blood was sprinkled [on the altar], it is invalidated. It must be less than a year until the time the blood is sprinkled [on the altar]. Similar [laws] apply with regard to all the sacrifices.

14 Whenever the Torah uses the expressions, "a male sheep," "a female sheep," "sheep," the intent is [an animal] in its first year [of life]. "A ram" or "rams" implies males in their second year [of life]. When is an animal called a ram? When 31 days of its second year of life pass. On the thirtieth day, however, it is not acceptable, neither as a sheep, nor as a ram. [At this stage,] it is called a pilgas.

Whenever the expression "a calf" is used, the intent is [an animal] in its first year [of life]. The term "bull" implies that the animal is in its second year of life. The term "a goat kid" implies that it is in its first year, "a goat," that it is in its second year. Throughout the second year, it is called a goat.

15 All of the communal offerings are male. All of the communal sin offerings come from goats or from cattle, none are brought from sheep. All of the communal burnt offerings are from sheep or cattle; there are no burnt-offerings brought from goats.

All of the sin-offerings brought by individuals are female. They may be eaten by the priests and they do not come from cattle except three: a) the sin-offering of a nasi which is a goat and is eaten, b) the sin-offering of the anointed priest which is a bull, which is burnt; it is called "the bull that comes because of [the violation of] any mitzvah;" c) the bull brought by the High Priest on Yom Kippur; it is a sin-offering that is burnt.

16 All of the communal sin-offerings are eaten with the exception of the goat offered on Yom Kippur whose partner is sent [to Azazel], the goats brought [because of the violation of the prohibition against] idol worship, and the bull [brought because of the violation of] a law forgotten [by the High Court]. "The bull that comes because of [the violation of] any mitzvah" and the bull [brought because of] a law forgotten [by the High Court] are called "the bulls that are burnt." The goats brought [because of the violation of the prohibition against] idol worship are called "the goats that are burnt."

Thus there are five sin-offerings that are burnt: two are individual offerings and three are communal offerings.

17 All of these offerings are called zevachim. All of the burnt-offerings, sin-offerings, guilt-offerings, and the two sheep brought as peace-offerings on Shavuos are called "sacrifices of the highest order of sanctity." Peace offerings brought by an individual, the firstborn offerings, the tithe offerings, and the Paschal offerings, are called "sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity."

18 The limbs and organs that are burnt on the altar from the sin-offerings that are eaten, from the guilt-offerings, and from the peace-offerings are called eimorim. These are the eimorim of an ox or a goat: the fat that is on the inner organs, included with that is the fat that is on the maw, the two kidneys and the fat that is on them, together with the fat that is on the flanks, the lobe of the liver, and a small portion of the liver should also be taken with its lobe. If the sacrifice is from sheep, he should add to these the fat tail in its entirety together with the vertebrae from the spine until the place of the kidneys, as [Levitcus 3:9] states: "he shall remove it opposite the kidneys." All of the eimorim are burnt on the outer altar.

19 If a [sacrificial] animal was pregnant, even though the fetus had been carried for a full term, and even if it was discovered to be alive [after the mother was slaughtered], its fat should not be offered together with the fat of its mother. Instead, only the fat of the mother is offered. The fetus is considered as one of its limbs.

Chapter 2

1 The wine and the fine flour that are brought together with an offering are called accompanying offerings. The fine flour alone is called the accompanying meal-offering. The accompanying meal-offering need not be waved, brought [to the corner of the altar], nor [offered with] frankincense. It requires salt and it is burnt on the outer altar in its entirety.

The wine is poured over the altar. It is not poured over the fire. Instead, the priest should lift up his hands and pour it on [the altar's] base and from there, it descends to the shittin.

2 Accompanying offerings are required only for an animal brought as a burnt-offering or as a peace-offering. Whether it was a communal sacrifice, an individual sacrifice, a sheep brought by a woman who gave birth, or the ram brought by the High Priest, since it was a burnt-offering, it requires the accompanying offerings. Accompanying offerings are not brought for [sacrifices of] fowl, guilt-offerings, sin-offerings, with the exception of the sin-offering and guilt-offering of a person who had been afflicted with tzara'at, for those accompanying offerings are explicitly mentioned in the Torah.

3 What is the source that teaches that accompanying offerings should not be brought together with sin-offerings and guilt-offerings? [When speaking about the accompanying offerings, Numbers 15:3] states: "to utter a vow or pledge," [implying that these offerings are necessary only for sacrifices] brought because of a vow or pledge. [This] excludes a sin-offering, guilt-offering, firstborn offering, tithe offering, and Paschal sacrifice. Since [these offerings] are not brought because of a vow or a pledge, they do not require accompanying offerings.

Which is the source that teaches to include the festive peace-offerings and the pilgrimage burnt-offerings? [The above verse] states: "Or on your festivals."

4 What is the measure of the accompanying offerings? The accompanying offering for a male or female sheep is an isaron of fine flour mixed with a quarter of a hin of oil and a quarter of a hin of wine as a wine libation. These are also [the accompanying offerings] for a goat whether small or large and whether male or female and for a ewe, even if she is large. The accompanying offerings of a ram, however, are two esronim mixed with a third of a hin of oil and a third of a hin of wine as a libation. The accompanying offerings of a cow or a calf, whether male or female, are three esronim mixed with a half of a hin of oil and a half of a hin of wine as a libation.

5 These measures are applicable for the accompanying offerings for burnt-offerings and peace-offerings for each animal offered, as [implied by ibid.: 12]: "According to the number that you offer, so shall you do for [each] one according to their number." We may not increase these measures, nor may we decrease them. [Indeed,] if one increases or decreases [the measure by] even the slightest amount, one disqualifies [the accompanying offering]. The only exception is the sheep offered as a burnt offering on the day of the waving of the omer. The accompanying offering for it is two esronim mixed with a third of a hin of oil. Although the measure of flour was doubled, the measure of wine was not and [only] a quarter of a hin is brought as a libation.

6 A person who had been afflicted with tzara'at must bring three esronim of flour [as accompanying offerings] for the three sheep which he brings as a sin-offering, a guilt-offering, and a burnt-offering. According to the Oral Tradition, we learned that they come because of the sacrifices he brings, an isaron for each sheep mixed with a quarter of a hin of oil. A revi'it of wine should be brought with each of the esronim as is the rule for the accompanying offering for all sheep. When one brings a pilgas, he should bring with it the accompanying offerings for a ram, [nevertheless,] it is not considered as if he brought [the appropriate] sacrifice.

7 A hin comprises twelve log. We have already stated the measure of a log together with other measures in Hilchot Eruvin. An isaron is an omer which is the measure [of dough from which] challah must be separated. We have already explained this measure with regard to [the mitzvah of] challah.

8 When the accompanying offerings or the meal offerings are measured, whether for an individual offering or a communal offering, they should not be measured in a measure of three esronim for a bull or two esronim for a ram. Instead, everything should be measured with the measure of one isaron that existed in the Temple. Similarly, the oil for the accompanying offerings should be measured with the appropriate measure in the Temple. The oil for a meal offering brought by an individual is measured in the measure of a log that existed in the Temple; the number of lugim [of oil] is determined by the number of esronim [of flour].

9 The overflow of the measures of flour are considered to be ordinary flour, because the outer side of the isaron measure is not consecrated. The overflow of the wine and oil, by contrast, is consecrated, because it flows down the back of the utensil and both the inside and the outside of the liquid measures were anointed.

Why were the overflows consecrated even though the person measuring only intended to sanctify what was within the utensil? So that it would not be said that [substances] are used for ordinary purposes after having been in a sacred utensil.

10 What would they do with the overflows? If there was another sacrifice, they would sacrifice them with it. [In that instance,] if they remained overnight, they became disqualified accordingly. If not, they were [redeemed and the proceeds] used to provide "dessert for the altar."

11 What is implied? Burnt offerings are purchased [with the proceeds of] their [sale]. The meat is offered to God and the hides are given to the priests.

12 The flour mixed with oil of the accompanying offerings are not indispensable requirements preventing [the offering of] the wine libation, nor is the wine libation an indispensable requirement preventing their offering, nor are the accompanying offerings an indispensable requirement preventing the offering of the sacrifices. Instead, a person may bring his sacrifice one day and his accompanying offerings after ten days. [This applies to] both individual offerings and communal sacrifices, provided the accompanying offerings were not consecrated in a sacred utensil. If, however, they were consecrated in a sacred utensil, they are disqualified if they remain overnight.

13 The accompanying offerings may only be brought from ordinary produce. They may not be brought from terumah, the second tithes, or the first fruits. Even for the thanksgiving offering whose bread may be brought from the [second] tithe, its accompanying offerings should only be brought from ordinary produce.

14 All of the measures of the accompanying offerings mentioned in the Book of Ezekiel, the listing of the sacrifices, and the order of service written there are all inauguration offerings and will not be practiced in generations to follow. Instead, the prophet commanded and outlined how the inauguration offerings will be brought at the time of the dedication of the altar at the time of the coming of the King Mashiach when the Third Temple will be built.

15 Just as the princes offered sacrifices at the dedication of the altar [of the Sanctuary in the desert], bringing offerings that were not brought in coming generations, and they brought them on the Sabbath, so too, a prince will bring a dedication offering on the Sabbath in the Ultimate Future, as stated explicitly there. Similarly, the sacrifices which the people who returned [to Zion] from the [Babylonian] captivity in the days of Ezra, were inaugural offerings and will not be practiced in generations to come. The practices to be followed in generations to come are the words of the Torah that we have explained as they were copied from Moses our teacher. We may not add to them or subtract from them.

1 When two people desired to bring a peace-offering or a burnt-offering in partnership, they may whether it was pledged or vowed. Even a fowl may be brought in partnership.

2 Men, women, and, servants may bring all of these types of sacrifices. From gentiles, by contrast, we accept only burnt offerings, as [derived from Leviticus 22:28]: "From the hand of an alien, you shall not offer the food of your God [from all of these]." Even a burnt offering of fowl may be accepted from a gentile, even if he worships false deities.

We do not, however, accept peace-offerings, meal-offerings, sin-offerings, or guilt-offerings from a gentile. Similarly, burnt-offerings that do not come as vows or pledges are not accepted from gentiles, e.g., a burnt-offering from a women who gave birth or the like or other burnt-offerings that do not come as vows or pledges.

3 When a gentile brings peace-offerings, they should be sacrificed as burnt-offerings, for [the intention of] a gentile's heart is [for the sake] of heaven. If he gives them to a Jew with the intent that a Jew receive atonement, the Jew may partake of them like the peace-offerings of the Jewish people. Similarly, if he gives them to a priest, the priest may partake of them.

4 When a Jew is an apostate who worships false deities or who desecrates the Sabbath in public, we do not accept any sacrifices from him at all. Even a burnt-offering that is accepted from a gentile is not accepted from this apostate. [This is derived from Leviticus 1:2 which] states: "A man from you who will sacrifice." According to the Oral Tradition, we learned: "From you," i.e., not all of you, excluding an apostate.

If, however, one was a heretic with regard to other transgressions, any sacrifice [he brings] is accepted so that he will repent. If, however, he was a heretic with regard to a transgression and it is public knowledge that he commits it and he has become accustomed to doing so, a sacrifice [that he brings atoning for] that transgression - whether committed to anger [God] or out of desire -is not accepted. What is implied? If a person was accustomed to eat fat - whether committed to anger [God] or out of desire - and then he inadvertently partook of fat and brought a sin-offering [for this transgression], it is not accepted.

5 Gentiles do not bring accompanying offerings for the burnt-offerings they bring, as [can be inferred from Numbers 15:13]: "Every native among you shall do this." The accompanying offerings for their sacrifices are, however, brought from communal funds, as [ibid.:12] states: "So shall you do for each one according to their number." [These burnt offerings] do not require semichah, for semichah is performed only by a Jew, and by a male and not a female.

6 All of the offerings from domesticated animals that an individual brings- whether those in which he is obligated or those promised through a vow - [require] semichah while they are alive with the exception of the firstborn offering, the tithe offering, and the Paschal sacrifice. [This is derived from Leviticus 3:2]: "And he shall lean his hand on the head of his offering." According to the Oral Tradition, we learned that this refers to all the sacrifices with the exception of the firstborn offering, the tithe offering, and the Paschal sacrifice.

7 [A sacrifice of] a fowl does not require semichah.

We already explained in Hilchot Shekalim that the law is that all the money concerning which it was decided that it should be given to the chest for freewill offerings should be used to purchase burnt-offerings. The person to which this money belonged does not perform semichah on that animal, nor does he bring the accompanying offerings. Instead, the accompanying offerings are brought from communal funds. Even if he was a priest, the service [of offering the sacrifice] and its hide belong to the men of the watch.

8 All people may perform semichah with the exception of a deafmute, a mentally and/or emotionally unstable individual, a minor, a servant, a woman, a blind man, and a gentile. An agent does not perform semichah, for semichah is performed only by the owners, as [implied by the prooftext]: "And he shall lean his hand." "His hand" and not the hand of his wife, his servant, or his agent.

9 When five individuals bring a sacrifice [in partnership], they all perform semichah, one after the other. They should not perform semichah at the same time.

When a person died and left a sacrifice of a burnt offering or a peace offering, his heir should have it offered, perform semichah on it, and bring its accompanying offerings.

10 Semichah is not performed with regard to communal offerings except with regard to two sacrifices: the goat sent to Azazel and the bull brought because of a law being forgotten. Three members of the Sanhedrin perform semichah on it. This is a law conveyed by Moses our teacher that semichah is not performed on communal offerings other than these two.

11 Semichah is performed only in the Temple Courtyard. If one performed semichah outside the Temple Courtyard, he should perform it again inside. If the one bringing the sacrifice was standing outside [the Temple Courtyard] and he extended his hands into [the Courtyard] and performed semichah, his semichah is valid, provided he performed semichah with all his strength.

Only a person who is ritually pure may perform semichah. If a person who is ritually impure performed semichah, the semichah [is acceptable].

12 The animal should be slaughtered in the place where semichah is performed. The animal must be slaughtered directly after semichah. If one slaughtered it in a different place or waited [before slaughtering it], the slaughter is acceptable.

Semichah is an incremental aspect of the mitzvah. Accordingly, if one did not perform semichah, the sacrifice [still] brings atonement; [the semichah] is not an indispensable requirement. Nevertheless, it is considered as if the sacrifice did not bring atonement.

13 The person performing semichah must do so with all his power, [placing] both hands on the head of the animal, as [Leviticus 1:4] states: "on the head of the burnt-offering." [Implied is his hands must be placed on the head] and not on the [animal's] neck or the side of its face, and that there should not be any intervening substance between his hands and the animal.

14 How is semichah performed? If the sacrifice was one of the offerings of the most sacred order, he should have the animal stand in the northern portion of the Temple Courtyard, facing the west. The person performing semichah stands to the east with his face to the west. He should place both his hands between its two horns and recite [the appropriate] confession, for a sin-offering, the sin which warrants a sin-offering and for a guilt-offering, the sin which warrants a guilt offering. For a burnt offering, he confesses the sin of [negating the observance of] a positive commandment or of a negative commandment that can be corrected by the observance of] a positive commandment.

15 How does he confess? He says: "I sinned, I transgressed, I committed iniquity, and I did this-and-this, and I have repented before You and this is my atonement.

If he is bringing a peace-offering, he should perform semichah with all of his strength anywhere he desires within the Temple Courtyard, where [the animal] will be slaughtered. It appears to me that one does not confess on a peace-offering. Instead, he says words of praise.

Chapter 4

1 All of the sacrifices may be offered only during the day, as [can be inferred from Leviticus 7:38]: "On the day when He commanded the children of Israel to offer their sacrifices." [Implied is] during the day and not at night. Therefore sacrifices are slaughtered only during the day and their blood is sprinkled [on the altar] on the day of the slaughter, as [can be inferred from ibid.:16]: "On the day he offers his sacrifice." Implied is that on the day the sacrifice is slaughtered, it should be offered. When the sun sets [on that day], the blood is disqualified.

2 As long as the elements that cause a sacrifice to be permitted were offered during the day, [the other elements of] the sacrifice may be offered on the altar throughout the night.

What is implied? When the blood of sacrifices was sprinkled during the day, their eimorim may be offered on the fire of the altar at night until dawn. Similarly, the limbs of the burnt-offerings may be offered on the fire of the altar until dawn. In order to distance [a person] from inadvertent transgression, our Sages declared that the eimorim and the limbs of the burnt-offerings should only be offered on the fire of the altar until midnight.

3 Even though the eimorim and the limbs [of the sacrifices] may be offered on the fire of the altar at night, they may not be willingly delayed. Instead, an attempt should be made to offer everything during the day, for it is desirable that a mitzvah be performed at its designated time. [The importance of this can be seen from the fact that] the offering of the eimorim and the limbs [of the sacrifices] on the fire of the altar supersedes the Sabbath prohibitions on that day. We do not delay this until Saturday night.

4 Any element of a sacrifice that may be offered only during the day, e.g., the handful [of flour from the meal-offering], the frankincense [from the meal-offering], the incense offering, and the meal-offerings that are burnt [on the altar], may be offered [on the altar] at sunset. They then continue to be consumed [by the altar's fire] the entire night like the limbs of the burnt offerings.

5 The libations that are offered with sacrifices are only offered during the day, as [Numbers 29:39] states: "And for their libations and for their peace-offerings." An association is established between the peace-offerings and the libations. Just as the peace-offerings [are offered only] during the day, so too, the libations must be offered during the day. Nevertheless, the libations that are offered independently may be sanctified at night and offered at night. Therefore if it happens that a person obtains libations that are brought independently, he should sanctify them at night and offer them at night. Dawn disqualifies [these libations], as it disqualifies the limbs of the burnt-offering.

6 The entire day is acceptable for semichah, slaughter, severing a fowl's head, offering objects on the altar's fire, bringing [meal] offerings to the altar, sprinkling [blood on the altar], waving [sacrificial offerings], taking a handful of the meal offering, and bringing the Musaf offering. The entire night is acceptable to offer the eimorim and the limbs on the altar's fire.
This is the general principle: When the mitzvah is to perform a particular act during the day, it is acceptable throughout the day. If the mitzvah is to perform the act at night, it is acceptable throughout the night. Nevertheless, the eager hasten to perform the mitzvot.

7 As an initial preference, all of the sacrificial animals may be slaughtered only with a knife that is a sacred utensil. Nevertheless, if one slaughtered it with any article [fit] to slaughter an ordinary animal - even the edge of a bulrush - it is acceptable.

8 Whenever one received less than the amount of blood need to sprinkle it on the altar from any of the sacrifices, the blood does not become consecrated. [As an initial preference,] one should have the intent of receiving all the [animal's] blood.

What should be done? One should hold the windpipe and the gullet in his hand, and together with the jugular vein, place them inside a basin and slit both of them - or their majority - so that all of the blood will be received in the basin. [After the slaughter,] the knife should be lifted up, so that the blood does not flow down along it, but rather from the neck. He should wipe off the blood that is on the knife on the [outer] edge of the basin.

9 The space above the basin is considered as if it is inside the basin. If one was receiving the blood [of a sacrificial animal] and the bottom of the basin opened before the blood reached the open space of the bottomless basin, the blood is not consecrated. [The rationale is that when the blood enters] space in which it will ultimately not come to rest, it is not considered as if it came to rest.

10 With regard to all of the sacrifices, the person performing the service must have the intent of offering the proper type of sacrifice for the sake of the person bringing it at the time of slaughter, at the time the blood is received, at the time it is brought to the altar, and at the time that it is sprinkeled on the altar, as [indicated by Leviticus 7:15]: "And the meat of his thanksgiving, peace-offering." [Implied is that] the slaughter together with the [three other] services must be for the sake of his peace-offering.

Similar concepts apply with regard to other sacrifices.

If one slaughtered [an animal] and performed [these] other services without any intent, without thinking at all, this is acceptable for a burnt-offering and a peace-offering and the owner is considered to have fulfilled his obligation.

11 At the time of the slaughter of [an animal designated as] a burnt-offering, [the person offering it] must have six things in mind, [that the animal be slaughtered]: for the sake of the [desired] sacrifice, for the sake of the person bringing it, that it be sacrificed unto God, blessed be He, that it be consumed by fire, that its consumption by fire be for the sake of generating a [pleasing] fragrance, and that the fragrance be pleasing before God. If he slaughtered [the animal] without any intent, it is acceptable, as explained.

One who slaughters [an animal as] a sin-offering or a guilt-offering should have the intent that [the sacrifice atone] for the sin which he committed.

1 We have already explained that the slaughter of consecrated animals is acceptable even when performed by non-priests. From the receiving of the blood and onward, the mitzvah is that of the priests. The blood of all the sacrifices must be received in a sacred utensil held by a priest's hand. Nevertheless, the place where they are slaughtered and their blood is received is not the same in all instances.

2 What is implied? Sacrifices of the most sacred order may be slaughtered and their blood may be received in the any portion of [the area designated as] north of the altar whose boundaries we defined in the beginning of this book. Sacrifices of lesser sanctity may be slaughtered and their blood received in every place in the Temple Courtyard.

3 What is the source that teaches the sacrifices of the most holy order may be slaughtered only in the northern portion of the Temple Courtyard. With regard to a burnt-offering, [Leviticus 1:11] states: "And it shall be slaughtered on the northern flank of the altar." And with regard to the sin-offering, [ibid. 6:18] states: "In the place where the burnt-offering is slaughtered, you shall slaughter the sin-offering." And just as a sin-offering is called a sacrifice of the most sacred order, so too, the burnt-offering is called, a sacrifice of the most sacred order. With regard to the guilt-offering, [ibid. 7:2] states: "In the place where the burnt-offering is slaughtered, you shall slaughter the guilt-offering." And an association was established between communal peace-offerings and sin-offerings, as [ibid. 23:19] states: "You shall offer one he-goat as a sin-offering and two sheep a year old as a peace-offering." Therefore, they are considered sacrifices of the most sacred order like a sin-offering and are slaughtered in the place where it is slaughtered. In the place where [these sacrificial animals] are slaughtered, their blood should be received.

4 What is the source that teaches that sacrifices of lesser sanctity may be slaughtered in any place in the Temple Courtyard, even behind the Temple building? With regard to the peace-offerings, [Leviticus] 3:2] states: "And you shall slaughter it at the opening to the Tent of Meeting," this indicates that all directions are acceptable, for a particular direction was not specified. The same applies to other sacrifices of lesser sanctity. If they were slaughtered in the Temple building itself, they are acceptable. If, however, they slaughtered them on the roof of the Temple building, they are not acceptable, for the roofs are not fit for ritual slaughter at all. It must be performed on the earth of the Temple Courtyard.

5 Peace offerings that were slaughtered before the gates to the Temple building were opened are unacceptable, as [indicated by the prooftext,] "at the opening to the Tent of Meeting," i.e., when it is open. Even if the doors were closed, [but not locked,] they are considered as locked. However, the curtain that is over [the entrance] does not disqualify [the offering].

6 The manner in which the blood of a burnt-offering, a guilt-offering, and a peace offering, whether communal or individual, is cast on the altar is the same for all three types of sacrifices at all times.

What does [the priest] do? The priest takes the blood which is in a receptacle and casts it from the receptacle twice, [once] on each of two of the corners of the altar on a diagonal, on the bottom half of the altar. [The corners were] the northeast and the southwest. When casting the blood on the corners, he should have the intent that the blood will surround the corners like a gamma. In this way, the blood from these two castings will be found on the four walls of the altar. For with regard to the burnt-offering and the peace-offering, [the Torah] uses the term "surrounding." This also applies to the guilt offering. The remainder of the blood is poured on the foundation on the southern side of the altar.

7 The sin offerings from which [the priests] partake require four presentations [of blood], [one] on each of the four corners of the outer altar, on its upper half, for concerning it, [Leviticus 4:25] states: "On the corners of the altar.

What should [the priest] do? When the priest takes the blood in the receptacle, he carries it to the altar. He dips the index finger of his right hand into the blood. He then places his thumb [on one side of the altar] and his middle finger [on the other side] and applies [the blood] on the point of the corner of the altar, descending until he finishes [bestowing] all the blood on his finger. He does this on each corner. If he placed the blood near the corner, within a cubit on either side, he achieves atonement [for the owner of the sacrifice].

8 He must dip his finger [in the blood] before applying it to each corner. When he finishes applying it to the corner, he should clean his finger on the [outer] edge of the container. He then dips it in a second time, for the blood on his finger is unacceptable to place on another corner.

9 None of the other sacrifices require the application of the blood on the altar with one's finger aside from the sin-offering, for with regard to it [Leviticus 4:6] states: "And he shall dip his finger into the blood." There must be enough blood so that he can dip his finger into it. He should not collect the blood with his finger.

10 From [which] corner should he begin? He should ascend on the ramp and turn to his right, walking on the surrounding ledge. He should apply the blood to the southeast corner first and then to the second corner that is close to it, the northeast corner. Afterwards, he should proceed to the third corner, [the one] next to it, the northwest corner, and afterwards, to the fourth corner next to it, which is the southwest. On the base of the altar at the corner which he completed the applications of the blood, he pours out the remaining blood, as [Leviticus 4:17] states: "And all of the [remaining] blood he should pour on the base of the altar of the burnt-offerings." This refers to the base on the southern side [of the altar].

11 The blood of all of the sin-offerings that are burnt is taken in the Temple building, and it is sprinkled there as described in the Torah. The remainder of the blood should be poured on the western base of the outer altar, [the one] that he encounters first when he leaves the Temple building.

12 How is their blood sprinkled and how many sprinklings are made? The blood of both the bull and the goat offered on Yom Kippur require eight sprinklings between the staves [of the ark] and eight sprinklings on the curtain [before the Holy of Holies]. He then mixes together the blood of the bull and that of the goat and sprinkles it four times, one on each of the four corners of the golden altar in the Temple building and seven sprinklings on the center of this altar, as will be explained in Hilchot Avodat Yom HaKippurim. [Even] if he did not carefully direct the sprinklings performed in the innermost [chamber], they are acceptable.

13 The blood of the bulls that are burnt and the goats that are burnt should both be cast [in the following manner]. They should be sprinkled seven times on the curtain that separates between the Sanctuary and the Holy of Holies and four times on the four corners of the golden altar.

14 With regard to the blood placed on the golden altar: When he enters [the Sanctuary], he stands between the altar and the Menorah with the altar in front of him. He should [sprinkle the blood] on the outer side of the horns of the altar. He should begin with the northeast corner and [proceed] to the northwest and then to the southwest and then to the southeast.

15 With regard to the bull brought by the anointed priest for the violation of any of the mitzvot, the anointed priest himself receives its blood and sprinkles it in the Sanctuary. If an ordinary priest received this blood and sprinkled it, it is acceptable.

16 The goats [offered in atonement for] idol worship are called the goats which are burnt. The Torah does not explicitly state how their blood was sprinkled [on the altar]. Nevertheless, since they are communal sin offerings, the laws applying to them should be the same in their particulars as those applying to the bull brought because of a forgotten law, for it is also a communal sin-offering. [This applies to] the sprinkling of the blood, burning [the sacrifices], and the impurity they impart to the one who has them burnt.

17 The blood of each [of the following], the firstborn offering, the tithe offering, and the Paschal sacrifice is required to be presented to the altar through one pouring at its base, in any direction one desires on the three corners of the altar that have a base. For, as we explained, the southeastern corner did not have a base.

What is the source that teaches that all that is required is one present? For with regard to the first born sacrifice, [Numbers 18:17] states: "You shall cast its blood on the altar." According to the Oral Tradition, we learned that this also applies to the tithe offering and the Paschal sacrifice. Their blood is presented once like that of the firstborn offering.

18 The eimorim of all the sacrifices are the first [elements of the sacrifice] offered on the pyre of the altar after the blood is cast [on the altar]. All of the sacrificial [animals] are skinned and then the eimorim are removed. They are not skinned until the blood is cast. [This applies] with the exception of the sin-offerings, for they are not skinned at all, as [Leviticus 16:27] states: "You shall burn with fire their hide and their flesh." Thus, [the order of sacrifice is] first the blood is cast [on the altar]. Then the sacrificial [animals] are skinned and then their [bellies] are ripped open, the eimorim are removed and offered [on the pyre of the altar].

19 All of the hides of the sacrifices of the most sacred order - whether communal offerings or individual offerings - are given to the priests, as [Leviticus 7:8] states: "The hide of the burnt-offering he offered [shall belong to that priest]." The hides of sacrifices of lesser sanctity, by contrast, are given to the owners. Whenever the flesh of a burnt-offering did not merit to be offered on the altar, the priests do not acquire its hide, as [implied by the above verse which] states: "the burnt-offering of a man." [We can infer that it refers only to] a burnt-offering that was acceptable for a man.

20 In all instances that a disqualifying factor was caused in one of the sacrifices of the most sacred order before they were skinned, their hides are not granted to the priests. [If they are disqualified] after they are skinned, their hides are granted to the priests. All of the hides should be divided among the members of the priestly watch from Friday to Friday.

21 When a person consecrates a burnt-offering to the Temple treasury or one consecrates his property [to the Temple treasury] and among [his possessions] were male animals concerning which the law is that they should be sacrificed as burnt-offerings, the hides are not given to the priests, for [the prooftext] states: "the burnt-offering of a man." This excludes the burnt-offering of the Temple treasury. Instead, the hides should be sold and the money given to the Temple treasury.
The hide of a burnt-offering brought by] a man or a woman, a gentile or a servant, is given to the priests. The term "man" was used only to exclude the Temple treasury.

Chapter 6

1 It is a positive commandment to offer the burnt-offering according to its statutes as they are written in the Torah. How is the burnt-offering brought? One slaughters [the animal] and casts its blood in the manner described, skins it, cuts it into pieces and offers all the pieces on the pyre of the altar, as [Leviticus 1:9] states: "The priest shall offer the entire [sacrifice] on the pyre of the altar."

2 The wool on the heads of the sheep, the hair of the beards of the goats, and the bones, sinews, horns, and hoofs of the [sacrificial animals] should be offered on the pyre of the altar if they are still connected [naturally to the animal's body]. If they have been separated, they should not be brought up [to the altar]. [This is derived from Deuteronomy 12:27 which mentions]: "Your burnt offerings, the flesh and the blood." All parts of the sacrificial animal which flew off the altar should not be returned to it. Similarly, a coal which flew off the altar should not be returned to it.

3 [The following rules apply when] the limbs [of a sacrificial animal] flew off the altar. If they still have substance, even if they flew off after midnight, they should be returned to the altar, [for Leviticus 6:2] speaks of [the burnt-offering remaining] "on its fire, on the altar, the entire night." If they do not have substance, even if they flew off before midnight, they should not be returned. If the meat became charred and dried up upon them like wood and they flew off before midnight, they should be returned. After midnight, they should not be returned.

4 After one cuts up the limbs of the burnt-offering, all of the different portions should be brought to the altar's ramp and salted there. Afterwards, all of the limbs should be brought up to the top of the altar. The gid hanesheh should be removed at the top of the altar and tossed on the pile of ash in the midst of the altar. All of the limbs should be cast on the altar, as [implied by the prooftext cited above], "the flesh and the blood." Just as the blood is cast [on the altar], so too, all of the flesh must be cast [on the pyre]. After they were tossed [on the altar, the priest] should come and arrange them on the pyre, as [Leviticus 1:12] states: "And the priest shall arrange them." If limbs [of sacrificial animals] were roasted and then brought up to the altar, they are not considered as a pleasing fragrance.

5 How is the burnt-offering cut up? One would not break the animal's leg. Instead, a hole was made in it. It was hung from [the hole] and skinned. If [the burnt-offering] was an ox, it should be skinned without being hung.
The person continues skinning, until he gets to the breast, When he gets to the breast, he should cut off the head and give it to a priest. He then cuts off the feet and gives them to others. He then completes skinning the animal. He rips open the heart and takes out its blood. He then proceeds to the forelegs and cuts them off. He proceeds to the right hindleg and gives it to [the priest] who merited [to carry] the head. The two testicles should be taken with it.
Afterwards, he rips open the animal's [belly] until he reveals the intestines. He takes the fat and places it on the head, to cover the place of slaughter. He takes the inner organs and gives them to another [priest].

6 [The latter] goes and washes them with water, as [Leviticus 1:13] states: "The inner organs and the feet should be washed with water." [This excludes] wine, a mixture of wine and water, and other liquids. All types of water are, [however,] acceptable.

To what extent should he wash them? The stomach should be washed in the Washing Chamber to whatever degree necessary. The intestines should be washed at least three times. They should be washed on the marble table located between the pillars.

7 He then takes the knife and separates the lung from the liver and [also] the lobe of the liver from the liver. He should not move the liver from its place. He hollows out the chest and gives it to another [priest]. He then proceeds upward to the right flank and cuts if off and descends to the backbone. He does not touch the backbone until he reaches the two soft ribs. He cuts it off and gives it to another [priest] while the liver is attached to it.

8 He then reaches the neck and leaves it with two ribs on either side. He cuts it off and gives it to another priest with the windpipe, the heart, and the lungs attached to it. He proceeds to the left flank and leaves two soft ribs above and two soft ribs below and, as he had left in the other one. Thus on the two sides, he leaves four ribs on either side. He then cuts it off and gives it to another person together with the backbone with the spleen attached to it.

9 He then comes to the tail and severs it and gives it to another [priest] together with the fat-tail, the lobe of the liver, and the two kidneys with it. He should take the left foot and give it to another [priest]. This order should be followed when skinning and cutting up a burnt-offering of an animal. These are the portions referred to by the Torah [in Leviticus 1:6]: "You shall cut it into its portions."

10 How many priests bring the limbs to the ramp? If the burnt-offering is from sheep, six priests should carry it.

11 The first [priest] carries the head and the [right] foot. [He carries] the head in his right hand with its nose facing his forearm and its horns between his fingers. The place where [the animal] was slaughtered is held upward with the fat upon it. The right foot is in his left hand with the side from which the skin was removed facing outward.

12 The second [priest carries] the two forelegs, the right one in his right hand and the left one in his left hand. The side from which the skin was removed should face outward.

13 The third [priest carries] the tail and the hindleg, the tail in his right hand with the fat-tail that hangs between his fingers. Together with it should be the lobe of the liver and the two kidneys. The left hindleg should be in his left hand with the side from which the skin was removed facing outward.

14 The fourth [priest carries] the breast and the neck, the breast in his right hand and the neck in his left hand with the ribs between his fingers.

15 The fifth [priest carries] the two flanks, the right flank in his right hand and the left flank in his left hand. The side from which the skin was removed should face outward.

16 The sixth [priest carries] the intestines in a bowl. The feet should be placed above them. [This applies] if the burnt-offering was a sheep or a goat. If, however, it was a ram, two priests should bring the intestines.
Similarly, [if it was a sheep,] the flour of the accompanying offering should be brought by one priest and the wine by another. If it was a ram, the flour should be brought by two priests and the wine, by two priests.

17 Thus eight [priests] bring [a burnt offering of] a sheep or a goat to the altar. That of a ram is brought by eleven [and that of an ox is brought by twenty-four].

18 There are 24 [priests] who bring [a burnt offering of] an ox to the altar. The first brings the head. The second and the third bring the right foot. The fourth and the fifth bring the tail. The sixth and the seventh bring the left foot. The eighth brings the breast. The neck is brought by three [priests], the ninth, tenth, and eleventh. The two forelegs are brought by two priests, the two flanks, by two, and the intestines, the flour, and the wine in sets of three. Thus there are 24.

19 Why was a large limb of an ox not divided into portions? Because it is written: "You shall cut it into its portions." [Implied is that] its portions should not be cut into portions.
When are the above [number of priests] required [to bring the limbs to the altar]? For a communal burnt-offering. If it was desired that the portions of an individual burnt-offering be brought to the altar with less than this [number of priests] or more, it is possible.

20 How was the burnt-offering of a fowl brought? [The priest] would ascend upon the ramp He would turn [right] to the surrounding ledge and approach the southeast corner. There he would sever the head [of the fowl] at the nape of its neck, severing [the head] entirely. If he does not sever it entirely, [the sacrifice] is invalid. He then squeezes out the blood of the head and the blood of the body on the wall of the altar above the [scarlet] band in the middle of the altar.

If he squeezed out the blood of the head, but did not squeeze out the blood of the body, [the sacrifice] is invalid. If he squeezed out the blood of the body, but did not squeeze out the blood of the head, [the sacrifice] is valid.

21 He should take the head and bring the opening where it was severed close to the altar, dip it into salt, and cast it on the pyre. He then focuses his attention on the body. He removes the crop, the skin that is upon it with its feathers, and the intestines that are removed with it and casts them on the ash pile.

22 [Leviticus 1:17 states:] "He shall split it with its wings" - [this is performed] by hand, not with a knife. He need not separate [one part of the body from the other], as [that verse] states: "He [need] not separate it." If he separates it, it is valid. He then spreads salt upon it and casts it upon the altar.

If he did not remove the craw, the feathers, or the intestines or spread salt upon it, it is valid. As long as the change that one makes comes after squeezing out the blood, [the sacrifice] is acceptable.

23 How is melikah performed? [The priest] cuts and descends with his nail at the nape of the neck. If he desires to move his nail back and forth, he may. If he wishes to chop and descend with his nail, he may. If the organs necessary for ritual slaughter slip from their place, he need not be concerned.

He must cut through the spine, i.e., the neckbone, without cutting through the majority of the meat surrounding it, for if he would cut through the majority of the meat, [the sacrificial animal] would be considered as dead before he reached the organs necessary for ritual slaughter. With regard to a burnt offering, as he descends he must cut both the organs necessary for ritual slaughter.

When one performs melikah with a knife or does so from the side, it is not considered as melika. Instead, it is like strangling or decapitating the fowl. The entire [width of] the nape of the neck is acceptable for melikah.

Chapter 7

1 It is a positive commandment to offer the sin-offerings according to its statutes as they are written in the Torah. How are the sin-offerings which are eaten brought? One slaughters [the animal] and sprinkles its blood in the manner described, skins it, and separates the eimorim. He salts them and casts them on the pyre. If he desires to place the eimorim in a container while they are being carried to the altar, he may. The remainder of the meat is eaten by male priests in the Temple Courtyard.

2 How are the sin-offerings which are burnt brought? One slaughters [the animal] and sprinkles its blood in the manner described. Afterwards, one rips open [its belly] and removes the eimorim. He places them into a container, salts them, and casts them on the pyre. The remainder [of the animal] should be taken outside the city and cut up there as the burnt offering is cut up with its hide. [The pieces] are burnt there in the ash pile.

3 There are three places [where sacrifices] are burnt: The first is in the midst of the Temple Courtyard. [The following are] burnt there: sacrifices [of the highest order of sanctity] that have been disqualified, the eimorim of sacrifices of lesser sanctity which were disqualified, the bulls and goats that are burnt if they are disqualified, whether before their blood was sprinkled or after their blood was sprinkled, e.g., they became impure, they were taken outside the Temple Courtyard before the time they were supposed to be taken out arrived, or their meat or their eimorim remained overnight [without being burnt].

4 The second place is on the Temple Mount. It is called the birah. There we burn sin-offerings that are to be burnt if they were disqualified after they departed from the Temple Courtyard.

The third place is outside Jerusalem. It is called the ash-pile. There we burn the sin-offerings that are burnt when they are burnt according to their commandment.

5 It is acceptable for the burning of all of [the sacrifices] that must be burnt to be performed by a non-priest and at night. Any type of wood, even straw and stubble, is acceptable for the burning of all of the sacrifices that must be burnt outside the Temple Courtyard, as [Leviticus 4:12] states: "On wood with fire," any type of fire. Why is wood mentioned? To exclude lime or hot ash.

6 How is a sin-offering from fowl brought? Melikah should be performed on the southwest corner [of the altar], as we explained. He should descend with his nail until he cuts the organs [required for ritual slaughter] or [at least] the majority of one of them. He should not separate the head from the body. If he does, he disqualifies [the sacrifice] and is liable for lashes, as [Leviticus 5:8] states: "He shall nip off its head at the nape [of the neck], but should not separate it."

He then sprinkles its blood on the wall of the altar, below its midpoint. The remainder of the blood should be squeezed out on the altar's base, as stated [ibid.: 9]: "And the remainder of the blood, he shall squeeze out on the altar's base." One can conclude from this that when one presents the blood on the wall [of the altar], [the fact that] the remainder [of the blood] is squeezed out toward the base [indicates that] "the wall" refers to the lower [portion] of the wall.

7 Squeezing out the blood of a fowl brought as a sin-offering is an absolute requirement. All the altar receives from this offering is its blood. The remainder is eaten by males of the priestly family like the meat of an animal brought as a sin-offering.

8 How should the fowl brought as a sin-offering be held at the time of melikah? He should hold its two feet between two of his fingers and its two wings between his other two fingers, extending its neck over [the thumb for] a width of two fingers and then snip off its head.

This was one of the difficult tasks performed in the Temple. If one deviated and held the fowl in any other manner, it is acceptable.

9 Every part of the altar is acceptable for melikah, provided he sprinkles its blood below the midpoint of the altar. If he sprinkles it anywhere [on the altar], it is acceptable provided he presents [at least] a small amount of the blood of the soul below [the midpoint of the altar].

10 The upper half of southwest corner of the altar would serve three purposes and the lower half would serve three purposes. The lower half was used for the melikah of a fowl brought as a sin-offering, approaching the altar with the meal-offering, and pouring the remainder of the blood of the burnt-offerings, the sin-offerings that are eaten, the guilt-offerings, and the peace-offerings upon its [base].
The three purposes for which the upper portion was used are: the water libation on Sukkos, the wine libation of the accompanying offering [of Sukkot], and the burnt offerings of fowl if there are many of them. If the southeast corner does not have the capacity for all of them, [the priests would] turn to the southwest corner and perform melikah there.

11 All of those who ascend the altar on the right [side of the ramp], circle it, and descend on the left [side] except for one who ascends for one of the latter three purposes mentioned above which are performed on the upper portion of this corner. [Those involved in these services] ascend on the left side, turn to the left, to that corner, perform their task, and retrace their steps.

Why do they turn to the left? So that they will encounter the southwest corner first. For if they would turn to the right and circle the entire altar until they reached the southwest corner, the water or the wine might become smoky or perhaps the fowl would die because of the altar's smoke.

12 Therefore when someone who performs a water or wine libation circles the altar, he should not have anything in his hands. He begins circling from the southeast corner, [proceeding] to the northeast and then to the northwest and the southwest. He should not be holding anything. When he reaches the southwest corner, the water or the wine is placed in his hand and he performs the libation. If he does not [desire to] circle [the altar], he may ascend [the ramp], turn to the left, perform his service, and descend.

1 There is a stringency that applies with regard to an animal brought as a sin-offering that does not apply [even] to other sacrifices of the most sacred order. If blood from an animal brought as a sin-offering will spew from the container in which the blood was received onto a garment before [the blood] was sprinkled [on the altar], that garment is obligated to by washed with water in the Temple Courtyard, as [Leviticus 6:20] states: "If its blood is spewed on a garment, that which it has been spewed upon must be washed in a holy place."

2 A garment made from wool or linen, a soft hide, or a garment from goat's hair is required to be washed. A firm hide, however, is considered as wood and one should scrape the blood from it.

[The above applies to] the blood of sin-offerings that are eaten or those which are burnt, but not to sin-offerings from fowl, as implied by [ibid.: 18]: "the sin-offering will be slaughtered," i.e., the Torah is speaking about [an offering] that is slaughtered and not one that is killed by melikah.

3 When a sin-offering was disqualified, its blood need not be washed [from garments]. This applies whether there was a time when it could have been acceptable or there was never a time when it could have been acceptable.

What is meant by [an offering] that had a time when it could have been acceptable? One which was left overnight, that became impure, or that was taken outside of the Temple Courtyard. What is meant by [an offering] that never had a time when it could have been acceptable? One that was disqualified because of [the manner in which] it was slaughtered or the manner in which its blood was sprinkled.

4 Only the place where the blood [was absorbed] must be washed. [The above applies provided the garment or] utensil is susceptible to contract ritual impurity and is fit to be washed. If, however, the blood spews on a wooden utensil or a metal utensil, it need not be washed because it is not fit to be washed. Instead, one should merely scrape the blood off.

5 If [the blood] spewed onto the skin of a fish, it is not necessary to wash it, for [the skin of a fish] is not susceptible to ritual impurity. If it was spewed onto the hide of an animal that was not skinned, it need not be washed. If, however, [the hide] was skinned [from the animal], it must be washed. Even though it is not susceptible to ritual impurity in its present state, it will be susceptible to ritual impurity after it has been treated.

6 If blood spewed from [the animal's] neck onto a garment, it sputtered from the corner of the altar [to a garment], or the blood spilled to the floor [of the Temple Courtyard], it was gathered and then it spewed on to a garment, there is no requirement that [the garment] be washed, as [the prooftext] states: "If its blood is spewed...." [Implied is that the requirement] was stated only with regard to blood that was received in a sacred utensil and is fit to be sprinkled [on the altar], [because it is] of sufficient measure [to be sprinkled].

7 If the four presentations of blood were made and then some of the remainder of the blood spewed from the container onto a garment, it need not be washed even though the remainder of the blood was not yet poured out on the base [of the altar]. Similar principles apply with regard to the sin-offerings that are burnt.

8 [If the blood of a sin-offering] sputtered from [a priest's] finger after he performed its sprinkling with his hand, [the garment onto which it sputtered] need not be washed, because the remainder of the blood on his finger is not acceptable for sprinkling.

9 If [the blood] spewed from one garment to another, the second garment need not be washed. If [blood] spewed on an impure garment, it need not be washed.

If blood from a sin-offering sputtered onto a garment and then ordinary blood sputtered onto the blood from the sin-offering, it must be washed. If, however, ordinary blood - or even blood from a burnt-offering - sputtered onto a garment and then blood from a sin-offering sputtered on to it, it is not required to be washed, because [the blood from the sin-offering] is not absorbed in [the garment].

10 When the place [stained by] the blood is washed, it should be washed very thoroughly with water until no trace [of the blood] remains. All of the seven detergents that are used [to determine whether] a stain is blood or not should be used to [wash away] the blood of a sin-offering with the exception of urine, for urine should not be brought into the Temple.

11 An earthernware vessel in which a sin-offering that is to be eaten was cooked must be broken in the Temple Courtyard. A metal vessel in which [a sin-offering] was cooked must be cleansed and rinsed in water in the Temple Courtyard, as [Leviticus 6:21] states: "An earthenware vessel in which it is cooked shall be broken."

Although this verse does not state "in a holy place," the same laws that apply to washing [a garment] apply. Just as the washing must be performed in a sacred place, so too, the breaking of an earthenware vessel and the cleansing and the rinsing of a metal utensil must be performed in a holy place. [These laws apply equally to] a utensil in which [the sin-offering] was cooked and one into which it was poured while it was boiling.

12 "Cleansing" is performed with hot water and "rinsing" with cold water. The prooftext mentions "water," [excluding] wine, wine mixed with water, or other liquids. The thorough cleansing and rinsing [of the vessel] should resemble the thorough cleansing and rinsing of a cup.
A spit and a grill [used to cook the meat of a sin-offering] must be purged in water that is heated by fire and then washed [in cold water].

13 When does the above apply? When one cooked [sacrificial meat] in these utensils after their blood was sprinkled as required by law. If, however, he cooked in [these utensils] before the sprinkling [of the blood] or he cooked meat from sin-offerings that were to be burnt in such utensils, it is not necessary that they be washed thoroughly and rinsed.
If one cooked [the meat of a sin-offering] in [only] a portion of a utensil, the entire utensil must be washed thoroughly and rinsed.

14 There is an unresolved doubt [concerning the ruling] when meat [from a sacrificial offering] was roasted in the space of an earthenware oven: Must [the oven] be destroyed since [the meat] was cooked inside of it or need it not be destroyed, since it did not touch it? [The above] does not apply only with regard to a sin-offering. Instead, all utensils that were used for [meat] from sacrificial offerings with hot water, whether sacrifices of the highest degree of sanctity or sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity, are required to be washed thoroughly and rinsed after the time for eating from them. Similarly, a spit and a grill should be purged after eating [from the sacrifice which they were used to cook].

They should not be left until one desires to eat from them a second time. Instead, when the time for eating from them is completed, one should purge the grill and the spit and wash thoroughly and rinse the utensil whether it be a metal utensil or an earthenware utensil. [There is] one exception: [the meat from] a sin-offering. An earthenware utensil [in which it was cooked] must be broken. [Nevertheless,] one may cook [in a utensil] and do so a second and third time immediately, whether using a metal utensil or an earthenware utensil. [The requirement to] wash it thoroughly and rinse it [applies only] at the conclusion of the time permitted to partake [from these sacrificial foods].

15 Utensils made from animal turds, stone, or earth are not required to be thoroughly washed and rinsed even [when the meat of] a sin-offering was cooked in them. All that is necessary is that they be cleansed.

With regard to a sin-offering, [Leviticus 6:20] states: "Anything that will touch its meat will become sanctified," i.e., it will be of the same status. If it has been disqualified, anything that touches it is also disqualified. If it is kosher, anything that touches it should be eaten according to the laws that apply to it, with the same degree of holiness.

16 When does the above apply? When [the flavor of the meat of a sacrificial offering] was absorbed by it. If, however, it merely touched it, but its flavor was not absorbed, it does not cause it to become sanctified. The above applies both to a sin-offering and any other sacrificial offering, whether sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity or sacrifices of a severe degree of sanctity, as [implied by Leviticus 7:37]: "This is the law for the burnt-offering, the meal-offering...."

17 If the meat [of a sacrificial offering] touched a cake and [its flavor] was absorbed in a portion of it, [the cake] does not become sanctified in its entirety. Instead, one should cut off the portion in which it was absorbed.

18 [The following laws apply to] a utensil in which sacrificial food and ordinary food were cooked together or sacrifices of the highest degree of sanctity were cooked together with sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity. If there is a sufficient amount [of the sacrificial food] to impart its flavor, the entire mixture must be eaten according to the laws governing the food of the most severe category. The utensil must be thoroughly washed and rinsed according to the laws governing the food of the most severe category. If it did not impart its flavor to them, the foods of the more lenient category need not be eaten according to the laws governing the food of the most severe category and they are not governed by their laws at all. The utensil [in which the mixture was cooked], however, must be thoroughly washed and rinsed.

19 When the blood of a sin-offering sputtered on a garment and then that garment was taken out of the Temple Courtyard, it should be returned to the Temple Courtyard and washed there.

What should be done if [the garment] became impure outside the Temple Courtyard? It should be torn so that it will become pure. He should then bring it into [the Temple Courtyard] and wash it there. He must leave intact a portion of the garment the size of a handkerchief, for [the relevant verse] speaks of a "garment," i.e., a garment must be washed. Even though [the remnants of the garment] are impure due to Rabbinic decree, because of the remnant the size of a handkerchief, since the majority of it is torn, it is ritually pure according to Scriptural Law and it is permitted to bring it into the Sanctuary to wash out the blood.

20 What should be done when blood from a sin-offering sputtered on [the High Priest's] cloak, it was taken out [of the Temple Courtyard], and became impure? [The difficulty is that] one who tears it is liable for lashes, as we explained. He should bring it into [the Temple Courtyard] less than three fingerbreadths at a time and wash it in [the Temple Courtyard]. After all the blood has been washed off it little by little, it should be immersed [in a mikveh] outside [the Temple Courtyard].

21 When an earthen-ware utensil in which a sin-offering was cooked was taken out of the [Temple] Courtyard, it should be brought back in and broken there. If it became impure outside the Temple Courtyard, it should be perforated to the extent that a small root [could protrude through it] so that it will be ritually pure, and then bring it back inside [the Temple Courtyard] and break it there. If it is broken with a larger hole, it should not be broken in [the Temple Courtyard], because only utensils are broken there.

Similarly, when a metal utensil in which [sin-offerings] were cooked was taken out of the [Temple] Courtyard, it should be brought back in and thoroughly washed and rinsed there. If it became impure when it was taken out, its [bottom] should be opened until it becomes pure and then it should be brought back inside [the Temple Courtyard] [The metal] should then be flattened so that the opening becomes closed as is the form of utensils. Afterwards, it should be thoroughly washed and rinsed in the Temple Courtyard, as [Leviticus 6:21] states: "If [it was cooked] in a copper utensil, [it should be thoroughly washed and rinsed with water]." [Implied is that] only "utensils" are thoroughly washed in the Temple Courtyard.

1 It is a positive commandment to offer the guilt-offerings according to its statutes as they are written in the Torah. How are the guilt-offerings brought? Both the definite guilt offerings and the conditional guilt-offerings should be slaughtered and their blood should be sprinkled on the altar, as we explained. They are skinned, the portions offered on the altar are removed, salted, and tossed on [the altar's] pyre. If one desires to carry [these portions] to the altar in a [sacred] utensil, he may. The remainder of the meat is eaten by males of the priestly family according to [the laws that govern the consumption of] sin-offerings.

2 There is a difference with regard to [the laws governing] the acceptance of the blood of the guilt offering brought by a person who had been afflicted with tzara'at, as will be explained in Hilchot Mechusrei Kapparah. Nevertheless, all of its other procedures, the sprinkling of its blood on the altar, and its consumption are analogous to that required for other guilt-offerings in all regards.

3 It is a positive commandment to offer all the peace-offerings as commanded. There are four types: one is the communal peace-offerings and the [other] three are individual peace offerings.

4 What is the procedure for bringing the communal peace offerings? [The sacrificial lambs] should be slaughtered and their blood should be sprinkled on the altar, as we explained. They are skinned, the portions offered on the altar are removed, salted, and brought to be consumed by [the altar's] pyre. The remainder [of the meat] is eaten by males of the priestly family according to [the laws that govern the consumption of] a sin-offering and a guilt-offering, for these [sacrifices] are also sacrifices of the most sacred order, as we explained.

5 There are three types of individual peace-offerings:

a) a peace-offering that is brought without bread, e.g., the festive peace-offering or the peace-offering of celebration, they are called peace-offerings;

b) peace-offerings brought with bread because of a vow or a pledge; these are called thanksgiving offerings and the bread is called the bread of the thanksgiving offering;

c) the peace-offering brought by a nazirite on the day he completes his nazirite vow; this offering is accompanied by bread and is called the nazirite's ram.

6 What is the procedure for bringing these three [types of offerings]? [The sacrificial animals] should be slaughtered and their blood should be sprinkled on the altar, as we explained. They are skinned and the portions offered on the altar are removed. Afterwards, the meat is cut up and the breast and the right thigh are set aside. The portions to be offered together with the breast and the thigh are placed on the hands of the owners. A priest places his hands below the hands of the owner and performs tenufah with all these items "before God," to the east [of the Altar]. Whenever there is a requirement for tenufah, it is performed to the east [of the Altar].

7 How is tenufah performed? [The items] are taken [to each of the directions] and returned, lifted up and brought low. If the sacrifice was a thanksgiving offering, one should be taken from each [of the four] groups of ten breads that are brought with it and placed together with the breast, the thigh, and the portions offered on the altar. Tenufah should be performed with all of these items upon the owner's hands, as explained.

8 How are they placed on the owner's hands? The fats are placed on the owner's hands with the breast and the thigh above them. The two kidneys and the lobe of the liver are placed above them and if [the offering includes] bread, it is placed above them and tenufah is performed with all these items.

9 If the sacrifice was a nazirite's ram, [the priest] should remove the portions to be offered on the altar, set aside the breast and the thigh, and cook the remainder of the ram in the Women's Courtyard. The priest takes the cooked foreleg from the ram and one from each [of the two] groups of ten breads that are brought with it, together with the breast, the thigh, and the portions offered on the altar and places everything on the nazirite's hands. The priest places his hands under the owner's hands and moves all [items] as we described.

10 What is meant by the breast? The portion [of the animal's body] that faces the ground that extends from the neck until the belly. Two ribs on either side should be cut off [and given to the priest] together with it. What is meant by the foreleg? The portion from the upper-joint until the ankle joint; two limbs, one connected with the other. The foreleg that is mentioned refers to the right foreleg. The corresponding portion in the rear leg is the thigh that is referred to universally.

11 After tenufah is performed with [these portions], they are offered on the pyre of the altar except for the breast and the thigh that are eaten by the priests, as [Leviticus 7:34] states: "but the breast with which tenufah was performed and the thigh that was lifted up...." The remainder of the peace-offerings are consumed by the owner. The priests do not acquire the breast and the thigh until after the portions to be offered on the altar were placed on its pyre.

12 Similarly, the bread with which tenufah was performed from the thanksgiving offering and the nazirite's ram and the cooked foreleg are eaten by the priests. The remainder of the bread and the remainder of the meat are eaten by the owner. The bread with which tenufah was performed together with the breast and the thigh is referred to as "the elevated portion from the thanksgiving offering." The cooked foreleg together with the breast and the thigh and the bread with which tenufah was performed are referred to as "the elevated portion from the nazirite's ram."

13 There is an unresolved doubt whether the bread from the elevated portion of the thanksgiving offering is categorized as terumah or not. Therefore one is not liable for death, nor to repay an additional fifth, [as one is when partaking of] terumah. Nor is a mixture of it subject to the laws of dimua as is a mixture of terumah.

14 If the person bringing the thanksgiving offering was a priest, the remainder of the bread may be eaten by the owner like a thanksgiving offering brought by an Israelite. For the bread that accompanies a thanksgiving offering or a nazrite's ram is not called a meal offering.

15 When two people bring a peace-offering in partnership, one should perform tenufah with the other's permission. Even if there are 100 [partners], one should perform tenufah for the sake of all of them. This does not apply with regard to semichah.

16 When a woman is the one bringing a sacrifice, she does not perform tenufah with it. The priest must perform that rite, for the sacrifice requires that tenufah be performed with it and a woman is unacceptable to perform that rite. A woman never performs tenufah except in two instances: a sotah and a female nazirite, as we explained. Tenufah should always be performed before [the elements of the sacrifice] are brought close to the altar.

17 What is meant by the bread that is brought together with the thanksgiving offering? One should take 20 isaronim of fine flour. He should make ten isaronim leavened and ten unleavened. The ten that are made leaven should be made into ten loaves.

18 How are they made leavened? He should bring enough yeast to cause the dough to leaven and place it in the measure of an isaron. He then fills the measure. Even though ultimately, [the measure] will be lacking or excessive because of the yeast, for at times [the yeast] will be thick and hard and at times it will be soft [and inflated], we are concerned only with its measure at the present time. Hence he should measure full isaronim.
From the ten isaronim for the unleavened bread, he should make 30 loaves of the same size, ten of each [of the following three] types: ten loaves baked in an oven, ten loaves of flat-cakes, and ten loaves of fried cakes.

19 How are the fried cakes prepared? [The cakes] should be scalded with boiling water. Then they should be baked slightly and then fried in oil in a roasting pot or the like, like doughnuts and fried. A large amount of oil is used for them. This is the deep frying process mentioned in all places.

20 How much oil is used to prepare these 30 loaves? Half a log of oil. This measure is a halachah communicated to Moses from Sinai. A fourth is used for the fried doughballs, an eighth for the loaves [baked in the oven], and an eighth for the wafers.

21 With regard to the loaves [that are baked]: their flour should saturate in the eighth [of a log]. Afterwards, they should be kneaded and baked. The oil should be poured over the wafers after they have been baked.
The priest takes four loaves from the entire [mixture], one of each type, as [Leviticus 7:14] states: "One from each [type], a sacrifice."

22 When one made [only] four loaves for the bread for the thanksgiving offering, he has fulfilled his obligation. [The Torah] mentions 40 only as [the optimum way of fulfilling] the mitzvah. [This applies] provided he separates a challah from each of the types of sacrifices while they are still dough. For a piece of bread may not be separated [as a sacrificial portion]. [This is implied by the prooftext:] "One from each [type], a sacrifice," that the priest should not receive a portion.

23 What is meant by the bread that is brought together with the nazirite's ram? He should take six and two thirds isaronim of flour and make 20 equal sized loaves from them. They must all be unleavened bread. Ten should be wafers with oil poured over them and ten loaves whose flour was saturated in oil. The entire amount should be baked in an oven. A fourth [of a log] of oil is used for them. This measure is a halachah communicated to Moses at Sinai. The priest takes two of the loaves, one from each type.

24 Each of the two types of bread [brought by] a Nazirite and the four types of bread brought for the thanksgiving offering is an absolute necessity. The bread for both these offerings is prepared outside the Temple Courtyard.

25 How are the firstborn, tithe, and Paschal sacrifices offered? After their blood is poured on the altar as we explained, they are skinned, the portions offered on the altar are removed, salted, and placed on [the altar's] pyre. The remainder of the meat of the firstborn offering is eaten by the priests. The remainder of the meat of the tithe sacrifice is eaten by the owner. The remainder of the meat of the Paschal sacrifice is eaten by those enumerated upon it according to its laws, as will be explained in Hilchot [Korban] Pesach.

Chapter 10

1 It is a positive commandment for the sin offerings and the guilt-offerings to be eaten, as [Exodus 29:33] states: "And they shall eat [the sacrifices] which convey atonement." The priests eat the sacrifices and the owners receive atonement. This also applies to other sacrifices that are eaten by the priests; partaking of them is a mitzvah.

2 Similarly, partaking of the portion that remains from the meal offerings is a positive commandment, as [Leviticus 6:9] states: "What remains of it shall be eaten by Aaron and his sons."

3 The sin-offering, the guilt-offering, and the remnants of the meal-offering may be eaten only by males of the priestly family in the Temple Courtyard. If they were eaten in the Temple building, their consumption is [acceptable], as [indicated by Numbers 18:9-10]: "For all of their meal-offerings, for all of their sin-offerings, and for all of their guilt-offerings.... In the most holy place, you shall partake of it. All males shall partake of it." Similarly, the communal peace-offerings are similar to the sin-offerings and the guilt-offerings, as we explained.

4 The breast and the thigh of the peace-offerings are eaten by both males and females of the priestly family, for with regard to these [Numbers 18:11] states: "I have given it to you, to your sons and your daughters." This also applies to the elevated portions of the thanksgiving offering and the nazirite's ram, [ibid.:19] states: "All of the elevated portions of the consecrated [offerings] that the children of Israel shall raise up have I given to you, your sons, and your daughters."

5 The same applies with regard to the firstborn offering, for concerning it [ibid.:18] states: "Their meat shall be yours, like the breast with which tenufah was performed and the right thigh."

All of these [portions of sacrificial meat] that may be eaten by the women of the priestly family may be eaten by the priests' servants and their wives, like terumah. All [these sacrifices] may be eaten throughout the city [of Jerusalem], as [Leviticus 10:14] states: "And the breast with which tenufah was performed and the thigh that was lifted up shall you eat in a pure place." It was not specified that they [be eaten] "in a holy place," which would mean "the Temple Courtyard," but "in a pure place." This refers to the camp of the Israelites. The parallel with regard to future generations is the city of Jerusalem.

The same laws apply to the tithe offering and the Paschal sacrifice, for they are sacrifices of lesser sanctity like the peace-offerings. The windows and the thickness of the wall is considered as being within [the city].

6 The peace-offerings may be eaten on the day they were slaughtered, throughout the [following] night, and throughout the following day until sunset, as [Leviticus 7:16-18] states: "On the day when his sacrifice was offered, it shall be eaten and on its morrow... If one would partake of the peace-offering on the third day...." Thus one can derive that they may be eaten for two days and one night. [This applies both] to the portion of the priests and the portions of the owners. This also applies to the firstborn and tithe offerings, for they are also sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity, like the peace-offerings.

7 The thanksgiving-offering, by contrast, even though it is one of the sacrifices of lesser sanctity, may be eaten only on the day of its sacrifice and the [following] night, as [ibid.:15] states: "It shall be eaten on the day it was offered. Do not leave anything from it until the morning." This also applies to the nazirite's ram and the bread which accompanies [these offerings], both to the portion of the priests and the portion of the owner. This also applies to the sin-offering, the guilt-offering, the communal peace-offerings, and the remainder of the meal-offerings. All of these are eaten for a day and [the following] night, as it is written: "It shall be eaten on the day it was offered." This appears to include all of the sacrifices with the exception of the peace-offerings concerning which the Torah explicitly [stated otherwise] and the firstborn and tithe offerings which resemble the peace-offerings.

8 According to Scriptural Law, all of these [sacrifices] that may be eaten on the day [of their sacrifice] and the [following] night may be eaten until dawn. In order to separate a person from sin, our Sages said that they may only be eaten until midnight.

9 All of the sacrifices - both those of the highest degree of sanctity and those of a lesser degree - may be eaten only by those who are ritually pure and who are circumcised. Even if the duration of the person's impurity has concluded, but he has not brought the [necessary] atonement, he may not partake of sacrificial foods. A tumtum may not partake of sacrificial foods, because there is an unresolved doubt whether he is uncircumcised. It appears to me that an androgynus may partake of sacrifices of lesser sanctity.

10 It is permitted to eat sacrificial meat together with any other food. Even the priests are permitted to eat their portions - both from the sacrifices of the highest degree of sanctity and those of a lesser degree - together with any other food. And they may change the manner [in which it is prepared] to be eaten, eating them roasted, lightly cooked, or thoroughly cooked and to spice them with spices that are not consecrated. They may not, however, spice them with spices that are terumah, lest this cause the terumah to be disqualified.

The bones that remain are permitted [to be used for any purpose]. A person may make any utensil he desires from them.

11 If there was only a small amount [of sacrificial meat], ordinary food and terumah should be eaten with it so that it will be eaten in a satisfying manner. If there is a large amount [of sacrificial meat], ordinary food and terumah should not be eaten with it so that one will not have overeaten. Similar concepts apply with regard to the remainder of the meal offerings.

12 A sin-offering and a guilt-offering should not be cooked together with the elevated portion of the thanksgiving-offering or the elevated portion of the nazirite's ram because doing so restricts the type of people able to partake of them and the place where they can be eaten. Nor may one [cook] the elevated portion of the thanksgiving-offering or the elevated portion of the nazirite's ram with the breast and thigh of the peace-offering because doing so restricts the time in which they may be eaten. Nor may the elevated portion of yesterday's peace-offering [be cooked] with a sin-offering or a guilt-offering brought today because doing so restricts the type of people able to partake of them, the place where they can be eaten, and the time in which they may be eaten.

One may, however, cook sin-offerings and guilt-offerings together, the thanksgiving offering and the nazirite's ram together, and the firstborn offering and the breast and the thigh [of the thanksgiving offering] together.

If one cooked a piece [of meat] from the sacrifices of the most sacred order, one that was piggul, or one that was notar with other pieces of sacrificial meat, those other pieces are forbidden to non-priests and permitted to priests.

13 When meat from the sacrifices of the most sacred order or sacrifices of lesser sanctity is cooked together with ordinary meat, the ordinary meat is forbidden to those who are ritually impure and permitted to those who are ritually pure.

14 With regard to a burnt-offering, [Leviticus 7:8] states: "The hide of the burnt-offering which the priest sacrificed will belong to him." With regard to a sin-offering, [ibid. 6:19] states: "The priest who performs the sin-offering shall partake of it." With regard to a guilt-offering, [ibid. 7:7] states: "It will belong to the priest who brings about atonement because of it." With regard to a peace-offering, [ibid.:14] states: "It will belong to the priest who pours the blood of the peace-offering." And with regard to the meal-offering, it is written: "The priest who offers it shall partake of it."

In all the above instances, the verses are not referring [to the priest who actually brings the offering, but] to [any priest] who is fit to have done so. Any priest who is fit to perform the service has a right to share in the division [of the sacrifice] to partake of it. [Conversely,] one who is not fit [to serve] at the time it is offered, e.g., he was ritually impure, does not have a right to share in the division [of the sacrifice] to partake of it even if he will regain ritual purity in the evening.

With regard to the division, the entire [matter] is given to the men of the clan who offer sacrifices that day. They all share in the division of all of the sacraments of the Temple, each man [receiving the same portion] as his brother, whether he was the one who offered the sacrifice or he was together with him in the Temple, but did not offer the sacrifice.

15 Why did the verse make a distinction between the meal-offerings that are baked and the meal-offerings of flour? For with regard to [the meal-offerings] that are baked, [Leviticus 7:9] states: "Any meal-offering that is baked in an oven... it will belong to the priest who offers it" and with regard to the meal-offerings of flour [ibid.:10] states: "Any meal-offering that is mixed with oil or that is parched shall belong to all the sons of Aaron, every man like his brother."

[The following explanation can be given:] When [the meal-offerings] that are baked are divided among the members of the clan, whenever a person receives a portion, even if it is [merely] an olive-sized portion of bread, it is fit for him to partake of it, because it may be eaten immediately. When, however, we are speaking of flour, if [such an offering] will be divided among them, there will be those who will receive only a handful of flour or less. This is not fit either to be kneaded into dough or to be baked. Hence, one might think that one meal offering should be apportioned in consideration of another meal-offering instead of dividing each meal-offering individually among all the members of the clan. Therefore it is necessary for the Torah to state [that it] "shall belong to all the sons of Aaron, every man like his brother," i.e., that it is divided individually.

On this basis, our Sages said: that a meal offering is not divided in consideration of another meal-offering, not even one offering brought in a flat frying pan in consideration of another such offering or one flour-offering in consideration of another such offering. Instead, what remains from every [offering] is divided individually.

16 Similarly, an offering of fowl is not apportioned in consideration of another such offering, nor a sin-offering in consideration of another such offering, nor a breast and a thigh in consideration of another such portion. Instead, every [sacrificial portion] is divided among all [the members of the clan] equally.

17 Even though it is permitted to feed a minor [meat even] from sacrifices of the highest degree of sanctity, he is not given a portion, even from sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity. Similarly, a woman and an androgynus are not given a portion of the sacrifices from the Temple at all, as [the above verse] states: "Every man like his brother."
[A priest] who has a disqualifying physical blemish - whether permanent or temporary, whether he was born with it or born unblemished and later disqualified - receives a portion of the sacrifices and may partake of them, as [Leviticus 21:22] states: "The food of his God, of the most sacred order... he may eat." [The above applies] provided he is fit to partake [of the sacrifice at the time it is offered]. If, however, he is impure, he is not given a portion to eat in the evening.

18 The High Priest may partake [of any of the sacrifices] without a division having been made. Rather, he may take whatever he desires.

19 All [priests] who are fit to partake of sacrificial foods at the time the sacrifice is offered receive a share [of the sacrifice] to partake of. All [priests] who are not fit to partake of sacrificial foods at the time the sacrifice is offered, even though they are fit to perform sacrificial service and will be fit to partake [of the sacrifice in the evening] do not receive a share [of the sacrifice] to set aside until the evening.

What is implied? A priest who has immersed that day, one who is lacking in atonement, or one who is onein on the day of burial, whether a High Priest or an ordinary priest, should not receive a share of the sacrifices in order to partake of them in the evening.

20 All [priests] who are not fit to partake of sacrificial foods are not fit to perform sacrificial service with the exception of a High Priest who is an onein who may offer sacrifices, but may not partake [of sacrificial foods], as we explained. All [priests] who are not fit to perform sacrificial service are not fit to partake of sacrificial foods except one disqualified because of a physical blemish [whose license to partake of sacrificial foods] is explicitly stated in the Torah.

21 All [priests] who do not receive a portion of the sacrificial meat do not receive a portion of the hides of the sacrifices. Even if a priest was impure at the time when the blood [of a sacrifice] was sprinkled on the altar, but pure at the time its fats were offered on the altar's pyre, he does not receive a portion of the sacrificial meat, as [Leviticus 7:33] states: "One who offers the blood of the peace-offering and the fat from the sons of Aaron, to him the right thigh will be [given] as a portion." [Implied is that] the priest must be pure and fit to perform service from the time [the blood] is sprinkled until after the fats are offered.

22 If [a priest] became impure after [the blood of the sacrifice] was sprinkled [on the altar] and immersed himself and thus was also pure when the fats were offered on the altar's pyre, there is an unresolved question whether or not he receives a portion. Therefore if he grabs a portion, it is not expropriated from him.

23 When a communal sacrifice is offered in a state of impurity, even though impure priests [could have] offered it, they do not receive a portion together with the priests who are pure to partake of it in the evening, because they are not fit to partake of it [at the time it is offered].

Chapter 11

1 Anyone who eats an olive-sized portion of the meat of a burnt-offering, whether before its blood is sprinkled [on the altar] or afterwards, is liable for lashes, as [implied by Deuteronomy 12:17]: "You may not eat in your gates the tithe of your grain... and [the sacrifices brought because of] the vows that you take." According to the Oral Tradition, it was taught that this is a warning against partaking of the meat of a burnt-offering.

2 Its fat, its meat, and the flour, oil, and wine of its accompanying offering - all five [of these components] can be combined to comprise this olive-sized portion.

3 Similarly, one who partakes of an olive-sized portion of any of the portions of the sacrifices to be offered on the altar's pyre, whether before the blood [of the sacrifice] is sprinkled [on the altar] or afterwards, whether he is a priest or an Israelite, is liable for lashes. For the portions to be offered on the altar's pyre must be totally consumed like the totality of the burnt offering. Now [Leviticus 6:16] states with regard to a meal-offering of a priest: "It shall be totally consumed; it should not be eaten." [From this, we derive that] there is a negative commandment [prohibiting] partaking of anything that should be consumed by [the fire of] the altar. One is liable for lashes for eating an olive-sized portion [of such substances].

Similarly, anyone who eats an olive-sized portion of any of the sin-offerings that must be burnt is liable for lashes, as [ibid.:23] states: "Any sin-offering whose blood is brought into the Tent of Meeting... should not be eaten. It should be burnt with fire."

4 Anyone who partakes of an olive-sized portion of the meat of any of the sacrifices - even sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity - before their blood is sprinkled [on the altar] is liable for lashes, as it is written: "You may not eat in your gates the tithe of your grain, your wine, and your oil... and [the sacrifices brought because of] your pledges." Implied is that you may not eat [the sacrifices brought because of] your pledges in your gates before their blood is sprinkled [on the altar] in God's gates.

According to the Oral Tradition, it was taught that this is a warning against partaking of [the meat of] a thanksgiving-offering or a peace-offering before the sprinkling of its blood. This also applies to [the meat of] other sacrifices, whether sacrifices of the highest order of sanctity or those of a lesser degree. The six components of the thanksgiving offering, the fat, the meat, the flour, the oil, the wine, and the bread, may all be combined to comprise the olive-sized portion [for which one is liable].

5 Anyone who partakes of an olive-sized portion of the meat of any of the [sacrifices of] the most sacred order that was taken outside of the walls of the Temple Courtyard, and meat from [sacrifices of] a lesser degree of sanctity that was taken outside Jerusalem, is liable for lashes, as [implied by] the verse: "You may not eat in your gates the tithe of your grain, your wine, your oil, and the firstborn of your cattle and your sheep...." According to the Oral Tradition, it was taught that this is a warning against partaking of [the meat of] a sin-offering or a guilt-offering outside the Temple Courtyard. Similarly, one who partakes of [the meat of] the sacrifices of lesser sanctity outside Jerusalem is liable for lashes. For with regard to sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity, the walls of Jerusalem are comparable to the walls of the Temple Courtyard with regard to sacrifices of the most sacred order. [Included equally are] the meat of the sin-offerings and the guilt-offerings and what remains of the meal-offerings.

6 Meat from [sacrifices of] the most sacred order that was taken outside of the walls of the Temple Courtyard, and meat from [sacrifices of] a lesser degree of sanctity that was taken outside Jerusalem, is disqualified and is forbidden forever. Even if it is taken back to its place, it is forbidden to partake of it. One who eats an olive-sized portion of it is liable for lashes, as [implied by Exodus 22:30]: "Meat in a field [from an animal that is] treifah, you shall not eat." Once meat has left its designated place, it is considered as treifah, as we explained in Hilchot Ma'achalot Assurot.

7 If meat from [sacrifices of] a lesser degree of sanctity was taken into the Temple Building, it is acceptable.

8 A non-priest who ate an olive-sized portion of meat from sacrifices of the most sacred order in the Temple Courtyard after their blood was sprinkled [on the altar] is liable for lashes, as [Exodus 29:33] states: "And they shall partake of [the sacrifices] which bring them atonement... and a non-priest shall not partake of them." [The association teaches that when sacrificial meat] was eaten by a non-priest in a place where a priest partakes of it and at a time when it is fit to be eaten, he is liable for lashes. If, however, a non-priest ate an olive-sized portion of meat from sacrifices of the most sacred order outside [the Temple Courtyard], he is liable for lashes for partaking of the sacrificial meat outside [the Temple Courtyard] and not because [of the prohibition against] a non-priest partaking of sacrificial foods, for they are not fit to be eaten by priests there. Similarly, if [a non-priest] partook of [such meat] in the Temple Courtyard before [the blood] was sprinkled [on the altar], he is liable for lashes only for partaking [of the meat] before the sprinkling of the blood, not because of [partaking of it] as a non-priest.

9 A non-priest who ate an olive-sized portion of meat from a sin-offering from fowl is liable for two sets of lashes: one because he is non-priest partaking of sacred meat and one because he is partaking of a neveilah. For every [fowl killed by] melikah is a neveilah. When license was granted to partake of it, it was granted to priests, but not to non-priests. These two prohibitions are considered as two prohibitions that take effect at the same time, as we explained.

1 Meal-offerings are a type of sacrifice. The meal-offerings that are offered independently and not as part of the accompanying offerings include both communal meal-offerings and individual meal-offerings.

2 All of the meal-offerings are brought from fine wheat flour with the exception of the meal offering of a sotah, and the omer with which tenufah is performed, which are brought from barley.

3 There are three types of communal meal-offerings:
a) the omer with which tenufah is performed. [A portion of] it is offered on the altar, as will be explained.
b) the two breads offered on Shavuot. They are called a meal-offering, but are not offered on the altar and are chametz. Concerning them, [Leviticus 2:12] states: "You shall offer them as a sacrifice of first fruits to God, but they shall not be offered on the altar."
c) The third meal-offering is the showbread that is brought every Sabbath. They are not offered on the altar, but instead are eaten entirely by the priests, as will be explained.

4 There are nine types of individual meal-offerings. They are all offered on the altar. They include:
a) the meal-offering of a sinner when he is obligated to bring a sin-offering, but is financially incapable.
b) the meal offering of a sotah; it is the meal-offering of jealously. The manner in which it was offered has already been described.
c) the meal-offering that every priest brings at the outset when he enters the Temple service the first time. He brings it himself. It is called the meal-offering of initiation.

d) the meal-offering that the High Priest would offer every day. It is called the chavitin [offering];

e) a meal-offering of fine flour. It is brought as either a vow or a pledge;

f) a flat-pan flour-offering. It is brought as either a vow or a pledge;

g) a deep-pan flour-offering. It is brought as either a vow or a pledge;

h) a flour-offering baked in an oven. It is brought as either a vow or a pledge;

i) an offering of wafers. It is brought as either a vow or a pledge.

5 With regard to all of the meal-offerings that are brought to the altar, none may be less than an isaron, this an absolute requirement for the offering to be acceptable.

A person may pledge and vow as large a quantity as he desires, even 1000 isaronim for any of the five meal-offerings that are brought as a pledge or a vow. By contrast, the meal-offering of the omer, the meal-offering of a sinner, the meal-offering of jealously, the meal-offering of initiation, and the chavitin offering must each be one isaron, neither more or less.

6 All of the meal-offerings that are brought to the altar must be brought close to the altar on its western side, facing the tip of its southwest corner. Tenufah is not required for them with the exception of the meal-offering of a sotah and the omer [offering]. Both of them require both tenufah and being brought close to the altar.

7 All of the meal-offerings that are brought to the altar require that oil and frankincense be placed upon them, a log of oil for every isaron [of flour] and a handful of frankincense for every meal-offering whether it comprised one isaron or 60 isaronim - [the latter measure is mentioned because] more than 60 isaronim are never brought in one container, as will be explained - with the exception of the meal-offering of jealously and the meal-offering of a sinner, as [Leviticus 5:11] states: "He shall not place oil upon it, nor shall he place frankincense upon it."

8 If one placed [oil and/or frankincense on these offerings] and offered them, he is liable for the oil individually and the frankincense individually. If one placed a container holding oil or frankincense on the offering, he does not transgress, nor does he disqualify [the offerings]. Oil must be added to each of the initiation and chavitin meal-offerings, as will be explained.

9 A handful is taken from all of the meal-offerings that are brought to the altar. That handful is offered on the altar in its entirety and the remainder [of the offering] is eaten by the priests with the exception of a meal-offering brought by a male priest. A handful is not taken from such an offering. Instead, the entire offering is offered on the altar's pyre, as [Leviticus 6:16] states: "Every meal-offering from a priest [is offered on the pyre in its entirety]." From this we learn that all [of the following offerings]: an initiation and chavitin meal-offering or a meal-offering of a sinner or a free-will meal-offering brought by a priest are all offered on the altar's pyre and a handful is not taken from them.

10 A handful is taken from a meal-offering brought by a woman of the priestly family as it is taken from the meal-offerings brought by Israelites and the remainder of it is eaten.

11 When sons [from a priestly family and one of Israelites] become intermingled and each of their identities are doubtful, a handful is taken from a meal-offering [brought by either], as is done with regard to a meal-offering brought by an Israelite, but [the remainder] is not eaten, as is done with a meal-offering brought by a priest.
What is done? The handful alone is offered on the altar and the remainder is scattered over the ash heap.

12 The meal-offerings brought by all women married to a priest - whether from the priestly family or Israelites - are not eaten, because of the portion of the husband [present within them], nor is it offered on the pyre in its entirety, because of the portion of the woman. Instead, a handful alone is offered on the altar and the remainder is scattered over the ash heap.
The handful may be taken in any place within the Temple Courtyard. If it was taken in the Temple Building, it is acceptable.

13 A meal-offering may be consecrated by [placing the flour] in a container [even] while it is placed on the ground. [Similarly,] the handful may be taken from a container [placed] on the ground, [but] the handful may not be consecrated in a container [placed] on the ground.
When is the remainder of a meal-offering permitted to be eaten? When the fire [of the altar] has consumed most of the handful.

14 All of the meal-offerings that are brought to the altar are unleavened. Similarly, although the remaining portions of the meal-offerings that may be eaten by the priests may be eaten with all foods and with a sweetener, they may not be eaten while leavened, as [Leviticus 6:10] states: "It shall not be baked leavened; their portion...." [Implied is that] even their portion may not be leavened. If they cause the remaining portion to become leavened, they are liable for lashes. One who performs an act that causes [the remaining portion of the meal-offering] to be leavened after it was leavened, is liable. One is liable for each act [that causes the remnants of the meal-offering to leaven].

15 What is implied? If one mixed [the remnants of a meal-offering] with water in a manner that causes them to leaven, one kneaded them in a manner that causes them to leaven, one shaped the loaves in such a manner, or baked them in such a manner, he is liable for lashes, as [Leviticus 2:11] states: "It shall not be prepared as leavened." [Now it is also written:] "It shall not be baked leavened." [Why are the two verses necessary?] To make one liable for every individual act performed [in its preparation]. If one prepared it as leavened from the beginning to the end, one is liable for lashes for every individual act performed.

16 If one left yeast on a dough and then departed and sat elsewhere and [let] it leaven on its own accord, he is liable for lashes, for placing yeast [on the dough] is a deed.

17 If one dipped the remainder [of a meal-offering] in caraway or sesame seeds or any type of spice or oil, it is acceptable. It is matzah; it is merely called spiced matzah.

18 A person who causes a meal-offering that was disqualified to become leavened is exempt, as [implied by Leviticus 2:11]: "which will be offered to God; it should not be prepared as leaven." [We can infer that the prohibition applies when the offering is] acceptable to God, not when it is disqualified.

If one caused [a meal-offering] to become leaven while it was acceptable and then it was taken outside the Temple Courtyard, and he then caused it to leaven again after it was disqualified, he is not liable for lashes. If one caused [a meal-offering] to become leavened at the top of the altar, he is not liable for lashes, for it is written "which will be offered," and this [offering] was already offered and it is acceptable.

19 One who causes the showbread to become leaven is liable for lashes, for [the verse cited] states: "Any meal-offering." [Causing] the meal-offering of the accompanying offering [to leaven] does not incur liability for lashes. For if [the flour] was mixed with water, it was disqualified before it became leavened. And if it was mixed with the oil of the accompanying offerings, it is considered as fruit-juice and it does not cause [dough] to leaven.

20 We do not soak the wheat kernels for the meal-offerings, lest they leaven. For they would be soaked outside [the Temple Courtyard] and not everyone is ardent [enough] to watch them [so that they do not leaven].

With regard to the meal-offering of the omer, since it is a communal offering, [the kernels] are soaked, for [those acting on behalf of] the Jewish people as a whole are ardent and watch it.

21 All of the meal-offerings that are baked should be mixed with lukewarm water and watched so that they do not leaven. [This is permitted,] because they are mixed and baked within the Temple Courtyard and [the priests] inside [the Temple Courtyard] are ardent.

22 In the place where the sacrifices of the most sacred order are cooked, the meal-offerings are baked, as [Ezekiel 46:20] states: "This is the place where the priests will cook the guilt-offering and the sin-offering, where they will bake the meal-offering...."

23 The grinding and the sifting [of the flour] for the meal-offerings is performed outside [the Temple Courtyard], while the mixing of the dough, the kneading, and the baking are performed inside.
All of the acts [necessary to prepare it] are acceptable [when performed] by a non-priest until it reaches the stage where the handful [of flour] is separated. There were a flat frying pan and a deep frying pan in the Temple Courtyard. They were both considered as sacred utensils and caused [the substances placed in them] to be sanctified. The oven in the Temple Courtyard was made of metal.

Chapter 13

1 It is a positive commandment to prepare all of the meal-offerings

according to the commandments prescribed by the Torah.

2 How was the chavitin offering of the High Priest prepared? He would bring an entire isaron and sanctify it and then divide it in half with the half isaron measure in the Temple. [This was necessary,] because even though it was offered in half [portions], it was not sanctified in half portions. Three lugim of oil are brought with it, as [Leviticus 6:13] states: "You shall prepare it with oil," i.e., [an amount of] oil equivalent to the accompanying offering for a lamb should be added to it. The flour should be mixed with the oil and then scalded with boiling [liquid].
Each half isaron should be kneaded into six loaves. Thus there are a total of twelve loaves.

3 [These loaves] were prepared one by one.
How were they prepared? The three lugim of oil would be divided [into twelve] using the measure of a revi'it [of a log] that existed in the Temple, a revi'it for each loaf. The loaf would be baked some and then fried on the flat frying-pan with the remainder of its oil. It should not be cooked very much, for [Leviticus 6:14] uses the term tufinei which implies something between cooked and lightly cooked.

4 Afterwards, each loaf should be divided into two by approximation, so that half can be offered in the morning and half in the evening. He should take the halves and fold each one of them in half and then divide [the loaves at] the folds so that each flat cake will be folded in half. He then offers the halves with half of a handful of frankincense in the morning and the remaining half with half a handful of frankincense in the evening.

If it is an initiation offering, it is not divided in half. Instead, it is offered entirely as a single entity together with the handful of frankincense. Both of them are consumed entirely by the altar's pyre.

5 How is a meal-offering of fine flour prepared? One brings an isaron - or several isaronot or [many,] according to his vow - of fine flour and the oil appropriate for it. The flour should be measured in the isaron measure of the Temple. Oil should be placed in a container and the flour poured upon it, and then other oil should be poured over the flour and the flour mixed in it. Afterwards, it is placed in a sacred vessel and oil is poured into it. The total of the oil placed first, that mixed with the flour, and that poured upon it is a log for an issaron. Frankincense is placed upon it.

6 How are a meal-offering [cooked in] a flat frying-pan and one [cooked in] a deep frying pan prepared? Oil should be placed in a container and the flour poured upon it and then other oil should be poured over the flour and the flour mixed in it. Afterwards, it should be kneaded with warm water and baked in a flat frying-pan or a deep frying-pan as he vowed. It is broken into pieces and placed in a sacred vessel and the remainder of the oil is poured upon it. [Then] its frankincense is placed [upon it].

7 What is the difference between a flat frying-pan and a deep frying pan? A deep frying-pan has an edge and the dough cooked in it is soft, because since it has an edge, [the dough] does not drip off. The flat frying-pan does not have an edge. The dough cooked in it is firm so that it will not drip off to either side.

8 How is a meal-offering baked in an oven prepared? If it is of loaves, one should mix the flour with oil, knead it with warm water, and bake it. [Afterwards,] it is broken into pieces, placed in a sacred utensil, and its frankincense is placed upon it. Oil is not poured over it, as [indicated by Leviticus 2:4]: "loaves of matzah mixed with oil."

If it is of wafers, one should knead the flour with warm water and smear the wafers with oil, as [ibid.] states "wafers of matzah smeared with oil." It appears to me that they should be smeared after they are baked.

9 How are they smeared? One brings a log of oil for every isaron and smears them and then smears them again until all of the oil in the log is finished.

10 All of these four types of baked meal-offerings, when they are baked, they are baked when dividing [each] isaron into ten loaves. If, however, one added or subtracted loaves, it is acceptable.

How are they broken into pieces? Each loaf should be folded into two and then the double fold into four and then [the folds] should be separated. If the meal-offering was brought by males of the priestly family, they should not be separated and broken off. All of the pieces should be the size of an olive. If, however, one made them larger or smaller, [the offering] is acceptable.

11 If one did not mix [the oil into the meal], fold [the loaves], bring [the meal-offering to the corner of the altar], or smear the wafers [with oil], [the offerings] are acceptable. All of these matters were mentioned only as a mitzvah, for it is a mitzvah [to bring the meal-offerings] in this manner.

12 What is the order in which the meal-offering is brought? A person should bring flour from his home in a container of silver, gold, or another type of metal, a container that is fit [to be sanctified] as a sacred vessel.

If it is a meal-offering of flour, he should place it in a sacred utensil and consecrate it in the sacred utensil. If it is one of the meal-offerings that are baked it should be baked there in the Temple and broken into pieces as we explained. The pieces should be placed into a sacred utensil and its oil and frankincense placed upon it. It should then be brought to a priest who brings it to the altar. He approaches the southwest corner of the altar with it. That is sufficient.

He then moves all of its frankincense to one side and gathers a handful from the place where the majority of its oil has collected, as [Leviticus 2:2] states: "[He shall take a full handful] from its flour and from its oil." He places the handful in a sacred vessel and consecrates it in the sacred vessel. If a handful [from a meal-offering] was divided into two vessels, it is not consecrated. [Instead,] he should go back and consecrate it [in a single vessel].

He should gather all of its frankincense and place it on the handful of flour in the vessel and take it up to the altar. He should salt it and place it on the pyre with a sacred utensil. If the meal-offering is brought by [male] priests, he does not take a handful. Instead, he salts the entire offering and tosses everything on the pyre.

13 How is a handful [of flour] taken from those meal-offerings from which it is taken? As any person would take a handful. He extends his fingers over the palm of his hand and closes them.

If he gathered the flour only with his fingertips or from the side [of the container], he should not offer it on the altar's pyre. If he does so, nevertheless, it is accepted. If he added to the handful, i.e., he spread out his fingers and closed them, it is unacceptable.

14 A handful should not be less than two olive-sized portions. [Bringing every] portion of the handful is an absolute requirement in [bringing] the entire handful. [Bringing both] the handful [of flour] and the frankincense are absolute requirements for [bringing] either of them. [Bringing both] the flour and the oil are absolute requirements for [bringing] either of them. [Bringing] even a portion of the oil is an absolute requirement in [bringing] the entire quantity. Less than a log [of oil] should not [be brought] for every isaron of flour, as we explained.

1 A person may vow or pledge to bring a burnt-offering, a peace-offering, or any of the five types of meal-offerings that may be brought as vows or as pledges. And he may vow or pledge [to bring] a meal offering from one of the three types of meal-offerings that serve as the accompanying offerings, as we explained. One may pledge or vow wine as an independent offering, frankincense as an independent offering, oil as an independent offering, or wood for the arrangement [of wood on the altar], for that is like a sacrifice, as [Nechemiah 13:31] states: "for the sacrifice of wood."

2 Two people may pledge or vow one sacrifice, a burnt-offering or a peace-offering, even one turtle-dove and large ordinary dove in partnership. A meal-offering, by contrast, may not be brought in partnership. These matters were conveyed by the Oral Tradition.

3 When a person set aside a meal-offering for [the merit of] his two sons and died, they may both bring it.

4 What is meant by a vow and what is meant by a pledge? When one says: "I promise to bring a burnt-offering," "I promise to bring a peace-offering," "I promise to bring a meal-offering," or "I promise to bring the value of this animal as a burnt-offering" or "...as a peace-offering," this is considered a vow. If, however, he said: "This animal..." or "The value of this animal is [designated as] a burnt-offering," or "...a peace-offering," or "This isaron [of flour] as a meal-offering," this is a pledge.

5 What is the difference between vows and pledges? If a person took a vow and separated a sacrifice and then it was lost or stolen, he is obligated to replace it until he offers the sacrifice he vowed. If a person made a pledge and said: "This [animal] is a sacrifice," he is not obligated to replace it if it died or was stolen.

6 When one says: "I promise to bring the value of this ox as a burnt-offering" or "I promise to bring the value of this house as a sacrifice," if the ox dies and the house falls, he is obligated to pay. If one says: "I promise to bring a burnt-offering on the condition that I am not obligated to replace it," he is not obligated to replace it.

7 We already explained that one who constructs a temple to offer sacrifices within, outside the Temple is not considered as [having built] a temple to a false divinity. If one says: "I promise to bring a burnt-offering to sacrifice in the Temple [in Jerusalem]," and he brings it in [such] a temple, does not fulfill his vow. If he vowed to offer it in such a temple and he offers it in the Temple [in Jerusalem], he fulfills his vow. If he offers in such a temple, he fulfills his vow. He is like someone who vowed to bring a burnt-offering on the condition that he is not obligated to replace it. He is liable for karet for offering [the sacrifice] outside [the Temple Courtyard]. Similarly, if one takes a vow saying that he is a nazirite on the condition that he shave in such a temple, he fulfills his obligation if he shaves there. He is considered as one who vowed to abstain from wine and he did so abstain. This is not considered as a nazirite vow.

8 A sin-offering and a guilt-offering may be brought only for a sin. They may not be brought because of a pledge or a vow. [Hence,] if one says: "I promise to bring a sin-offering" or "...a guilt-offering," his statements are of no consequence. [Similarly,] if he said: "This animal is [designated as] a sin-offering" or "...a guilt-offering," his statements are of no consequence. If he was obligated to bring a sin-offering or a guilt-offering and he said: "This [animal] is for my sin-offering" or "...for my guilt-offering" or "This money is for my sin-offering" or "...my guilt-offering," his statements are binding.

9 When a person says: "I promise to bring the sacrifices of this person afflicted by tzara'at" or "...this women who gave birth," if the afflicted person or the women are poor, the one who took the vow should bring the sacrifices of a poor person. If they were wealthy, the person who took the vow must bring the sacrifice of a wealthy person even though he is poor.

10 [The following laws apply when] one says: "I promise to bring the sin-offering, burnt-offering, guilt-offering, and peace-offering of so-and-so." If that person agrees, he may allow him to bring those sacrifices for him and he receives atonement thereby. If he agreed at the time [the sacrificial animals] were set aside, but reneged and did not agree at the time they were offered, with regard to a burnt-offering and a peace-offering, they should be sacrificed and he receives atonement through them even if he does not consent at this time, because he agreed at the time [the sacrificial animals] were set aside. With regard to a sin-offering and a guilt-offering, by contrast, he does not receive atonement unless he consented from the beginning until the end.

11 One who says: "I promise to bring vows like the vows of the wicked who take upon themselves nazirite vows, sacrifices, and oaths," he is obligated in all [of his statements]. If he says: "...as the vows of the upright," he is not obligated in anything. If he says: "as the pledges of the upright," his vow is binding with regard to nazirite vows and sacrifices. All terms used to refer to sacrifices are considered as sacrifices.

12 Neither one who takes a vow or one who makes a pledge is liable unless his statements match his intent.

What is implied? If one had the intent of saying: "I promise to bring a burnt-offering," but he said "...a peace-offering" or he had the intent of saying: "I promise to bring a peace-offering," but he said "...a burnt-offering," his words are of no substance. If, [however,] he intended to take a vow to bring a burnt-offering and said: "a sacrifice," or he intended to say devotion offerings and he said: "consecrated property," his statements are binding, for a burnt-offering is a sacrifice, and something designated as devotion offerings is consecrated. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

With regard to vows and pledges, it is not necessary for him to make any verbal statements. He is obligated even if he made a firm resolve in his heart without saying anything. What is implied? If one made a resolve in his heart that an animal should be designated as a burnt-offering or that he should bring a burnt-offering, he is obligated. [This is derived from Exodus 35:5]: "All those generous of heart shall bring it." Generosity in the heart [alone is sufficient to] establish an obligation to bring. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations involving vows and pledges for the consecration [of sacrifices].

13 With regard to vows and pledges and other commitments that a person makes that obligated him, endowment obligations, pledges for worth, tithes. and the presents to the poor, it is a positive commandment of Scriptural origin to bring everything on the festival of immediate proximity, as [Deuteronomy 12:5-6] states: "And you shall come there and you shall bring your burnt-offerings, your sacrifices, your tithes,... your vows, your pledges..."], as if to say: When you come [to Jerusalem] to celebrate a festival bring there everything that you are obligated and satisfy every obligation upon you.

If the festival arrived and he did not bring [the gifts in which he is obligated], he has negated the observance of a positive commandment. If three festivals pass without him bringing the sacrifices he vowed or pledged to bring or without giving the endowment obligations, devotion offerings, and pledges for worth, he violates a negative commandment, as [ibid. 23:22] states: "Do not delay in paying it." He does not violate the negative commandment until all of the three pilgrimage festivals of the year pass. Lashes are not given for the violation of this negative commandment, because it does not involve a deed.

14 If one consecrated an animal [to be offered] on the altar and [after] two festivals passed [without it being offered], it became blemished and it was redeemed for another animal, the person does not violate the negative commandment until three festivals pass without the second [animal being sacrificed].

Both a man and a woman are liable for the transgression [the prohibition against] delaying [the offering of a sacrifice]. An heir, however, does not violate this prohibition.

15 Despite the fact that three festivals passed, no [animal consecrated as] a sacrifice is disqualified. Instead, [such animals should be] sacrificed and they are acceptable. Each and every day that passes after the three pilgrimage festivals involves a violation of [the above] prohibition. The [Jewish] court is commanded to apply physical coercion to the person immediately until he offers his sacrifices on the first festival that presents itself.

16 Even though [Leviticus 1:3] states that [a burnt-offering must be sacrificed] "willfully," he may be compelled until he says: "I desire." Whether he vowed [to bring a sacrifice] and did not set it aside or set it aside, but did not offer it, he may be compelled until he sacrifices it.

17 [The court] seizes collateral from all of those obligated to bring burnt-offerings or peace-offerings [to compel them to offer them]. Even though [the sacrifice] will not bring him atonement unless he desires to offer it, as [implied by] the term "willfully," he is compelled until he says: "I desire." Collateral is not seized from those obligated to bring sin-offerings and guilt-offerings, by contrast. [The rationale is that] since [the failure to bring these sacrifices] prevents [the people] from receiving atonement, we are not concerned that they will be sinful and delay [bringing] their sacrifices. [The only] exception is the sin-offering brought by a nazirite. Since [the failure to bring] it does not prevent him from drinking wine, he is compelled [to bring the offering], lest he delay it.

1 When a person says: "The offspring of this [animal] is [consecrated] as a burnt-offering and it is [consecrated] as a peace-offering," his words are binding. [Should he say:] "It is [consecrated] as a peace-offering and its offspring as a burnt-offering," if that was his intent, his words are binding.

If, after he made a resolve in his heart and expressed verbally that [the offspring] should be a peace-offering, he retracted and said: "Its offspring is a burnt-offering," even though he retracted immediately, the offspring are [designated] as peace-offerings. For one cannot retract [pledges of] consecration even when one does so immediately.

2 When one says: "The right forefoot of this animal is a burnt-offering," or "The leg of this animal is a burnt offering," it should be sold to those obligated to bring burnt-offerings. The proceeds of the sale are considered as ordinary funds with the exception of the worth of that limb. [The above applies] provided the person obligated to bring a burnt-offering who purchased [the animal] vowed [to bring] a burnt-offering for a specific price.

If one says: "The heart [of this animal]..." or "The head of this [animal] is a burnt-offering," the entire animal is a burnt-offering, for he consecrated an organ upon which [the animal's] life depends. If one consecrated a limb from a fowl, there is an unresolved doubt whether or not the entire fowl becomes consecrated.

3 When one says: "Half of this animal is a burnt-offering and half is a peace-offering," it is consecrated, but it should not be offered. Instead, it should be allowed to pasture until it contracts a disqualifying physical blemish and then be sold. Half of the proceeds should be used to bring a burnt offering and half, a peace-offering.

If he was obligated to bring a sin-offering and he said: "Half of this animal is a sin-offering and half is a burnt-offering," or "...a peace-offering," or he said: "Half of this animal is a burnt-offering..." or "...a peace-offering and half is a sin-offering," [the animal] should be left to die, as will be explained with regard to the sin-offerings that are left to die.

4 When one of the partners who owned half an animal consecrated his portion and then purchased the other half and consecrated it, it is consecrated and offered on the altar. Even though originally, when he consecrated half of it, it was unacceptable, the fact that it was originally unacceptable does not cause it to be unacceptable forever. Even though originally only its worth was consecrated, since it is a live animal, [we follow the principle:] "Living animals are never permanently disqualified." Since it is [ultimately] fit to be sacrificed, it should be sacrificed. [Moreover,] if one sought to transfer its holiness to another animal, the transfer is binding.

5 [Whether] one says: "The worth of this animal is a burnt-offering," or "This animal is a burnt-offering," if it is fit to be sacrificed as a burnt-offering, its body itself is consecrated and it should be sacrificed as a burnt-offering. If it is not fit [to be sacrificed], it should be sold and a burnt-offering brought with the proceeds of the sale.

6 If a person said with regard to an impure animal or another similar animal that is forbidden [to be offered] as a sacrifice that can never be consecrated: "Behold this is consecrated as a burnt-offering," his words are of no consequence. As we explained in Hilchot Issurei Mizbeiach, if he says: "These are [consecrated] for the sake of a burnt-offering," they should be sold and a burnt-offering brought with the proceeds of the sale.

7 If a person said: "The worth of this cow is [consecrated] for the sake of a burnt-offering for an entire 30 day period. After 30 days, [it is consecrated for the sake of a peace-offering," or he said: "The worth of this cow is [consecrated] for the sake of a peace-offering for an entire 30 day period. After 30 days, [it is consecrated] for the sake of a burnt-offering," his words are binding. [Thus] if he [comes to] offer [a sacrifice from] the proceeds of its sale within 30 days, he should bring the type of sacrifice that he vowed. If he offers it after 30 days, he should bring the type of sacrifice that he vowed.

8 If a person possessed a pregnant animal and said: "Should it give birth to a male, it is a burnt-offering. Should it give birth to a female, it is a peace-offering," if the animal gives birth to a male, it should be sacrificed as a burnt-offering. If it gives birth to a female, it should be sacrificed as a peace-offering. If it gives birth to a male and a female, the male should be sacrificed as a burnt-offering and the female, as a peace-offering.

If it gives birth to two males, one should be sacrificed as a burnt-offering and the other sold for the sake of a burnt-offering, but the proceeds of the sale are ordinary money. If it gives birth to two females, one should be sacrificed as a peace-offering and the other sold for the sake of a peace-offering, but the proceeds of the sale are ordinary money. If it gave birth to a tumtum or an androgynus, they are not consecrated and they are like ordinary animals, as we explained. When a person consecrates a fetus, whose mother has a disqualifying blemish or the like, while it is in its mother's womb, it is consecrated.

Chapter 16

1 When a person vows to bring a large animal, but instead brings a small one, he does not fulfill his obligation. [If he vows to bring] a small one and brings a large one, he fulfills his obligation.
What is implied? He said: "I promise [to bring] a lamb as a burnt-offering" or "...as a peace-offering," and he brings a ram, or he vowed a calf and brought an ox, or a kid and brought a goat, he fulfills his obligation.

2 If he vows to bring a burnt-offering either from lambs or from rams and brings a pilgas, there is an unresolved doubt whether or not he fulfilled his obligation. Similarly, if one vowed to bring a burnt-offering of fowl, from either turtle-doves, or ordinary doves and brought a fowl that began to sprout yellow feathers of both species, there is an unresolved doubt [whether or not he fulfilled his obligation].
If one vowed to bring a black[-colored animal] and brought one that was white, [vowed to bring] a white one and brought a black one, [vowed] a male and brought a female or vowed a female and brought a male, he did not fulfill his obligation.

3 When one takes a vow without specifying [the type of animal he is bringing], he should bring from the developed animals in the species he vowed to bring. If in his place [of residence], people commonly identify one of [the type of sacrifices] with a specific species [of animals], he should bring [the type of animal brought by] the people of that locale.

What is implied? If a person vowed to bring a burnt-offering from cattle," he should bring an ox. Should he say: "I promise to bring a burnt-offering," if the practice of the people of that locale is to use the term "burnt-offering" without any description to refer even to a fowl offered as a burnt-offering, he may bring even one fowl, a turtle dove or an ordinary dove. If their practice is to use that term only when referring to a burnt-offering of cattle, he should bring an ox. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

4 A person who vowed to bring an ox, a ram, a lamb, a calf, or the like should not bring the frailest specimen of that species, because their value is minimal. Nor is he obligated to bring the nicest, stockiest specimen of which there is no better. Instead, he should bring an average animal. If he brought a frail animal, he fulfilled his vow.

5 When a person says: "I promise to bring an ox worth a maneh," he should bring an ox worth a maneh in that place aside from its accompanying offerings. If he brought two [oxen] for a maneh, he did not fulfill his obligation.

6 [The following rules apply when] a person says: "This ox is a burnt-offering" and it becomes blemished. If he desires, he may bring two for the price he receives for it. If he brings even one ram for the price he receives, he fulfills his vow.

If he says: "These two oxen are burnt-offerings," and they become blemished, should he desire, he may bring one with the money he receives for their sale. "This ram is a burnt-offering" and it becomes blemished, if he desires he may bring a lamb with the money he receives for its sale. Similarly, if he vows a lamb and it becomes disqualified, he may bring a ram with the money he receives for its sale.

7 If he says: "I promise to bring a burnt-offering" and he set aside an ox and it was stolen, he may fulfill his obligation with a sheep. If he says: "I promise to bring this ox or its value as a burnt-offering," [his commitment] is established as binding. If [the ox] is disqualified, he may bring only an ox with the money he receives for its sale.

8 If he says: "One of my sheep is consecrated and one of my oxen is consecrated," but he had two, the larger one is consecrated. If he has three, the larger one is consecrated, but concern should also be shown for the middle one.

What should be done? He should wait until the middle one becomes blemished so that the holiness will fall on the larger one alone. If he says: "An ox from my oxen is consecrated," the larger one is consecrated and concern need not be shown for the middle one.

9 If he designated one of [three animals as a sacrifice] and forgot [which one he designated] or his father told him "One of these animals was consecrated," he should designate the largest one as consecrated and, afterwards, he fulfills his obligation [with its sacrifice]. Similarly, if one vowed to bring a burnt-offering from cattle and designated [an animal as a sacrifice to fulfill] his vow and [later] forgot whether he had designated an ox or a calf, he should bring an ox. Similarly, if he designated a sheep and forgot what he designated, he should bring a ram. If he designated a goat and forgot what he designated, he should bring a grown goat. If he forgot the species from which he designated the burnt-offering, he should bring an ox, a ram, and a grown goat. If he was in doubt that perhaps he designated the burnt-offering from fowl, he should also add a turtle-dove and an ordinary dove.

10 When a person vowed to bring a thanksgiving-offering or a peace offering, specifying that it would be brought from cattle, but forgot what he designated to bring, he should bring an ox and a cow. Similarly, if he is unsure with regard to sheep, he should bring a ram and a ewe. If he is unsure with regard to goats, he must bring a he-goat and a she-goat.
If he forgot the species from which he designated the sacrifice, he should bring an ox, a cow, a ram, a ewe, a he-goat, and a she-goat. If he said: "I promise to bring a burnt-offering of fowl," he should bring a turtle-dove or an ordinary dove. If he designated one particular species in his vow and forgot which one, he should bring both a turtle-dove and an ordinary dove.

11 When one says: "I promise to bring [an offering] for the altar," he should bring a handful of frankincense, for there is nothing that is offered entirely on the altar in its immediate state except for frankincense.
If he specified his vow, but forgot what he specified to bring, he should bring every type of entity that is offered on the altar in its entirety. Therefore he should bring a burnt-offering of an animal, a burnt-offering of fowl, a meal-offering of flour, frankincense, and wine alone.

12 When a person says: "I promise to bring [an offering] worth a sela to the altar," he should bring a sheep, for there is nothing offered on the altar worth [exactly] a sela except a sheep. If he specified [a particular entity], but forgot what he specified, he should bring a sela's worth of everything that is offered on the altar.

13 When a person says: "I promise to bring frankincense," he should not bring less than a handful. If one says: "I promise to bring wood," he should not bring less than two logs as thick as a leveling rod that are a cubit long. "I promise to bring a piece of wood," he should bring one log a cubit long. If he desires to bring the worth of the logs, he may.

14 What should a person who vowed or pledged to bring oil do? He should take a handful of it, put salt on it, and toss it on the fire. The remainder is eaten by the priests like the remainder of the meal offerings.
What is done with wine that is brought independently? It is salted and then poured entirely down the shittin like the other libations. Frankincense which is brought independently should be salted and then offered on the pyre in its entirety.

15 When a person vowed [to bring a sacrifice], he should not bring it from money [for which] the second tithe [was redeemed]. [The rationale is that] he became obligated to bring this sacrifice and anyone who is obligated to bring a sacrifice may bring it only from ordinary property.

16 If a person states: "I promise to bring a thanksgiving-offering from ordinary funds and its bread from the [second] tithe," he should bring its bread only from ordinary funds. [The rationale is that] he vowed to bring a thanksgiving-offering and that offering comes only when accompanied by bread which is from ordinary property.

17 If he explicitly said: "I promise to bring a thanksgiving offering from money from the second tithes and its bread from ordinary property," he may bring [the sacrifice] as he vowed. If he brought it all from ordinary property, he fulfilled his obligation. Similarly, if he explicitly said: "I promise to bring a thanksgiving-offering and its bread from the second tithe," he may bring it [as vowed]. He should not bring the bread from wheat that is the second tithe, but from [flour purchased with] money [for which] the second tithe was redeemed like the animal which was [purchased with] such money.

Even though he explicitly stated that he would bring the bread from [the money of] the second] tithe, he should not bring its libations from the money of the second tithe, for at all times, libations must be brought solely from ordinary funds, as explained. [The rationale is] that concerning [the libations], [Numbers 15:4] states: "The one who offers them shall offer his sacrifice." Implied is that the sacrifice must be his without having any dimension that belongs to the Most High.

1 When a person vows to bring a meal-offering baked in an oven, he should not bring one baked in a kopach, one baked on rafters,or one baked in Arab pits.

2 When one says: "I promise to bring a meal offering [baked] on a flat frying-pan," and he brings one [baked] in a deep frying-pan or he promised to bring one [baked] in a deep frying-pan and brought one [baked] on a flat frying-pan, [the sacrifice] he brought is acceptable, but he did not fulfill his obligation.

If he said: "I will bring these [baked] in a deep frying-pan and brings them [baked] on a flat frying-pan or promised to bring it [baked] on a flat frying-pan and brought it [baked] in a deep frying-pan," [the sacrifice] is unacceptable. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

Similarly, if a person says: "I promise to bring two esronim in one vessel and he brings them in two vessels" or "...in two vessels" and he brings them in one vessel, [the sacrifice] he brought is acceptable, but he did not fulfill his obligation. [The rationaleis that Deuteronomy 23:24] states: "As you vowed to G-d."

3 If he said: "I will bring these cakes in one vessel" and he brought them in two or [promised] to bring them in two and brought them in one, they are unacceptable.If he did not specify what he would bring when he took the vow, but [merely] said: "I promise to bring two esronim and when he designated [the meal for the offering], he set [the flour] aside in two vessels and afterwards, brought it in one vessel, it is acceptable. For the verse states "as you vowed" and not "as you set aside."

When he said: "I promise to bring two esronim in one vessel," but he brought them in two, if despite being told that he vowed to bring them in one vessel, he offered them in two, they are not acceptable. If he brought them in one vessel, they are acceptable.

4 When he said: "I promise to bring two esronim in two vessels," but he brought them in one, if after being told that he vowed to bring them in two vessel, he offered them in two, they are acceptable. If he brought them in one vessel, they are like two meal-offerings that became mixed together.

5 If one says: "I promise to bring a meal-offering," he should bring one of the five types of meal-offerings that can be either vowed or pledged. If he says: "I promise to bring meal-offerings," he should bring two of the five types of meal-offerings. If he says: "I promise to bring a type of meal-offerings," he should bring two meal-offerings of one type. If he says: "I promise to bring types of meal-offerings," he should bring two meal-offerings [coming] from two types. Similarly if he says: "...types of a meal-offering," he should bring two types of meal-offerings. If he specified that he would bring one type [of meal-offering] and forgot [which type he specified], he should bring all five types.

6 A private individual should not bring more than sixty esronim [of flour] in one vessel as a meal offering. If he vowed more than sixty, he should bring sixty in one vessel and the remainder in a second vessel.

[The rationale is that] no more than sixty [esronim of flour] can be mixed together [with oil as one]. It is not an absolute requirement for [the flour and the oil] to be mixed together as we explained. Nevertheless, our Sages said: "Whenever a [meal-offering] is fit to be mixed [with oil], it is not an absolute requirement for it to be mixed. Whenever it is not fit to be mixed [with oil], mixing it is an absolute requirement."

7 If one says: "I promise to bring 121 esronim [as a meal offering]." He should bring 120 [esronim] in two vessels - 60 in each vessel - and one isaron in a third vessel.

If he said: "I promise to bring an isaron," he should bring one isaron. "I promise to bring isaronim," he should bring two. If he specified [the number of esronim] he vowed and then forgot how many he specified, he should bring 60 esronim in one vessel. If he forgot how many esronim he specified and which type [of meal-offering] he specified, he should bring 60 esronim of each of the five types [of meal-offerings].

8 If he specified his vow and forgot both how many esronim he vowed and the number of vessels in which he vowed to bring them, he should bring [the full range of] one to sixty esronim in sixty different vessels.

What is implied? He should bring one isaron in the first vessel, two esronim in the second vessel, three in the third, until he brings 60 esronim in the last vessel. If he also forgot what type [of meal-offering] he designated, he should also brings [60 offerings] according to this pattern in 60 vessels of each type. Thus he will be bringing 1830 esronim from each type.

9 When a person says: "I promise to bring a meal-offering of barley,""...a meal-offering of a half an isaron," or "...a meal-offering without oil or frankincense," he is exempt, because he did not vow an entity that is sacrificed.

If he said: "I promise to bring a meal-offering of barley," "...of lentils," "...a meal-offering without oil or frankincense," or "...a meal-offering of a half an isaron," we ask him [what his intent was]. If he says: "I only took the vow because I thought it was permissible to offer such [sacrifices]. Had I known that one could only offer a complete isaron of fine [wheat] flour together with oil and frankincense, I would not have taken a vow," he is exempt. If, [however,] he said: "Had I known [that such offerings were unacceptable], I would have taken a vow to bring [an offering] like those that are offered," he is obligated to bring an offering like those that are offered.

10 If he vowed to bring an isaron and a half and he said: "Had I known [that such offerings were unacceptable], I would have taken a vow to bring [an offering] like those that are offered," he must bring two [esronim]. If he said: "I promise to bring coarse flour" or "I promise to bring a half an isaron" without mentioning the term "meal-offering," he is exempt. It as if he never took a vow at all.

Similarly, if one said: "I promise to bring a thanksgiving-offering without bread,"or "...a sacrifice without its accompanying offerings," he is exempt. If he said: "Were I to have known that such offerings are not sacrificed, I would have taken a vow to bring [an offering] like those that are offered," he is obligated to bring [an offering] like those that are offered.

11 When a person says: "I promise to bring the bread of a thanksgiving-offering," He must bring a thanksgiving offering and its bread. [The rationale is that] it is known that the bread is never offered without the thanksgiving-offering and he mentioned merely the conclusion of the sacrifice. If he said: 'I promise to bring the bread to fulfill the obligation for so-and-so's thanksgiving offering," he should bring the bread for a thanksgiving offering together with the offering of his friend.

12 A person may vow or pledge to bring wine independently. One should not vow to bring a log of wine or two lugim, for there are no libations that are [only] a log or two lugim. Nor should one vow five lugim, for five lugim are not fit for the libations of one animal or for those of two animals. One may, however, vow three, four, six, or more lugim, because they are fit for the wine libations for sacrificial animals.

13 What is implied? If a person vows seven [lugim], they are considered as the libations for a sheep and for a ram. If he vowed eight, they are the libations for two rams; nine are the libations for an ox and a sheep or those of three sheep. If he vowed ten, they are the libations for an ox and a ram or two sheep and a ram. Similarly, all numbers [can be seen as such combinations].

14 If he vowed to bring five lugim, we tell him: "Make it a complete six." [The rationale is that] he already established it as fit for a sacrifice.If, by contrast, he vowed one log or two, he is exempt, for this amount or their components are not fit to be used as a libation.

Less than a log of oil should not be vowed or pledged, for there is no meal-offering smaller than an isaron and it requires a log of oil.

15 When a person says: "I promise to bring wine," he should not bring less than three lugim. "I promise to bring oil," he should not bring less than a log. If he specified a given amount in his vow and forgot how many lugim of wine or oil he specified, he should bring 140 lugim. For there is no day on which there are more communal offerings sacrificed than on the first day of Sukkot that falls on the Sabbath. On that day, the accompanying offerings included 140 lugim of oil and an equal amount of wine as will be explained in Hilchot Temidim UMusafim.

1 There is a positive commandment to offer all of the sacrifices - whether sacrifices of animals or fowl or meal-offerings - in [God's] chosen house, as [Deuteronomy 12:14] states: "There you will perform everything that I command you." Similarly, it is a positive commandment for a person to take the effort to bring animal sacrifices that he is obligated to bring [and transport them] from the Diaspora to [God's] chosen house, as [ibid.:26] states: "[Only] your sacraments that you possess and your vows shall you bear... [to the place that God will choose]." According to the Oral Tradition, we have learned that [the verse] is speaking only about sacrificial animals from the Diaspora which he takes the effort to deal with until he brings them to [God's] chosen house.

2 One who offers a sacrifice outside the Temple Courtyard negates a positive commandment and violates a negative commandment, as [ibid. : 13] states: "Take heed lest you offer your burnt-offerings in any place that you see." If he offered a sacrifice [in such a place] willfully, he is liable for karet, as [Leviticus 17:8-9] states: "[Any man]...who will offer a burnt-offering or a sacrifice, but did not bring it to the Tent of Meeting... he will be cut off from his people." [If he transgressed] unknowingly, he must bring a fixed sin-offering.

3 Similarly, one who slaughters sacrificial animals outside [the Temple Courtyard], even though he does not offer them as a sacrifice, [is liable]. If he acted willfully, he is liable for karet, as [ibid:3-4]: "[Any man]...who will slaughter an ox, a sheep, or a goat... it will be considered as [the shedding of] blood for that person. He has shed blood... He will be cut off." [If he transgressed] unknowingly, he must bring a fixed sin-offering.

4 Which source serves as a warning not to sacrifice outside [the Temple Courtyard]? [It is derived through] an association of verses. [Deuteronomy 12:14] states: "There will you offer your burnt-offerings" and it continues: "There you will perform everything that I command you." [We can conclude:] Just as [the Torah] warns explicitly against offering a sacrifice outside the Temple, and one incurs punishment for this, as it is written: "Take heed lest you offer your burnt-offerings...," so too, it has warned with regard to the "performance" that is involved in slaughtering, for which it is explicitly stated that one receives punishment. For the Torah does not prescribe punishment unless it has issued a warning.

5 A person who slaughters sacrificial animals outside [the Temple Courtyard] and offers them [in such a place] is liable twice: once for slaughtering and once for offering.
If he slaughtered [a sacrificial animal] in the Temple Courtyard and offered it outside, he is liable for offering it. If he slaughtered [such an animal] outside, but offered it inside, he is liable for slaughtering it.

6 He is not liable unless he slaughtered sacrificial animals that are fit to be offered on the altar. If, however, he slaughtered an animal that was forbidden [to be offered on] the altar or one of the sin-offerings that was consigned to death outside [the Temple Courtyard], he is exempt. [The rationale is that Leviticus 17:4] mentions "before the Sanctuary of God." Whenever [an animal] is not fit to be come to the Sanctuary of God, one is not liable [for its slaughter].

7 If one slaughters an animal that is unacceptable because of a time factor involving its body or the status of its owners outside the Temple Courtyard], he is exempt. [The rationale is that] in its present state, it is not fit to be brought into the Temple Courtyard.

8 What is meant by a disqualifying time factor involving its body? An animal in the seven days following its birth, turtle-doves which have not reached the stage of development at which time [they are fit to be sacrificed], and an animal and its offspring; for if one slaughters one on a particular day, the other is not fit to be slaughtered until the morrow.

9 What is meant by a disqualifying time factor involving the status of its owners? A sacrifice whose owners have not reached the appropriate stage of time to offer it.

What is implied? If a zav, a zavah, and a woman who gave birth slaughtered [the animal designated for] their sin-offerings outside [the Temple Courtyard] during the days of their counting, they are exempt. Similarly, if a person afflicted with tzara'at slaughtered his sin-offering and[/or] his guilt-offering outside [the Temple Courtyard] during the days of his counting, he is exempt, for the owners of these sacrifices are not yet fit for their atonement. Nevertheless, if these individuals slaughtered their burnt-offerings outside [the Temple Courtyard] during the days of their counting, they are liable. [The rationale is that] a burnt-offering is a present and it is the sin-offering and the guilt-offering which are the fundamental [factors leading to] atonement.

Similarly, when a nazirite slaughters his sin-offering outside [the Temple Courtyard] during the days of his nazirite vow, he is exempt. If he offered his burnt-offering or his peace-offering outside [the Temple Courtyard], he is liable. For the sin-offering is what prevents him [from completing his nazirite vow] and it is the fundamental dimension [of the conclusion of] his nazirite vow.

10 When a person offers a conditional guilt-offering or sin-offering of fowl that is brought because of a doubt outside [the Temple Courtyard], he is exempt. [The rationale is that] it was not definitely established that a prohibition [was violated]. When a guilt-offering for one afflicted by tzara'at was slaughtered outside [the Temple Courtyard], but not for the desired intent, [the one who slaughters it] is liable. [The rationale is that] since [when such a sacrifice is] not [slaughtered] for the desired intent in [the Temple Courtyard], it is deemed appropriate and acceptable, as will be explained.

Whenever one is exempt for slaughtering a sacrificial [animal] outside the [Temple Courtyard], one is also exempt for offering it there.

11 [The following rules apply if] one slaughters the two goats offered on Yom Kippur outside [the Temple Courtyard]. Before [the High Priest] recites the confessional over them, he is liable for both of them, since [they are both] fit to come before God for the confessional. After [the High Priest] recited the confessional, one is exempt for slaughtering [the goat] that is sent [to Azazel], because it is no longer fit to come before God [as a sacrifice].

12 When one slaughters [animals designated as] peace-offerings outside [the Temple Courtyard], before the gates of the Temple building are opened, he is exempt, for a [necessary] deed is lacking. [Only] afterwards are they fit to be offered before God, as we explained.

One who slaughters a Paschal sacrifice outside [the Temple Courtyard] - even during the other days of the year, whether for the sake of the Paschal sacrifice or for another purpose - is liable. [The rationale is that] during the remainder of the year, a Paschal sacrifice [that is offered] is considered as a peace-offering.

13 When the fetus [being carried by] an ordinary animal was consecrated [as a sacrifice for] the altar, it is forbidden to slaughter [the mother] outside

[the Temple Courtyard]. If he slaughtered it, he is not liable for lashes, because it is not fit to come before God [as a sacrifice].

14 When one stole [an animal] and consecrated it, and afterwards, slaughtered it outside [the Temple Courtyard], he is liable. From which time was it considered in his property with regard to his being liable for karet for it? From the time he consecrated it.
[The above applies] provided he slaughtered it after [the owner] despaired of its return. [If he slaughtered it] before then, by contrast, the consecration is not effective.

15 If the entire body of the animal was outside [the Temple Courtyard] and its neck was inside and one slaughtered it, he is liable, as [Leviticus 17:3] states: "[Any man]...who will slaughter an ox, a sheep, or a goat in the camp or who will slaughter outside the camp... [and he has not brought it as an offering]." This applies whether the one who slaughters is standing in the Temple [Courtyard] and the animal's neck was inside, but the remainder of its body was outside, or its body was inside and its neck was outside. He is liable unless the animal was entirely within the Temple [Courtyard], as [implied by ibid.:9]: "And he will not bring it to the entrance of the Tent of Meeting." If, however, one slaughters on the roof of the Temple Building, even though it is not fit for sacrifice at all, he is exempt.

16 Two people who held a knife and slaughtered [a sacrificial animal] outside [the Temple Courtyard] are exempt, for [the prooftexts] say "who will slaughter" "or who will slaughter" [implying] one and not two.

When one slaughters a sacrificial animal outside [the Temple Courtyard] even though he had no intention of sacrificing this animal to God, he is liable. This is [implied by the prooftext]: "It will be considered as [the shedding of] blood for that person. He has shed blood." [One can infer that] even if [the person slaughtering] thinks of the blood [from the sacrificial animal] as blood that was shed and not as a sacrifice, he is liable.

17 A person who slaughters [a sacrificial animal] outside [the Temple Courtyard] at night is liable, since slaughtering an animal is acceptable at night. Similarly, if, at night, one offered as a sacrifice [an animal] he slaughtered at night outside [the Temple Courtyard], he is liable for offering it as a sacrifice.

If, however, one slaughtered [a sacrificial animal] inside [the Temple Courtyard] at night and offered it as a sacrifice outside, he is exempt. [The rationale is that] he offered merely an unacceptable article, for there is no conception of acceptable slaughter in the Temple at night. Similarly, if one received [the blood of a sacrificial animal] with an ordinary vessel inside [the Temple Courtyard], but poured it [on an altar] outside, he is exempt.

18 Similarly, when a person performs melikah on a fowl outside [the Temple Courtyard], he is exempt. If he offered it [as a sacrifice there], he is exempt. If he performs melikah on a fowl inside [the Temple Courtyard], but offered it outside, he is liable for offering it.

If one slaughtered [a fowl] in [the Temple Courtyard] and offered it outside, he is exempt, for he offered something that is not fit to be offered. If he slaughtered the fowl outside [the Temple Courtyard] and offered it outside, he is liable twice, because slaughtering a fowl outside [the Temple Courtyard] is acceptable. It is comparable to performing melikah inside.

Chapter 19

1 A person who offers a sacrifice outside [the Temple Courtyard] is not liable unless he brings [the sacrificial animal] to the top of the altar that he constructed outside [the Temple]. If, however, he offered it on a stone or a rock, he is exempt, for the term sacrifice applies only when [an animal is offered] on an altar, even if it is outside [the Temple], as [indicated by Genesis 8:20]: "And Noah built an altar." He is not liable unless he offers the sacrifice to God, as [Leviticus 17:9] states: "...to offer it to God," i.e., unless his intent is for God.

2 One is liable only for offering an entity that is fit for the fire and for the altar, for example, a burnt offering, as [ibid.:8] states: "who will offer a burnt-offering or a sacrifice." [One may infer:] Just as a burnt-offering is fit to be offered on the fires, so too, everything that is fit to be offered on the fire is what one is liable for offering outside [the Temple Courtyard].

3 On this basis, [our Sages] said that individuals [who perform the following services] outside [the Temple Courtyard] are liable: One who throws the blood, offers on the pyre the limbs of a burnt-offering, the parts of an animal offered on the altar, a handful [of meal], or frankincense, or incense, the meal-offering of a priest, or the meal-offering within the accompanying offerings or one who pours a libation of three lugim of wine or of water. [This is derived from ibid.:9:] "He did not bring it [to the entrance of the Tent of Meeting] to offer it." [Implied is that] any [sacrifice] that would be accepted within [the Temple Courtyard] causes one to be liable for [offering] it outside.

4 If, however, one throws the remainder of the blood [of a sacrificial animal] - even the remainder of the blood [from a sin-offering whose blood was offered] inside [the Sanctuary], he is exempt. [The rationale is that] throwing the blood on the altar is the remaining aspect of the mitzvah and is not an absolute necessity.

Similarly, one who pours a libation of less than three lugim of wine or water outside [the Temple Courtyard] is exempt, whether during Sukkot or throughout the year. Since the required measure is lacking, they are not fit to be accepted within [the Temple]. Similarly, one who offers from the meat of a sin-offering, that of a guilt-offering, or that of a peace-offering whether of an individual or of the community or from the remainder of the meal-offerings, the two breads [offered on Shavuot], or the showbread outside [the Temple Courtyard] is exempt. [The rationale is that] all of these are fit to be eaten, not for the fires [of the altar].

5 One who offers an entire animal outside [the Temple Courtyard] is liable, because of the portions offered on the altar. Even though they have not been separated, the meat of the sacrifice is not considered as an intervening substance and it is as if he offered those portions on the pyre alone. In contrast, if one offers a meal-offering from which a handful [of meal] has not been separated, he is exempt. [Even though he would have been liable for the handful], the handful is not a distinct and discrete entity. If he separated [the handful] and then it was mixed back into it and he then offered the entire [measure] outside the Temple Courtyard, he is liable.

6 One who pours oil [over a meal-offering], mixes the meal and oil, breaks up the wafers, salts them, waves them, approaches an altar with them, arranges a table for showbread, cleans the lamps of a candelabra, separates a handful [of meal], or receives the blood [of a sacrificial animal] outside [the Temple Courtyard] is exempt. [The rationale is that] all of these are not activities that complete the offering [of the sacrifice] and [the prooftext] says: "Who will offer a burnt-offering or a sacrifice." [One may infer:] Just as offering [these sacrifices] is the final stage of the service [involved with them], so too, one is liable only for activities that are the final stage of sacrificial service.

7 When one burns a red heifer outside the place where it is required to be burnt or if one offers, outside [the Temple Courtyard], the goat that is sent [to Azazel] after the confession was recited over it, he is exempt. [The rationale is that the prooftext] says: "He did not bring it to the entrance of the Tent of Meeting." [One may infer:] One is not liable for any sacrifice which is not fit to be brought to the entrance to the Tent of Meeting.
In contrast, one is liable for offering [outside the Temple Courtyard] sacrificial animals that were disqualified, if they were disqualified in the Temple. What is implied? [Sacrificial meat or blood] that remained overnight [without being offered], they were taken out [of the Temple Courtyard], they became impure, or they were disqualified because of the intent of the person sacrificing them, all are required to be burnt as will be explained in Hilchot Pesulei HaMukkdashim. If a person transgressed and offered [such entities] as sacrifices outside [the Temple Courtyard], he is liable. [This is derived from the prooftext]: "...to offer it to God." One is liable for any [entity] that is are fit to be offered to God and these are fit to be offered to God.

8 Whenever there is a substance for which one is liable for offering it outside [the Temple Courtyard], he is liable for offering an olive-sized portion of it outside. [This applies] whether he offered [a portion of the entity] inside [the Temple Courtyard] first, left over an olive-sized portion and then offered it outside or left the entire entity inside and took an olive-sized portion and offered it outside. If, however, [the size of] the sacrificial entity was decreased in the slightest way inside the Temple Courtyard and then the remainder was offered outside, he is exempt.

9 What is implied? If a portion of the handful [of meal offered on the altar], the frankincense, the portions of a sacrifice offered on the altar, a burnt-offering, a meal offering that is burnt, and the wine libations was decreased within [the Temple Courtyard] and the remainder was offered outside [the Temple Courtyard], he is exempt. [This is derived from the prooftext which states:] "to offer it." [Implied is that] he is liable for a complete entity, but he is not liable if it is lacking. If one removed [the sacrificial entity] from the Temple Courtyard while it was complete, its [size] was decreased outside [the Temple Courtyard] and then he offered it [there], there is an unresolved question [whether he is liable]. Therefore [a transgressor] is not given lashes.

10 If, [outside the Temple Courtyard,] one offered a limb that did not have an olive-sized portion of meat on it, but the bone itself caused it to reach the olive-sized measure, he is liable, because the meat is connected to the bone. If salt caused [the sacrificial entity] to reach the olive-sized measure, there is an unresolved question [whether he is liable]. Therefore [a transgressor] is not given lashes. A burnt-offering and the portions of the innards of a burnt-offering that are offered on the altar, can be combined to complete an olive-sized portion [to cause one to be liable].

11 If one offered [a portion of a sacrifice outside the Temple Courtyard] and then offered another portion of it, he is liable for every individual limb. If he sprinkled its blood [outside the Temple Courtyard] and then offered its limbs, he is liable twice. For the Torah made a distinction between [offering blood and offering limbs as indicated by the two prooftexts] "Who will offer a burnt-offering" and "to offer it."

If one offered a limb that was lacking [in substance], he is exempt, as [one can infer from the prooftext] "to offer it." [This indicates] that one is liable [only] for a complete [limb].

12 When two people slaughter [a sacrificial animal outside the Temple Courtyard], they are exempt. If two people hold a limb [from a sacrificial animal] and offer it outside the Temple Courtyard], they are liable. [The rationale is that the prooftext states] "Every man who will offer a burnt-offering." Implied is that even two people who offer [a sacrifice] are liable.

13 If a person makes several of the required sprinklings [of blood] outside [their appropriate place], he is liable. A person who receives the blood of a sin-offering in one cup and applies it to an altar outside [the Temple Courtyard] and then applies it to the altar inside [the Temple Courtyard], he is liable for the portion applied outside [the Temple Courtyard]. [The rationale is that] the entire amount was fit to be offered inside.

If he applied it to [the altar] inside and then applied it outside, he is exempt, for [the blood he used] was merely remnants. If, however, he received the blood in two cups, he is liable whether he applied both of them outside [the Temple Courtyard], [the first] outside and the other inside, or [the first] inside and the other outside.

14 When one offered a handful [of meal] or the frankincense from the meal offering outside [the Temple Courtyard], or offered one inside and the other outside, he is liable. Similarly, with regard to the two bowls of frankincense from the showbread, if one offered [the first] outside the [Temple Courtyard] or [the first] inside and the second outside, he is liable.

15 If a person slaughtered consecrated animals in the present era and offered them outside the Temple Courtyard, he is liable, because [the sacrifices] are fit to be offered inside. For it is permitted to offer sacrifices even though the Temple is not built, because [when the Temple was] consecrated originally, it was consecrated for the immediate time and for all future time.

16 [A Jew] who slaughters sacrificial animals belonging to a gentile outside [the Temple Courtyard] is liable. Similarly, one who offers them outside [the Temple Courtyard is liable].

Gentiles are permitted to offer burnt offerings to God in all places, provided they sacrifice them on a raised structure that they build. It is forbidden to help them [offer these sacrifices] or act as agents for them, for we are forbidden to sacrifice outside [the Temple Courtyard]. It is permitted to instruct them and teach them how to sacrifice to the Almighty, blessed be He.

Mishneh Torah, Daily Offerings and Additional Offerings

Trans. by Eliyahu Touger, Moznaim Publishing

Chapter 1

1 It is a positive commandment to offer two lambs as burnt-offerings every day. They are called the continuous offering. One [should be brought] in the morning and one in the afternoon as [Numbers 28:3] states: "Two each day, a continuous offering."

2 When is the time at which they should be slaughtered? The morning one should be slaughtered before sunrise, when the entire eastern horizon becomes illuminated. Once there was a pressing situation for the community in [the era of] the Second Temple and they offered the daily morning sacrifice at four hours after daybreak.

3 [The lamb for] the continuous offering of the afternoon should be slaughtered when the shadows have been extended and it is obvious to all that they have been extended. This is from six and a half hours of the day until the day's end. Every day, they would not slaughter it until eight and a half hours of the day and they would offer it at nine and a half hours.
Why would they delay [its slaughter] for two hours after the beginning of the time? Because of the sacrifices of individuals and those of the community. For it is forbidden to offer any sacrifice before the continuous offering of the morning and no sacrifice is offered after the continuous sacrifice of the afternoon with the exception of the Paschal sacrifice. [That leniency was granted, because] it is impossible for all of Israel to offer their Paschal sacrifices in two hours.

4 The Paschal sacrifice is slaughtered only after the continuous offering of the afternoon. Similarly, those individuals requiring atonement may offer their atonement offerings after the continuous offering of the afternoon on the fourteenth [of Nisan] so that they will be ritually pure and [and able] to partake of their Paschal offerings in the evening.

5 When the day before Pesach falls during the week or on the Sabbath, the Afternoon Sacrifice would be slaughtered after seven and a half hours and offered after eight and a half hours so that [the people] would have time to slaughter their Paschal sacrifices. If the day before Pesach falls on Friday, [the Afternoon Sacrifice] would be slaughtered at six and a half hours, the beginning of the time allotted for it and offered at seven and a half hours, so that they would have ample time to roast [their sacrifices] before the commencement of the Sabbath.

6 Even though [no sacrificial animals] are slaughtered after the continuous offering of the afternoon, any entity that is fit to be offered on the altar's pyre is offered the entire day. And the limbs of the burnt-offerings and the eimorim may be offered until midnight, as we explained in [Hilchot] Ma'aseh HaKorbanot.

The limbs and the eimorim - whether from the continuous offerings or from other sacrifices - that were not consumed [by the fire], may be turned over throughout the entire night until the morning, as [Leviticus 6:2] states: "The entire night until the morning."

7 [The offering of] the limbs of the continuous offering on the altar's pyre [at night] supersedes [the prohibitions of] ritual impurity, but does not supersede the Sabbath [prohibitions]. Instead, all of the limbs of the continuous offerings offered on Friday are offered on the altar's pyre on Friday alone. For the initial [offering] of the continuous offering supersedes the Sabbath [prohibitions], but its concluding aspects do not. The fats of [the communal sacrifices offered on] the Sabbath are offered on a festival, at night, if the festival falls on Saturday night. [These fats] may not, however, be offered on the night of Yom Kippur [if it falls on Saturday night]. [These concepts are derived from Numbers 28:10 which] states: "The burnt-offering of a Sabbath on its Sabbath." [This excludes the offering of] a burnt-offering of a Sabbath on another Sabbath. Nor may the burnt-offering of a weekday be offered on a festival.

8 When the fourteenth [of Nisan] falls on Sabbath, the fats of the Paschal sacrifice may be offered on the night of the festival, for they are considered as the fats of the Sabbath.

9 There never should be less than six lambs that have been inspected in the Chamber of the Lambs. They should be prepared four days before their sacrifice. Even though they would be inspected beforehand, they would not slaughter the continuous offering until they inspect it again, before its slaughter by the light of the torches. It was given water to drink from a golden cup so that it would be easier to skin.

10 The continuous offering of the afternoon is offered in the same manner as the continuous offering of the morning. Everything follows the regimen for the offering of the burnt offering, as written in [Hilchot] Ma'aseh HaKorbanot. The lamb was not bound before its slaughter so as not to copy the practice of the heretics. Instead, they would hold its forefeet and its hindfeet by hand. It would be held in the following manner: Its head would be to the south and its face to the west.

11 The continuous offering of the morning would be slaughtered in the northwest corner of the butchering area, on the second ring, and that of the afternoon would be slaughtered in the northeast corner on the second ring. [In this way,] they would be opposite the sun. The Received Tradition states that [these sacrificial animals] should be slaughtered opposite the sun.

12 If they erred and inadvertently - or even intentionally - failed to offer the continuous offering of the morning, that of the afternoon should be offered.

When does the above apply? After the altar has been dedicated. If, however, it is a new altar on which no sacrifices have been offered, the continuous offering of the afternoon should not be offered on it first. For the altar for burnt-offerings should be dedicated solely by [sacrificing] the continuous offering of the morning.

Chapter 2

1 It is a positive commandment for there to be fire continuously burning on the altar, as [Leviticus 6:6] states: "A continuous fire shall burn on the altar." Although a fire descended from heaven, it is a mitzvah to bring from ordinary fire, as [ibid. 1:7] states: "And the sons of Aaron, the priests, shall place fire on the altar."

2 In the morning, the wood was arranged. They would prepare a large array of fire at the top of the altar, as [ibid. 6:5] states: "And the priest shall burn on it wood each morning." Similarly, it is a mitzvah to bring two logs of wood [to the altar] together with the continuous offering of the morning, besides the wood of the arrangement. [This is also intimated by the same verse.]

Similarly, two logs of wood were added together with the continuous offering of the afternoon, as [implied by ibid. 1:7]: "And they shall arrange wood on the fire." According to the Oral Tradition, it was taught that the verse is speaking about the continuous offering of the afternoon.

3 The two logs brought in the afternoon are brought up [to the altar] by two priests, each one holding one log in his hand. This is derived from the fact that the term "and they shall arrange" used by the above prooftext is plural. Those of the morning, by contrast, are brought by one priest.

4 Three arrays of fire would be prepared on the top of the altar each day: The first was the large arrangement upon which were offered the continuous offering and the other sacrifices. The second was a small [arrangement] to its side from which fire was taken in a fire-pan to offer the incense offering each day. The third was not associated with any other purpose except to fulfill the mitzvah of burning fire, as [ibid. 6:6] states: "A continuous fire shall burn."

5 According to the Oral Tradition, it was derived that [ibid.:2] which states: "On the pyre, on the altar" - refers to the large arrangement. "The fire of the altar shall burn upon it" [ibid.] - refers to the second arrangement for the incense offering. And "The fire of the altar shall burn upon it" [ibid.: 5] - refers to the third arrangement for the maintenance of the fire. The limbs and the fats that were not consumed during the evening are placed on the side of the large arrangement.

6 One who extinguished the fire of the altar is liable for lashes, as [ibid.:6] states: "It shall not be extinguished." Even one coal - even if it was removed from the altar - if one extinguishes it, he is liable for lashes. If, however, one extinguishes the fire of a fire-pan or the fire designated to kindle the Menorah that was kindled on the altar, even if he extinguishes it on the top of the altar, he is exempt. [The rationale is that] this fire has been allocated for another mitzvah and it is no longer called "the fire of the altar."

7 When one arrays the wood of the large arrangement, he should arrange it on the eastern portion of the altar. It should be made [in a manner that makes it apparent] that he began to arrange it from the east. There should be open space between the logs and the ends of the inner logs should touch the ashes that are in the center of the altar. It is called the ash-heap.

8 After the large arrangement is arrayed, logs of high-quality fig wood are selected and a second arrangement is made for [the fire for] the incense offering near the southwest corner, four cubits to the north of the corner. It would contain five se'ah of coals. On the Sabbath, it would contain about eight se'ah of coals, because on every Sabbath, the two bowls of frankincense from the showbread would be offered on it.

9 The third arrangement for the sake of the maintenance of the fire can be made on any place on the altar.

The fire should be kindled on [the altar]. One should not kindle the fire on the ground and bring it up to the altar. Instead, it should be kindled on the altar itself, as [implied by] the verse: "The fire of the altar shall burn." This teaches that the kindling should be on the altar itself.

10 It is a positive commandment to remove the ashes from the altar each day, as [Leviticus 6:3] states: "And he shall remove the ashes." This is one of the services performed by the priests.

The priestly garments [worn] when removing the ashes should be less valuable than those [worn] when performing the other aspects of Temple service, as [ibid.] continues: "He shall remove his garments and put on other garments and remove the ashes." The term "other" does not imply ordinary garments, but rather [priestly garments] that are less valuable than the first. [The rationale is that] it is not proper conduct to serve a cup [of wine] to one's master in the same clothes as one cooked food for him.

11 When should the ashes be removed from the altar each day? At dawn. On the festivals, it should be carried out from the beginning of the middle third of the night. And on Yom Kippur, from midnight.

12 How are [the ashes] removed? [The priest] who merited to remove the ashes would immerse [in the mikveh] and put on the clothes for the removal of the ashes. He would sanctify his hands and feet [from the basin]. They would tell him: "Be careful lest you touch a sacred utensil before sanctify your hands and feet."

Afterwards, he would take a fire-pan - it was silver and would be placed in the corner between the ramp and the altar - to the west of the ramp. He would take the fire-pan and ascend to the top of the altar and scatter the coals, this way and that. [With the fire-pan,] he would lift up some of the coals which were consumed by the heart of the fire, and descend to the ground. He would turn his face to the north and walk on the ground at the east of the altar approximately ten cubits to the north. He would gather the coals that he lifted up [from the altar, placing them] on the floor [of the Temple Courtyard], three handbreadths away from the ramp, in the place where they would place the innards of a fowl [brought as an offering], the ashes of the inner altar and the Menorah.

Picking up these coals with the fire-pan and bringing them to the floor near the altar is a commandment that must be performed each day.

13 After the person who [initially] removed ashes from the altar descended, his priestly brethren would run and sanctify their hands and feet quickly. They would take rakes and spits and ascend to the top of the altar. They would place all of the limbs of the burnt-offerings and the eimorim of the sacrifices that were not consumed [by the pyre] throughout the night, on the side of the altar. If the sides of the altar could not contain [all the limbs], they would be arranged on the ramp opposite [the altar's] surrounding ledge.

Afterwards, they would use the rakes to rake the ashes from all the corners of the altar and make a pile on the ash-heap. This pile [of ashes] would be cleared away with a pasachiter. This is a large container that contains a letech. It is taken down [to the floor of the Temple Courtyard]. On the festivals, they would not bring it down, but instead would leave a high pile in the center of the altar, because this beautifies the altar.

14 Any one of the priests who desired would collect the ashes that were brought down [from the altar] and take them outside the city to the ash depository. Taking the ashes outside [the Temple Mount] did not require a lottery. Instead, whoever desired [was allowed to do so]. None of the priests were ever lethargic about removing the ashes.

15 Although removing [the ashes] outside [the Temple Mount] is not considered as service, it should not be performed by priests with disqualifying physical blemishes.

When it is removed outside the city, it is deposited in a place where the wind will not blow it powerfully, nor [rivers] would not flow into it. It should not be scattered there, as [Leviticus 6:3] states: "And you shall deposit it." [Implied is] that it should be placed down gently. It is forbidden to benefit from it.

Chapter 3

1 It is a positive commandment to offer the incense offering on the Golden Altar in the Sanctuary, twice each day, in the morning and in the afternoon, as [Exodus 30:7] states: "And Aaron shall burn on it the incense of fragrant spices."

If one did not offer it in the morning, he should offer it in the afternoon even if [the omission] was intentional. The Golden Altar may be dedicated only with the incense offering of the afternoon.

2 How much [incense] was offered every day? [An amount that] weighed 100 dinarim, 50 in the morning and 50 in the afternoon.

If the altar was removed from its place, the incense offering should, nevertheless, be offered there. When incense - even a grain of it - flies off the altar, it should not be returned.

3 When the incense is offered in the Sanctuary every day, all of the people depart from the Sanctuary and from [the area] between the Entrance Hall and the altar. No one should be there until [the priest] who offers the incense offering departs. Similarly, at the time when [a priest] enters [to sprinkle] the blood of a sin-offering that is offered inside [the Temple], everyone departs from from [the area] between the Entrance Hall and the altar until he departs, as [Leviticus 16:17] states: "And no person should be in the Tent of Meeting when he enters to atone in the holy place." [This is] a general principle [applying] to all atonement [made] in the holy place: No [other] person should be there.

4 What is the order of the offering of the incense offering each day? [The priest] who merited to remove the ashes from the inner altar enters [the Sanctuary] [holding a] consecrated vessel called a teni. It was gold and would contain two and a half kabbin. He would place the teni on the ground in front of him and scoop up the ashes and the coals on the altar with his hands and deposit them in the teni. At the end, he would sweep off the remainder into it. He would leave [the teni] in the Sanctuary and depart.

The one who merited to bring the incense offering would take a vessel filled to overflowing with incense. [The vessel] had a cover and was called a bezech. He would place the bezech in another vessel that was called a kaf. He would cover the kaf with a small cloth and hold the kaf in his hand. [Another priest] would enter [the Sanctuary] with him holding a fire-pan with fire.

5 How does he collect the coals with the fire-pan? He takes a silver fire-pan and ascends to the top of the altar and moves the coals to the side, taking the coals that have been consumed by the fire in the second array and descends and places them into a golden fire-pan. If a kab or less of the coals have become scattered [on the ground], he should sweep them into the channel [for the outflow]. On the Sabbath, he should cover them with the pisachter. If more than a kab become scattered, he should collect more with the fire-pan.

6 The pisachter would serve three functions: It was used to cover coals and a [dead] crawling animal on the Sabbath and it was used to remove the ashes from the altar.

7 [The priest] who removed the ashes from the inner altar would proceed before them, he would take the teni that contained the ashes from the altar, prostrate himself and depart. [The priest] holding the fire pan would array the coals on the surface of the inner altar, spreading them out with the bottom of the fire-pan. [He would then] prostrate himself and depart. The one holding the kaf would remove the bezech from the kaf and give it to a friend or relative. He checks if some of the incense spilled out [from the bezech] into the kaf. His friend or relative places the incense that spilled and that which is in the bezech in his hands. [He then] prostrates himself and departs.

8 The one who offers the incense is warned: "Be careful. Do not begin [releasing the incense] in front of you, lest you become burned." He begins to pour the incense on the fire gently, like one who sifts flour until it is spread over the entire fire.

9 The priest who offers the incense does not offer it until the overseer tells him: "Offer the incense." If the High Priest is the one offering the incense, the overseer says: "My sir, High Priest, offer the incense." After he says this, all of the people depart [from the area in front of the Temple Building]. He then offers the incense, prostrates himself and departs.

10 The removal of the ashes from the lamps of the Menorah and their kindling in the morning and the afternoon is a positive commandment, as [Exodus 27:21] states: "Aaron and his sons shall arrange it." The kindling of the lamps supersedes [the prohibitions of forbidden labor] on the Sabbath and [the restrictions of] ritual impurity, as do the [other] sacrifices that [are offered at] a fixed time, as [ibid.:20] states: "To raise up a continuously [burning] lamp."

11 How much oil should be put in each lamp? Half a log. [This is implied by the phrase (ibid.:21):] "From the evening until the morning," Implied is that one must use a measure of oil that will enable it to burn from the afternoon until the morning. The Menorah may be dedicated only with the kindling of the seven lamps in the afternoon.

12 What is meant by the expression "the removal of the ashes of the Menorah"? Every lamp that has burnt out should have its wick and its [remaining] oil removed and it should be cleaned. The priest should place another wick and other oil in it, using the half log measure. [The wick and oil he removed] should be placed in the ash-heap near the [outer] altar together with the ashes removed from the inner alter and the outer altar. He should kindle [any] lamp that was extinguished. Kindling the lamps is what is meant by the term hatavah. When one discovers a lamp that has not been extinguished, he should restore it.

13 When the western lamp becomes extinguished, after the ash is removed, it should be rekindled only [from fire] from the outer altar. When any of the other lamps are extinguished, by contrast, they may be rekindled from each other.

14 How are [the lamps of the Menorah] kindled? One should pull its wick out until he kindles it [from another one of the lamps]. He must extend the wicks,] because the lamps are permanently affixed within the Menorah. And he may not use another lamp, because that would be disrespectful.

15 All of the substances that are forbidden to be used as wicks on the Sabbath are forbidden to be used [as wicks] in the Temple for the Menorah. [This is derived from Exodus 27:20 which] states: "To raise up a continuously [burning] lamp." The flame must rise up on its own.

16 [The priest] would not kindle all the lamps at once. Instead, he would kindle five lamps and make an interruption. In the interim, another service was performed. Afterwards, he would reenter and kindle the other two in order to attract the attention of everyone in the Temple Courtyard.

17 Whenever one of the lamps of the Menorah was extinguished, we kindle it from another lamp as we explained.

What is the order in which they were kindled? [The priest] who merited to remove the ashes of the Menorah enters the Sanctuary carrying a vessel referred to as a kuz. It was made of gold and resembled a large pitcher. He would place the wicks that were extinguished and the oil that remained in the lamp in it. He would then kindle five lamps and leave the kuz on the second step of the three steps positioned before [the Menorah] and depart. Afterwards, he would reenter and kindle two lamps, take the kuz in his hand, prostrate himself, and depart.

18 It is a positive commandment to offer the chavitin offering of the High Priest each day, half in the morning together with the continuous offering of the morning and half in the afternoon together with the continuous offering of the afternoon. Kneading [these cakes] and baking them supersede [the prohibitions of forbidden labor] on the Sabbath and [the restrictions of] ritual impurity, as do the [other] sacrifices that [are offered at] a fixed time, as [implied by Leviticus 6:14 which] states [that these cakes must be] tufinei [which allows for the interpretation that they must be] naeh, "attractive," i.e., and thus not baked on the preceding day. Moreover, were they to have been baked on the preceding day, they would have been disqualified by the passage of the night, for the deep frying pan is one of the sacred utensils, as we explained.

19 Grinding the flour for them and sifting it, [which is performed] outside [the Temple Courtyard], does not supersede [the prohibitions of forbidden labor] on the Sabbath.

20 When a [High] Priest offered half [of the cakes] in the morning and then died, or became impure, or contracted a disqualifying physical blemish and another [High] Priest was appointed in his stead, [the latter] should not bring half an isaron [of flat cakes] from home [in the afternoon]. Nor should he bring the half an isaron [remaining] from [the offering of] the first [High Priest]. Instead, he should bring a complete isaron. Half is offered and half is destroyed.

21 Thus two half [esronim] will be offered and two will be destroyed. The two halves that will be destroyed should be left until their form is no longer recognizable and then be taken out to the place of burning. The same laws apply if the half [of a High Priest's offering that was set aside until] the afternoon was lost or became impure.

Where should they be burnt? In the Temple Courtyard.

22 If the High Priest died in the morning after he offered the half of an isaron and another [High] Priest was not appointed, the heirs of the first should bring an entire isaron as atonement for the first. It was also offered complete.
If the High Priest died in the morning before offering [the chavitin] and another [High] Priest was not appointed in his stead, [his heirs] should offer a complete isaron in the morning and a complete isaron in the afternoon. [The amount of] oil and the frankincense offered with it should not be doubled even though [the amount of] flour is doubled. Instead, three lugim of oil and a handful of frankincense is set aside for them, a log and half of oil and half a handful of frankincense for the isaron of the morning and a log and half of oil and half a handful of frankincense for the isaron of the afternoon.

1 All of these services that were performed [in the Temple] every day were performed on the basis of a lottery. How would they conduct themselves? All of the priests of the clan of that day enter the Chamber of Hewn Stone after dawn, while garbed in the priestly garments. The [priest] appointed [to supervise] the lotteries [stands] with them and they stand in a semicircle. The supervisor takes a hat from one of the priests and returns it to him. This is the person from whom they will begin to count and thus determine the lottery, as will be explained.

2 The men [selected to perform] the services proceed to them. The remainder of the priests are taken to the attendants who remove the sacred garments from them, leaving them only with the leggings until they put on their ordinary garments. They then remove the sacred leggings. The attendants then return the garments to the lockers.

3 How would the lottery be carried out? [The priests] would stand in a semicircle. They would decide on a number, e.g., 80, 100, 1000, or any other number that they would choose. Afterwards, the supervisor says: "Stick out your fingers" and they stick out one or two fingers. If one would stick out three, the three are counted. A thumb should not be stuck out in the Temple because of the deceivers. For a thumb is small and it is easy to stick out and then bend over. If one sticks out a thumb, it is not counted.

The supervisor begins counting from [the priest] who was identified by the removal of his hat. They count on their fingers and then repeat until they reach the number they agreed upon. The person upon whose finger the counting was completed is the one who is chosen in the first lottery for the Temple service.

4 Why do they count the number they have agreed upon by the fingers they stuck out instead of counting the people themselves? Because it is forbidden to count Jews except via another entity, as [I Samuel 15:4] states:

"And he counted them with lambs."

5 Four lotteries were carried out each day in the morning. The first lottery was for who would remove the ashes from the altar. The lottery was conducted and the one who merited was chosen to remove the ashes. He also arranges the wood on the altar, and he brings the two logs of wood to the altar, and brings in a fire-pan full of flaming [coals] from the outer altar to the golden altar to offer the incense upon it.

6 Thirteen [priests] are chosen in the second lottery according to the order in which they stand.

What is implied? The supervisor tells them to stick out their fingers and counts as explained. The one who is chosen first by lottery slaughters the continuous offering of the morning. The second priest standing next to him receives the blood of the continuous offering and he casts it [on the altar]. The third, [who stands] next to the second, removes the ashes from the inner altar, the altar of the incense offering. The fourth on his side removes the ashes from the Menorah and kindles the lamps. The fifth brings up the head of the continuous offering and its [right] hindleg to the ramp. The sixth brings up the two forefeet. The seventh brings up the tail and the [left] hindleg. The eighth brings up the breast and the neck. The ninth brings up the two flanks. The tenth brings up the inner organs. The eleventh brings up the flour for the additional offerings. The twelfth brings up the chavitin and the thirteenth brings up the wine of the additional offerings.

7 For the third lottery, the supervisor announces to all the members of the clan of that day: "Whoever has never brought an incense offering should come and enter the lottery." The one chosen first in this lottery merited to offer the incense offering.

8 For the fourth lottery, all the priests gathered. The lottery is held to know who will bring the limbs up from the ramp to the altar. The lottery was held and the one who was chosen merited.

A different lottery was not held for the continuous offering of the afternoon. Instead, all of the priests who were chosen to perform any of the tasks in the morning should also perform them in the afternoon. An exception was the incense offering. Another lottery was made for [the right to offer] it in the afternoon. All those who never brought an incense offering from that clan could come and enter the lottery. If they had all offered incense previously, they are all able to enter the third lottery in the morning and the one who was selected in the morning offers the incense in the afternoon as well.

9 On the Sabbath, when [besides] the continuous offerings, the additional offerings and the two bowls of frankincense were offered, how would they conduct themselves?

In the morning, the lottery was held among the men of clan of the watch that was leaving. They would offer the continuous offering of the morning and the two sheep brought as burnt-offerings for the additional offering. The ones selected to perform the tasks for the continuous offering of the morning would [perform those tasks] for the two sheep [brought as] additional offerings. The watch that enters on the Sabbath would conduct other lotteries for the continuous offering of the afternoon. Both watches would [participate in] the division of the showbread.

10 The [show]bread is not eaten until the two bowls of frankincense are offered on the pyre. The frankincense requires salt like the other sacrifices.

11 These two bowls are offered after the additional offerings. Two priests offer these two bowls.

12 How is the showbread divided on the Sabbaths of the year in general? The watch that enters receives six loaves and the watch that leaves receives six loaves. Those that enter divide [the bread] among themselves in the north, for they are prepared to carry out the Temple service. Those who depart divide it in the south.

When the holiday of one of the three pilgrimage festivals falls on the Sabbath or on Sabbath in the midst of the holiday, all of the watches share equally in the division of the showbread. Similarly, if the first holiday of a festival falls on Sunday, all of the watches share equally in the division of the showbread on the day preceding the festival which is the Sabbath because they came early to the Temple service.

Similarly, if the final day of the festival falls on Friday, all of the watches share equally in the division of the showbread on the Sabbath which is the day following the festival. This practice is an ordinance of our Sages [who instituted it] so that the priests should delay [their departure from Jerusalem so that they share] in the division of the showbread. [In this way,] if one of the members of the watch [of the coming week] would be delayed and not come [on time], another priest will be found [to take his place].

13 If there is one day intervening between the Sabbath and the festival, e.g., the first day of the festival fell on Monday or the last day fell on Thursday, or Shavuot fell on Monday or Thursday, the watch whose time was fixed that week receives ten loaves and the watch which enters receives two. The rationale is that only one day is left for them to serve alone, either Friday or Sunday, and they are indolent and only a few come [to the Temple].

14 The High Priest always receives from each watch, half of the loaves that they receive, as [implied by Leviticus 24:9]: "And it shall be for Aaron and his sons," i.e., half for Aaron and half for his sons. A High Priest never receives a portion of a loaf, because that is not respectful.

Chapter 5

1 It is a positive commandment to arrange the showbread on the [golden] table before God in the Sanctuary, every Sabbath day, as [Leviticus 24:8] states: "On the Sabbath day, on the Sabbath day, the priest shall arrange it."

2 It is clearly evident from the Torah that there were twelve loaves. Each loaf required two esronim [of flour]. [The loaves] were arranged in two sets, six loaves in each set, one loaf on the other. There were three rods of gold placed between the loaves so that the wind could blow through them. Each set was supported by two side-frames. At the side of each set, there is placed a vessel containing a handful of frankincense, as [ibid.:7] states: "And you shall place pure frankincense next to the arrangement." This vessel is called a bezech (dish). Thus there were two handfuls of frankincense in two dishes. These dishes had flat bases so that they could be placed on the table.

3 The two sets of showbread are fundamental necessities for each other. [Similarly,] the two dishes [of frankincense] are fundamental necessities for each other and the sets and the dishes are necessities for each other. The [golden] table should not be dedicated except by placing the showbread on it on the Sabbath.

From one Sabbath to another, the bread that was placed on the table on the previous Sabbath is removed and new bread is arranged there. The bread that is removed is the bread that is divided between the two watches - that which enters and that which departs - and the High Priest and they partake of it.

4 How are the sets of the showbread arranged? Four priests enter [the Sanctuary], two are holding the two sets [of bread] and two, the two dishes [of frankincense]. Four priests enter before them to remove the two sets of bread and the two dishes [of frankincense] that were on the table. The priests that enter stand in the north, facing the south and those that depart stand in the south, facing the north. These remove [the showbread from the previous week] and these place down [the new breads]. One should be within a handbreadth of another, for [Exodus 25:30] states: "[You shall place showbread] before Me continually."

5 When they departed, they would place the bread on a second golden table that would be placed in the Entrance Hall. They would offer [the incense in] the dishes on the pyre and afterwards, the breads were divided. If Yom Kippur fell on the Sabbath, [the breads] are divided in the evening.

6 How is the showbread prepared? 24 se'ah of wheat that is fit [to be made into flour] for meal-offerings are brought. [The kernels] are struck and tread upon like the other kernels of wheat for the meal offerings. They are then ground and sifted with eleven sifters to produce 24 esronim of fine flour. Twelve loaves of unleavened bread are made from it.
If one did not sift [the flour] with eleven sifters or did not use 24 se'ah of grain to produce the flour, [the loaves] are acceptable, since fine flour was produced regardless. These measures were mentioned only as [the optimum manner] for the mitzvah.

7 The kneading and the fashioning [of the loaves] was performed outside [the Temple Courtyard, but] they are baked in the Courtyard like the other meal-offerings. They should be kneaded one by one and baked two by two.

8 They had three molds of gold for them: one in which the loaf was placed while it was dough, the second in which it was baked, and the third in which it was placed when it was removed from the oven so that its [form] would not be impaired.

9 All of these loaves were rectangular, as [Exodus 35:13] states: Lechem Hapanim, [literally,] "the bread of faces," i.e., it had many surfaces. The length of each loaf was ten handbreadths, its width, five handbreadths, and its height, seven fingerbreadths. The length of the table was twelve handbreadths and its width, six handbreadths. [The priest] should place the length of the loaf across the width of the table. Thus the loaf would extend an extra two handbreadths at either side. He should fold up the portions that extend [beyond the table] on either side, leaving space in the middle [of the loaf] between the two ends. Similarly, he should place one loaf on another loaf until he arranged six loaves. Similarly, on the other side, he should make a second arrangement of six loaves.

10 The baking of the showbread does not supersede [the prohibitions of forbidden labor] on the Sabbath and festivals. Instead, on Friday, it was baked and it was arranged on the following day. If the two days of Rosh HaShanah fell on Thursday and Friday, it would be baked on Wednesday.

11 Neither the arrangement of the rods [between the breads], nor their removal, supersedes the Sabbath prohibitions. Instead, on Friday, [a priest] would enter, remove them, and place them along the table's length. And on Sunday, [another priest] would enter and insert them between the loaves.

12 If one arranged the bread as commanded, but did not place with it the bowls of frankincense until the next day and on the following Sabbath he offered [the contents of] the bowls [of frankincense] on the pyres, the bread is disqualified and is not sanctified. Similarly, if he arranged the bread and the bowls on Sunday and offered [the contents of] the bowls on the pyre after the following Sabbath, the bread is not sanctified and is disqualified. If he offered [the contents of] the bowls on the pyre on the Sabbath, the bread is not disqualified.

13 What should be done with the bread and the bowls [of frankincense] that were arranged after the Sabbath? They should be left on the table until the Sabbath day passes while they are arranged. Afterwards, he should offer [the contents of] the bowls [of frankincense] on the Sabbath that followed the Sabbath that passed after they were arranged. [This does not present a difficulty,] because even if the showbread and the bowls [of frankincense] were on the table for several weeks, this does not present a problem.

14 If one arranged the bread and the bowls [of frankincense] on the Sabbath as required and offered [the contents of] the bowls [of frankincense] after the Sabbath- whether after this Sabbath or the following Sabbath - the bread is disqualified. Its status is that of sacred articles that have been disqualified in which instance the prohibitions of notar, piggul and consuming the bread in a state of ritual impurity apply, as will be explained.

15 [The following rules apply if] one of the loaves became broken. If it was broken before the bread was removed from the table, the bread is disqualified, and the [the contents of] the bowls [of frankincense] should not be offered on the pyre because of it. If it was broken after the bread was removed, the bread is disqualified, but the [the contents of] the bowls should be offered.

16 If the time to remove the bread arrived, it is as if the breads were removed. [Even] if a bread became broken, the [the contents of] the bowls should be offered although the arrangement [of the breads] has not been taken apart.

If one of the arrangements became impure - whether before [the frankincense] was offered or afterwards - or one of the bowls [of frankincense] became impure, the entities that are impure are impure and those that are pure are pure.

Chapter 6

1 [The following is] order of continuous offerings brought each day: Shortly before dawn the supervisor in charge of the lotteries comes and knocks gently on [the gates of] the Temple Courtyard. They are opened for him and an inspection is made of the Temple Courtyard. The bakers of the chavitin are roused to prepare the chavitin.

All of the priests there will have already immersed themselves before the supervisor comes and garbed themselves in the priestly garments. They come and stand in the Chamber of Hewn Stone and carry out the first and second lottery and [the priests] who merit [are designated to perform] their services, as we explained.

The one who merited to remove the ashes [from the outer altar] begins removing them according to the procedure we described. Afterwards, he arranges the large array [of wood on the altar], then he arranges the second array, and then he brings up two logs of wood and places them on the array to increase the fire.

Afterwards, they enter the Chamber of the Utensils and remove all the utensils that are necessary for the entire day. They give [the lamb to be sacrificed as] the continuous offering water to drink. The one who merited to slaughter it pulls it to the butchering area. All of the priests who merited to take the limbs [up to the ramp] follow him and wait there until they open the Great Gate of the Sanctuary. When the gate is opened [the lamb to be sacrificed as] the continuous offering is slaughtered.

Afterwards two priests enter the Sanctuary: one who merited to remove the ashes from the inner altar and the other who merited to remove the ashes from the Menorah.

2 The one who removes the ashes from the altar should do that at the same time the slaughterer slaughters [the lamb to be offered] as the continuous offering. Afterwards, the person who receives its blood dashes it on the altar.

3 After the blood is dashed on the altar, [the second priest] in the Sanctuary kindles five lamps and both of them leave the Sanctuary. The priests in the butchering area skin [the lamb] and cut it into portions. Each one brings the limb which he merited to the ramp. The limbs are placed on the lower half of the western portion of the ramp. The portions [of the animals sacrificed as] additional offerings are placed on the lower half of the eastern portion of the ramp. Those of the Rosh Chodesh are placed on the top of the altar between the horns, in the place where the priests walk to publicize that it is Rosh Chodesh. There they salt the limbs. They also salt the ramp, even on the Sabbath, so the priests will not slip and fall while bringing wood up to the ramp. Although the salt intervenes between [the priests'] feet and the ramp, it is not a concern since carrying this wood is not part of [the Temple] service.

4 After the limbs are brought to the ramp, all of the priests gather in the Chamber of Hewn Stone and the supervisor tells them: "Recite one blessing." They begin the recitation of the blessing Ahavas Olam, the Ten Commandments, the passage Shema, the passage Vehayah Im Shamoa, and the passage Vayomer, [the blessing] Emet VaYatziv, and the blessings Retzei and Sim Shalom. On the Sabbath, another blessing is added. It is recited by the members of the priestly watch that depart to the members of the watch that enter: "May He Who causes His name to rest in this house cause love, brotherhood, peace, and friendship to rest among you."
Afterwards, they hold the third and fourth lotteries. The priest who merits to offer the incense enters [the Sanctuary] and offers it. Afterwards, the one who merited to remove the ashes of the Menorah enters and kindles two candles. The priest who offered the incense and the one who removed the ashes of the Menorah depart and stand on the steps of the Entrance Hall together with their priestly brethren.

5 When [the priest who offered the incense] reaches the area between the Entrance Hall and the Altar, [a priest] takes a rake and throws it between the Entrance Hall and the Altar. It made a loud noise. It served three purposes:

a) one who heard its sound would know that his priestly brethren were entering [the Sanctuary] to prostrate themselves and he would [also] run and go.

b) a Levite who heard its sound would know that his Levitical brethren were gathering to begin the singing [that accompanied the offerings] and he would run and go.

c) when the head of the ma'amad heard its sound, he would have the impure people stand at the eastern gate because of the suspicion, i.e., so that everyone should know that they had not brought their atonement offerings as of yet.

Afterwards, [the priest] who merited [to bring up] the limbs, brings the limbs up from the ramp to the altar. After the limbs are brought up, [the priests] standing on the steps of the Entrance Hall begin to recite the Priestly Blessing [as] one blessing [reciting] God's explicit name, as explained in the appropriate place.

Afterwards, they bring the flour of the accompanying offerings up [to the altar]. After the flour, they offer the chavitin on the pyre. After the chavitin, they offer the wine libation. While the wine is being poured, the Levites recite song and the musicians play on the various instruments in the Temple. Nine tekiot are sounded during the bars of the song.

6 When they would give the wine to the priest who would perform the libation, there were two priests holding two trumpets in their hands who would stand on the table where the fats [were placed]. The Segen stands on the corner of the altar with flags in his hands. [When he waves them], they would sound a tekiah, a teruah, and a tekiah. [The priests with the trumpets] would then stand next to the priest who was placed in charge of the cymbals, one to his right and one to his left.

7 When the [priest who offered the libation] bent down to pour it, the segen would wave the flags, [the priest] with the cymbals would sound them and the others would sound the trumpets. The Levites began singing. When they reached [the end] of a bar, [the priests] would sound the trumpets and all the people in the Courtyard would prostrate themselves.
At [the conclusion of] every bar [of the song], they would sound the trumpets and at every trumpet sounding, [the people] would prostrate themselves. There were a total of nine trumpet blasts sounded for the continuous offering, as we explained.

8 Song is recited only over the communal burnt-offerings and peace-offerings which are mentioned in the Torah. Song is not recited over the free-will burnt-offerings that are offered from the remaining funds of the Temple collection even though they are communal offerings. Similarly, when the additional offerings are brought independently, song is not recited over them.

9 [These are] the songs that the Levites would recite: On Sunday, they would recite "The earth and its fullness is God's" (Psalm 24). On Monday, they would recite "God is great and exceedingly praised in the city of our Lord" (Psalm 48). On Tuesday, they would recite "God stands in the council of judges, among the judges, He delivers judgment" (Psalm 82).

On Wednesday, they would recite "The Lord is a God of retribution, O God of retribution reveal Yourself" (Psalm 94). On Thursday, they would recite "Raise joyous song to God our strength; sound the shofar to the God of Jacob" (Psalm 81). On Friday, they would recite "God is King. He clothes Himself with grandeur. God has robed Himself. He has girded Himself with strength" (Psalm 93). On the Sabbath, they would recite: "A psalm, a song for the Sabbath day" (Psalm 92).

For the Musaf offering of the Sabbath, the song Haazinu (Deuteronomy, ch. 32) is recited. It is divided into six segments: haziv lech just as it is read in the synagogue. One segment is recited each Sabbath. After the song is completed on six Sabbaths, they would return to the beginning.

In the afternoon on the Sabbath, they would recite from "Then Moses sang..." and from "Who is like You...." For the Musaf offering of Rosh HaShanah, they would recite "Raise joyous song to God our strength." If [Rosh HaShanah] fell on Thursday, they would recite "I have removed his shoulder from the burden" (Psalm 81:7). In the afternoon on Rosh HaShanah, they would recite: "The voice of God causes the desert to tremble" (ibid. 29:8).

10 When Rosh Chodesh falls on the Sabbath, the song of Rosh Chodesh takes priority over that of the Sabbath in order to publicize that the day is Rosh Chodesh.

11 On the Sabbath, the two bowls of frankincense are offered on the altar's pyre together with the additional offerings before the wine libation that accompanied those offerings.

The order that was followed [for the sacrifices offered] in the morning is followed [for the sacrifices offered] in the afternoon with the exception of the removal of the ashes from the outer altar, the arrangement of the arrays [of wood on the altar], and the lotteries which are only performed each day in the morning, as we explained.

Chapter 7

1 On Rosh Chodesh, the additional offering of Rosh Chodesh is offered after the continuous offering of the morning. What does the additional offering of Rosh Chodesh comprise? Two bulls, one ram, and seven sheep. All are burnt-offerings. A goat is brought as a sin-offering.

2 The procedure through which all the burnt-offerings are offered is the same as that of continuous offering. The procedure through which the sin-offerings of Rosh Chodesh and the festivals are offered is the same as that employed for the sin-offering which is eaten that we described.

3 On Pesach, an additional offering is brought every day, from the first day to the seventh day, like that of the additional offering of Rosh Chodesh: two bulls, one ram, and seven sheep; all are burnt-offerings. A goat is brought as a sin-offering which is eaten.

On the second day of Pesach, the sixteenth of Nisan, besides the additional offering brought each day [of the holiday], a lamb is offered as a burnt-offering together with the omer of barley that is waved. This is a communal meal-offering, as we explained.

4 There is a fixed time [when this offering is brought]. Hence it supersedes [the prohibitions against forbidden labor on] the Sabbath and the restrictions of ritual impurity.

5 This meal offering may be brought only from Eretz Yisrael, as [Leviticus 23:10] states: "And you shall bring the omer, the first of your harvest, to the priest." It is a mitzvah to bring the omer from [fields that are] close [to Jerusalem]. If it was not brought from a close place, it may be brought from any place in Eretz Yisrael.

6 It is a mitzvah that it be reaped at night, on the night of the sixteenth [Nisan]. [This applies] whether [that day falls] during the week or on the Sabbath.

7 The entire night is acceptable for reaping [the barley for] the omer. If it was reaped during the day, it is acceptable.

8 The mitzvah is to bring it from standing grain. If [appropriate standing grain] was not found, it should be brought from the sheaves.

9 The mitzvah is [to harvest grain] that is fresh. If [such grain] was not found, it may be brought from dried grain.

10 Their practice was to bring [the omer] from fields to the south [of Jerusalem]. They would leave one half of the field fallow and sow the other half one year. And the following year, they would leave fallow the half of the field that was previously sown and sow the other half and bring

[the omer] from it.

11 This omer would come from barley. This is a halachah communicated by Moses our teacher.

How was [the offering] brought? On the day before the festival of Pesach, the agents of the court would go out [to the field] and tie [the barley] into bundles while it was still attached to the ground so that it would be easy to reap. [On the evening after Pesach,] all [of the inhabitants] of all the neighboring villages would gather so that it would be reaped with much flourish. They would have three men reap three se'ah of barley in three baskets with three sickles.

When it became dark, the reapers would ask those standing [in attendance]: "Has the sun set?" They would answer: "Yes."

"Has the sun set?" They would answer: "Yes."

"Has the sun set?" They would answer: "Yes."

"Is this a sickle?" They would answer: "Yes."

"Is this a sickle?" They would answer: "Yes."

"Is this a sickle?" They would answer: "Yes."

"Is this a basket?" They would answer: "Yes."

"Is this a basket?" They would answer: "Yes."

"Is this a basket?" They would answer: "Yes."

If it was the Sabbath, they would ask: "Is it the Sabbath?" They would answer: "Yes."

"Is it the Sabbath?" They would answer: "Yes."

"Is it the Sabbath?" They would answer: "Yes."

Afterwards, they would ask: "Should I reap?" They would answer: "Yes."

"Should I reap?" They would answer: "Yes."
"Should I reap?" They would answer: "Yes."
Three [questions and answers] were given regarding each matter. Why was all this necessary? Because of those who erred who departed from the community of Israel in the Second Temple [era]. They maintained that the Torah's expression [Leviticus 23:11]: "From the day following the Sabbath" [should be understood literally, as referring to] the Sabbath of the week. Nevertheless, according to the Oral Tradition, [our Sages] derived that the intent is not the Sabbath, but the festival. And so, was understood at all times by the prophets and the Sanhedrin in every generation. They would have the omer waved on the sixteenth of Nisan whether it fell during the week or on the Sabbath.
[This interpretation is also reflected in the Written Torah itself,] for it is written in the Torah [ibid.:14]: "You shall not eat bread, roasted grain, or kernels of grain until this self-same day." And [Joshua 5:11] states: "And they ate from the produce of the land on the day after Pesach, matzot and roasted grain." And if one would presume that in that year Pesach fell on the Sabbath as these fools have supposed, why would Scripture make the license for them to eat new grain dependent on a factor that is not fundamental, nor the true cause, but mere coincidence. Instead, since [Scripture] made the matter dependent on "the day after Pesach," it is clear that the day after Pesach is the cause that permits new grain [to be eaten] and no attention is paid to the day of the week [on which it falls].

12 They reaped [the barley]; [then] they placed it in the baskets, and brought it to the Temple Courtyard. [There] they beat it, winnowed it, and selected [the kernels]. The barley [kernels] were taken and roasted over the fire in a cylinder with holes so that the fire would reach it in its entirety, as [Leviticus 2:14] states: "From ripe ears, roasted over fire, ground from fresh kernels." According to the Oral Tradition, we learned that the verse is speaking only about the omer meal-offering. After it is roasted, it is spread out in the Temple Courtyard and the wind wafts through it. It is then taken to a mill for kernels and ground [to produce] three se'ah. From that quantity, an isaron is taken out after it has been sifted with thirteen sifters. The remainder is redeemed and [afterwards] may be eaten by any person. Challah must be separated from [that grain], but it is exempt from the tithes, as we explained.

This isaron of fine barley flour is taken and mixed with a log of oil on the sixteenth of Nisan and a handful of frankincense is placed upon it like on the other meal-offerings. It is waved in the eastern portion of the Temple Courtyard, being passed to [all four directions], lifted up and brought down. It is then brought close to the tip of the southwest corner of the altar like the other meal-offerings. A handful of the meal is taken and offered on the altar's pyre. The remainder is eaten by the priests like the remainder of all other meal-offerings.

When is this handful taken? After the additional offering of the day is offered. The lamb brought as a burnt-offering is offered before the continuous offering of the afternoon.

13 It is forbidden to reap any of the species of grain in Eretz Yisrael before the reaping of the omer, [because Leviticus 23:10] refers [to it as]: "the first of your harvest," [implying that] it should be the first [grain] that is reaped.

To what does the above apply? To a harvest from which the omer offering could be brought. [A field located] in parched land in a valley, by contrast, may be reaped before [the reaping of] the omer, because it is not fit to bring [the omer offering] from it. [Even such grain] should not, however, be collected in a grain heap.

14 When grain grew its roots before [the reaping of] the omer, [reaping] the omer causes it to be permitted. If not, it is forbidden to harvest it, just as it is forbidden to partake of it until the omer is harvested next [year].

15 When grain has not completed the final third of its growth, it may be reaped [even if it had not grown roots before the reaping of the omer] to feed it to an animal. [Grain] may be reaped so it does not ruin trees. [Similarly,] it may be reaped to clear a place for an assembly of mourning or an assembly of study. For [the prooftext] states "your harvest." [Implied is that the restrictions] do not [apply] to harvests associated with a mitzvah.

16 Even though it is permitted to reap, one should not bind [the stalks of barley] as sheaves as the reapers do. Instead, he should leave them as small bundles.

17 We already explained that meal-offerings, the meal-offerings for the additional offerings, and first fruits, may not be brought from new grain before the bringing of the omer. If one brought them, the offering is invalid. [Similarly, these offerings] should not be brought before bringing the two loaves [on Shavuot], but if one brought them, the offering is acceptable.

18 Anyone who offers a meal-offering from new grain should recite the blessing Shehechiyanu.

19 When grain was sown after the offering of the omer and harvested after the omer was offered the following year, there is an unresolved doubt: May meal-offerings be brought from it as an initial preference, before the two loaves are brought [on Shavuot], because the two loaves and the omer had been brought while this grain [was growing], or perhaps [meal-offerings] should not be brought from it until after bringing the two loaves, after the omer of the same year were brought.

20 Similarly, if grain was growing in the ground and its leaves began to form or they began to blossom at the time of the bringing of the two loaves, there is an unresolved question if the blossoming or the formation of leaves is considered equivalent to [the grain] taking root, and it is permitted to bring meal-offerings from it, or it is not considered as equivalent to it having taken root. Therefore one should not bring [such offerings]. If one did, [we assume that] they were accepted.

21 One who reaps grain before the harvest of the omer is not liable for lashes and [the grain] he reaps is fit to be used.

22 It is a positive commandment to count seven complete weeks from the day the omer is brought, as [Leviticus 23:15] states: "And from the day after the Sabbath, you shall count... seven weeks." It is a mitzvah to count the days together with the weeks, as [ibid.:15] states: "You shall count 50 days."

One should count at the inception of the [new] day. Therefore one counts at night, [beginning] from the night of the sixteenth of Nisan.

23 When one forgot and did not count at night, he should count during the day. One should count only when standing. If one counted while sitting, he fulfilled his obligation.

24 This mitzvah is incumbent on every Jewish male in every place and at all times. Women and servants are absolved from it.

25 Each night, the [following] blessing should be recited before counting: "Blessed are You, God, our Lord, Who sanctified us with His commandments and commanded us concerning the counting of the omer." If one counted without reciting the blessing, he fulfills his obligation and should not recite the blessing afterwards.

Chapter 8

1 The fiftieth day of the counting of the omer is the holiday of Shavuot. It is also called Atzeret. On this day, an additional offering is brought like the one brought on Rosh Chodesh: Two bulls, one ram, and seven sheep. All are burnt-offerings. A goat is brought as a sin-offering. These are the addition offerings that are mentioned in the Book of Numbers. They are the additional offering associated with the day.

Also, besides the additional offering of this day, a meal-offering is brought from new grain: two loaves. Together with the loaves are offered a bull, two rams, and seven sheep. All are burnt-offerings. A goat is brought as a sin-offering and two sheep are brought as peace-offerings. These are the addition offerings that are mentioned in the Book of Leviticus.

Thus on this day, besides [the two lambs brought as] continuous offerings, there are offered three bulls, three rams, and fourteen sheep - a total of 20 animals - as burnt offerings and two goats as sin-offerings which are eaten and two sheep as peace-offerings which are eaten.

2 These two loaves may be brought only from Eretz Yisrael and from freshly-harvested grain, as [indicated by Leviticus 23:17]: "From your dwelling places, bring bread that will be waved...." If freshly-harvested grain cannot be found, one may bring from that which had been stored away.

3 If wheat kernels descended from the clouds, there is an unresolved doubt whether they are considered as coming from "your dwelling places." Hence, [as an initial preference, the two loaves] should not be brought [from such grain]. After the fact, [the offering] is acceptable.

How are [the two loaves] brought? Three se'ah of wheat from new grain are brought. [The kernels] are struck and tread upon as [is done] for all the meal offerings. They should be ground into fine flour [to produce] two esronim that are sifted with twelve sifters. The remainder is redeemed and [afterwards] may be eaten by any person. Challah must be separated from [that grain], but it is exempt from the tithes, as we explained.

4 The two loaves that come from new grain must each come from an isaron produced from a se'ah and a half [of kernels]. They are sifted with twelve sifters. For the showbread that comes from grain that was grown for a full season, it is sufficient to use eleven sifters and an isaron is produced from every se'ah. The omer which comes from fresh barley does not come from choice grain. [Hence it requires] three se'ah and thirteen sifters.

5 In all these instances, if one added to the number of se'ah used or subtracted from them, [the offering] is acceptable.

6 The two esronim are taken and each one is kneaded into dough individually and baked individually.

7 The dough for them is made and they are shaped outside [the Temple Courtyard]. They are, however, baked inside [the Courtyard] like all the meal-offerings.

8 Preparing these loaves does not supersede [the prohibitions against forbidden labor on] the festivals and needless to say, not [those of the] Sabbath. Instead, they are baked on the day preceding the festival. For [Exodus 12:16 which permits cooking and baking on the festivals states]: "It alone may be done for yourselves." [Implied is an exclusion:] "For yourselves and not for the Most High.

9 If the day before the festival is the Sabbath, they should be baked on Friday and eaten on the third day after they were baked which is the festival.

It is explicitly stated in the Torah that they should be leavened bread. How were they prepared? One would bring yeast from another place and place it into the isaron measure. He would then fill that measure with fine flour and let it leaven with that yeast.

10 They were rectangular. The length of each loaf is seven handbreadths and their width was four handbreadths. Their height was four fingerbreadths.

11 How is the bread waved together with the two sheep brought as peace offerings? Two sheep are brought and they should be waved while they are still alive, as [Leviticus 23:20] states: "And [the priest] shall wave them...." If one waved each of them individually, the obligation is fulfilled. Afterwards, they are slaughtered and skinned.

The breast and the thigh from both of them are taken and placed aside the two loaves. [A priest] should place both of his hands below them and wave them all as a single entity, in the eastern portion of the Temple Courtyard, in the place where all the waving [of offerings] is performed. One should bring them back and forth [to each of the four directions] and up and down. If he waved each of the loaves [together with one breast and one thigh] individually, the obligation is fulfilled.

Afterwards, the eimorim of the sheep are offered on the altar's pyre. The remainder of the meat is eaten by the priests. With regard to the two loaves: the High Priest receives one of them and the other is divided among all the priestly watches. They both may be eaten for the entire day and half the night like the meat of the sacrifices of the most sacred order.

12 [The following laws apply if] one slaughtered the two sheep for four loaves: If [the priest performing the service] said: "Let two of the four become sanctified," he should remove two of the four, and wave them. The remainder should be redeemed inside the Temple Courtyard and eaten outside like other ordinary [bread]. If he did not make such a stipulation, the bread does not become sanctified.

13 If he slaughtered four sheep for two loaves, they should take away two of them and dash their blood on the altar with the intent that they not be for this offering. He should then wave the remaining two together with the two loaves.

14 The two breads are each indispensable requirements for the offering of each other and the two sheep are each indispensable requirements for the offering of each other. If one of them died, fled, or became treifah, a partner should be taken for the second. If one was slaughtered with the proper intent [and then the other died or the like], a partner should be taken for [the first].

15 The two loaves are indispensable requirements for the offering of the sheep, but the two sheep are not indispensable requirements for the offering of the loaves. [Nevertheless,] if [the loaves] were waved together with the sheep, they are indispensable requirements for their being offered. Thus if the loaves were lost, the sheep should be destroyed, and if the sheep were lost, the loaves should be destroyed, and other loaves and other sheep should be brought.

16 How should the two loaves be brought when they are brought without the sheep? They should be waved and then [left] until their form spoils and then taken out to the place where [sacrifices] are burnt. This is a decree, [enacted] lest sheep be available in the coming year and the loaves be offered without them.

The two rams, seven sheep, and the goat, brought on this day because of the loaves, are not indispensable requirements for the offering of the loaves, nor are the loaves indispensable requirements for their being offered.

17 The two bulls of the additional offering of the day, and the bull brought because of the bread, are not indispensable requirements for the offering of each other.

18 The ram of the additional offering of the day, and the two rams brought because of the bread, are not indispensable requirements for the offering of each other.

19 The seven sheep of the additional offering of the day and the seven sheep brought because of the bread are not indispensable requirements for the offering of each other. If they were slaughtered, they are indispensable requirements for the offering of each other.

20 The continuous offerings are not indispensable requirements for the additional offerings, nor are the additional offerings indispensable requirements for the continuous offerings, nor are the additional offerings indispensable requirements for each other, nor is the entire amount of burnt offerings an indispensable requirement.

What is implied? If only six sheep were found, the six should be offered. Even if one found only one sheep, it should be offered. [This applies] whether on Rosh Chodesh or on the festivals or Sabbaths. There is no obligation to offer the other animals on the following day or at any other time. Instead, whenever the date for a communal sacrifice passes without it being offered, [the obligation to offer] the sacrifice is nullified.

If there were only two sheep to be found, and thus if they would be offered for the additional offering of the day, there would not be any for the continuous offering on the next day, the options are of equal weight. If they were offered for the additional offering of that day, the offering [is acceptable]. If it was desired that they be left to be offered on the following day, they should be left.

Chapter 9

1 On the first day of Tishrei, for the additional offering of the day, we offer a bull, a ram, seven sheep, all as burnt-offerings, and a goat as a sin-offering. This is the additional offering of the day aside from the additional offering of Rosh Chodesh that is offered on every Rosh Chodesh. Therefore [if that date] fell on the Sabbath, three additional offerings were brought: the additional offering of the Sabbath, the additional offering of Rosh Chodesh, and the additional offering of that date.

2 What is the order in which they were offered? First they would offer the additional offering of the Sabbath, then the additional offering of the new month, and then the additional offering of the festival. [The rationale is that any offering brought] more frequently than another takes precedence over the other one. Similarly, if [an offering] is on a higher level of holiness than another one, it takes precedence over it. If one has a choice of [an offering that] is brought more frequently and one which is on a higher level of holiness, one may award precedence to whichever one desires.

3 If one transgressed and slaughtered [an animal for an offering that was] not [brought] more frequently, or one which was on a lower level of holiness first, one should offer it [on the altar] and then slaughter the one [brought] more frequently, or one which was on a higher level of holiness.

4 If the two [animals] were slaughtered at the same time, one should stir the blood [of the one that is less frequent or less holy] until the blood of the one that is more frequent or holier is sprinkled [on the altar].

5 The blood of a sin-offering is given precedence over the blood of a burnt-offering, because the blood of a sin-offering brings atonement. [The offering of] the limbs of a burnt-offering take precedence over offering the fats and organs of a sin-offering, because a burnt-offering is consumed entirely by fire.

[If one must choose] between the blood of a sin-offering, or the limbs of a burnt-offering, one may give precedence to whichever one desires. Similarly, [if one must choose] between the blood of a burnt-offering and the fat and organs of a sin-offering or the blood of a burnt-offering and the blood of a guilt-offering, one may give precedence to whichever one desires.

6 A sin-offering takes precedence over a burnt-offering. Even a sin-offering of a fowl takes precedence over a burnt-offering of an animal, as [Leviticus 5:8 which] states: "[who shall offer] the sin offering first." This is a general principal teaching that every sin-offering takes precedence over the burnt-offering that accompanies it. Similarly, when setting aside [animals for sacrifices], one should set aside the animal to be offered as a sin-offering and then the one to be offered as a burnt-offering.

7 This does not apply with regard to the sacrifices of the holiday [of Sukkot]. They are sacrificed in the order that they are mentioned in the Torah, for [Numbers 29:33] states: "according to their ordinance."
What is implied? At first the bulls [should be offered], after them the rams, after them the sheep and after them, the goats, even though the goats are sin-offerings and those which preceded them are burnt-offerings.
Similarly, with regard to the burnt-offering of a bull and the sin-offering of a goat the community brings to atone for the inadvertent transgression [of the prohibitions] against the worship of false deities, the bull is given precedence, because [ibid. 15:24] states: "according to the ordinance."
The bull offered by the anointed priest is given precedence over the bull offered [to atone] for an inadvertent transgression by the community. The latter sacrifice takes precedence over the bull [offered to atone] for the worship of false deities. The latter sacrifice takes precedence over the goat offered with it. Even though the bull is a burnt-offering and the goat is a sin-offering, [the bull is given precedence], for this is the order of the verses in the Torah.

The goat brought [to atone for] idolatry takes precedence over the goat brought by a king, for the king is one individual. The goat brought by a king takes precedence over the she-goat brought by an ordinary individual. The she-goat brought by a private individual takes precedence over a ewe, even though they are both sin-offerings. For a she-goat is fit to be brought [to atone] for [all] sins for which one is liable for karet, for which a sin-offering is brought, and the ewe may not be brought [to atone] for the inadvertent transgression of the prohibitions of idolatry.

8 Even the sin-offering of a fowl brought by a woman after childbirth takes precedence over the sheep she brings. A sin-offering takes precedence over a guilt-offering, because its blood is applied to the four corners [of the altar] and on its base. All of the sin-offerings mentioned in the Torah take precedence over all of the guilt-offerings with the exception of the guilt-offering brought by a person afflicted by tzaraat, because it comes to make a person fit.

A guilt-offering takes precedence over a thanksgiving-offering and the ram brought by a nazirite, because it is a sacrifice of the most sacred order. A thanksgiving-offering and the ram brought by a nazirite take precedence over a peace-offering, because they may be eaten for only one day and require that bread bey brought with them. A thanksgiving-offering takes precedence over the ram of a nazirite, because it must be brought with four types of meal-offerings.

A peace-offering takes precedence over a firstborn offering, because it requires two presentations of blood which are in fact four, leaning on the animal, waving the offering, and accompanying offerings. The firstborn offering takes precedence over the tithe offering, because it is sanctified from the womb and may be eaten only by priests.

The tithe offering takes precedence over fowl because it involves ritual slaughter and it has an element of the most sacred order: its blood and the fats and organs are offered on the altar. Sacrifices of fowl take precedence over meal-offerings, for [they involve offering] blood.

If a person has a sin-offering of fowl, a tithe offering, and a burnt-offering of an animal [to sacrifice], since the burnt-offering takes precedence over the tithe offering and the sin-offering of the fowl takes precedence over the burnt-offering, he should sacrifice the sin-offering of the fowl first, then the burnt-offering, and then the tithe offering.

9 When a person has several types of animals from one type of sacrifice, in which order should they be offered? Bulls take precedence over rams, for their accompanying offerings are larger. Rams take precedence over sheep for the same reason. Sheep take precedence over goats, because they have more fats and organs offered on the altar, because the fat-tail is among the organs of the sheep offered and the goats do not have a fat-tail.

The omer offering takes precedence over the sheep offered with it. The loaves take precedence to the two sheep [offered with them]. This is the general principle: An entity offered because of the day takes precedence over an entity brought because of the bread.

10 A meal-offering brought by a male takes precedence over one brought by a female. A meal-offering of wheat takes precedence over a meal-offering of barley. A meal-offering brought as a sin-offering takes precedence over a meal-offering brought as a free-will offering, because it comes [as atonement] for sin. With regard to a meal-offering brought as a free-will offering and the meal-offering of a sotah, one may give precedence to whichever one desires.

11 Meal-offerings receive precedence over wine libations. Wine libations receive precedence over oil. Oil receives precedence over frankincense. Frankincense receives precedence over salt and salt receives precedence over wood.

When does the above apply? When they are all brought at the same time. When, however, a sacrifice is brought first, it is offered first, and one which is brought last, is offered last.

12 All [the sacrifices] that receive precedence with regard to being offered also receive precedence with regard to being eaten.

13 If a person had before him a peace-offering that had been sacrificed on the previous day, and one that was offered the present day, the one offered on the previous day is given precedence, because the limit [until when it may be eaten] is closer. If one has a peace-offering from the previous day and a sin-offering or a guilt-offering from the present day, the sin-offering and the guilt-offering take precedence, because they are sacrifices of the most sacred order, as we explained.

Chapter 10

1 On the fast day of Yom Kippur an additional offering is offered like that of Rosh HaShanah: a bull and a ram - this ram is called "the ram of the people" - and seven sheep. All are burnt-offerings. A goat [is brought as] a sin-offering and it is eaten in the evening.

2 In addition, the community offers another goat as a sin-offering, it is burnt. Its pair is the goat sent to Azazel.

3 On the first day of the Sukkot festival, the following are brought as the additional offering of the day: thirteen bulls, two rams, and fourteen sheep. All are burnt offerings. And a goat which is eaten [is brought as] a sin-offering. Similarly, on all the seven days of [the Sukkot] festival, two rams, fourteen sheep, and a sin-offering of a goat are offered.

4 The number of bulls [offered], however, is decreased each day. On the second day, twelve bulls are offered, on the third eleven,... until on the seventh day, seven bulls, two rams, and fourteen sheep are all brought as burnt-offerings and a goat is brought as a sin-offering.

5 On Shemini Atzeret, the following are brought as the additional offering of the day: a bull, a ram, and seven sheep. All are burnt offerings. And a goat [is brought as] a sin-offering. This is a separate offering in its own right.

6 On all the seven days of the [Sukkot] festival, a water libation is poured on the altar. This practice is a halachah communicated to Moses on [Mount] Sinai. The water was poured as a separate libation together with the morning wine libation.

7 If one poured the water into the wine or the wine into the water and then poured the two of them as a libation from a single utensil, the obligation is fulfilled. If the water libation was offered before the [daily] sacrifice - indeed, even if it was offered at night - the obligation is fulfilled.
The libation was poured at the southwest corner, above the mid-point of the altar, and then it would all descend to the shittin, as we explained. How was it offered? He would fill a golden vessel that contains three lugin from the Shiloach stream. When they reached the Water Gate, tekiah, teruah,, and tekiah blasts are sounded. [The priest] would ascend the ramp and turn to his left and pour the water into a cup that was positioned there. For there were two silver cups there. The water [was poured] into the western one and the wine libation [was poured] into the eastern one. They were pierced with two small holes like two small nostrils. The hole for [the cup] of water was thinner than that for the wine so that the water would conclude flowing together with the wine.

8 They would tell [the priest] who would pour the water libation: "Lift up your hands," because once [a priest] poured [the water] on his feet, and the entire nation stoned him with their esrogim. For they said: "He was a Sadducee," for they say that there is no water libation.

9 [The water libation] was performed on the Sabbath in the same manner in which it was performed during the week, except that on Friday, a golden jug that was not a sacrificial vessel was filled [with water] and left in the chamber. On the morrow, [the pitcher used for the libation] was filled from it.

10 If the water was spilled or was uncovered, one should fill [the pitcher] from the basin and pour the libation.

11 On every day of the Sukkot festival, a separate song was recited for the Musaf offering. On the first day of Chol HaMoed, they would say: "Render to God, children of the mighty..." (Psalm 29). On the second [day of Chol HaMoed], they would say "And to the wicked, God said..." (Psalm 50). On the third, they would say: "Who will stand up for me against the wicked?..." (ibid. 94:16). On the fourth, they would say: "Understand, you senseless among the people..." (ibid.:5). On the fifth, they would say: "I removed his shoulder from the burden" (ibid. 81:7). On the sixth, they would say: "All the foundations of the earth tremble" (ibid. 82:5). If the Sabbath falls on one of [the days of Chol HaMoed, the verses beginning] "All the foundations tremble" are superseded [by the song for the additional offering of the Sabbath].

12 We have already explained that there are a total of 24 priestly watches and they all serve with equal rights during the festivals. On the holiday of Sukkot, each watch would offer [only] one bull, one ram, or a goat as a sin-offering. With regard to the sheep, however, [there was a difference]. There were watches which would offer two sheep and there were watches that would offer one.

What is implied? On the first day of the festival of Sukkot, there are thirteen bulls, two rams, and a goat. Every watch [that receives an animal to offer] would offer one of these animals. Thus there remain fourteen sheep for eight watches. Six watches offer two sheep and two watches offer one.

On the second day, there are twelve bulls, two rams, and a goat. Every watch [that receives an animal to offer] would offer one of these animals. Thus there remain fourteen sheep for nine watches. Five watches offer two sheep and four watches offer one.

On the third day, there are eleven bulls, two rams, and a goat. Every watch [that receives an animal to offer] would offer one of these animals. Thus there remain fourteen sheep for ten watches. Four watches offer two sheep and six watches offer one.

On the fourth day, there are ten bulls, two rams, and a goat. Every watch [that receives an animal to offer] would offer one of these animals. Thus there remain fourteen sheep for eleven watches. Three watches offer two sheep and eight watches offer one.

On the fifth day, there are nine bulls, two rams, and a goat. Every watch [that receives an animal to offer] would offer one of these animals. Thus there remain fourteen sheep for twelve watches. Two watches offer two sheep and ten watches offer one.

On the sixth day, there are eight bulls, two rams, and a goat. Every watch [that receives an animal to offer] would offer one of these animals. Thus there remain fourteen sheep for thirteen watches. One watch offers two sheep and twelve watches offer one.

On the seventh day, there are seven bulls, two rams, a goat, and fourteen sheep, [an amount of animals] equivalent to the number of watches. Each watch offers one animal.

13 Whichever watch offered a bull one day did not offer a bull the next day. Instead, they would rotate. On the eighth day, they allot them through a lottery in which all watches are equal, as we explained.

14 When the first day of the festival of Sukkot fell on the Sabbath, there would be 61 esronim of accompanying meal-offerings from the additional offerings and the continuous offerings. They would not be mixed together.

15 The accompanying meal-offerings are never mixed together. Instead, the accompanying offerings of bulls [are prepared and offered] separately, those of rams separately, and those of sheep separately. [This applies] both with regard to communal offerings and individual offerings.

16 All of the fats of the sacrifices [that are to be offered on the altar] - whether from communal sacrifices or from individual sacrifices - should not be mixed with each other. Instead, the fats and the organs of each sacrifice are offered on the altar's pyre separately. If, however, they become mixed together, they may be offered all as one.

17 If the meal-offerings of the accompanying offerings become intermingled after each type was mixed with oil separately, they are acceptable.

18 Since the meal-offerings were mixed together and their oil and meal have become intermingled, it is permissible to mix their wine [libations] together as an initial preference. Similarly, if the meal-offerings of the accompanying offerings were already offered, each one separately, it is permissible to mix their wine [libations] together.

19 When the wine-libations of the accompanying offerings are mixed together, it is permissible to mix a wine libation of a sacrifice offered on the previous day with one offered on the present day or those of an individual offering with those of a communal offering.

When one mixes together [wine libations], he may mix the wine libations of the accompanying offerings of bulls with those of the accompanying offerings of rams, or those of the accompanying offerings of sheep with others of the accompanying offerings of sheep. One should not, however, mix the wine libations of the accompanying offerings of sheep with those of bulls or rams.

20 As an initial preference, one should not mix wine [libations] unless the meal-offerings have been mixed together or they have been offered, as we explained.

Mishneh Torah, Sacrifices Rendered Unfit

Trans. by Eliyahu Touger, Moznaim Publishing

Chapter 1

1 All persons disqualified from performing sacrificial service may slaughter sacrificial animals, even sacrifices of the most sacred order, as an initial preference, with the exception of a person who is ritually impure, who may not slaughter as an initial preference. Even though he stands outside the Temple Courtyard and inserts his hands and slaughters in the Courtyard, [he was restricted]. This a decree, lest he touch the [sacrificial] meat.

2 If [an impure person] transgressed and slaughtered [a sacrificial animal], the sacrifice is acceptable. Similarly, with regard to the bull [brought by] the High Priest on Yom Kippur even though [Leviticus 16:11] states: "And Aaron... shall slaughter [the bull]," if a non-priest slaughtered it, it is acceptable. Even a red heifer that was slaughtered by a non-priest is acceptable, for there is no slaughter by a non-priest that invalidates [a sacrifice].

3 When a person slaughters sacrificial animals, but does not have the intent to slaughter them, but instead, is merely busying himself [thoughtlessly], they are disqualified. [He must] have the intent to slaughter them.

4 One should not slaughter the heads of two sacrificial animals at the same time. If one slaughtered [in this manner], the sacrifices are acceptable.

5 Two people may slaughter a sacrificial animal together, just as they may slaughter an ordinary animal.

6 A minor may not slaughter sacrificial animals even if an adult is standing over him. [The rationale is that the slaughter of] sacrificial animals requires concentrated intent and a minor does not have such a potential. Even when [a minor's] deeds indicate that he is acting with intention, [he is] not considered [to have acted] with intention if that will produce a leniency, only if it will produce a stringency.

What is implied? If [an animal to be sacrificed as] a burnt-offering was standing in the southern [portion of the Temple Courtyard] and a minor led it and brought it to the north where he slaughtered it - thus his actions indicate that he intended to slaughter a sacred animal - [the sacrifice] is still disqualified.

7 When sacrifices of the most sacred order were slaughtered in the southern [portion of the Temple Courtyard] or their blood was received there, they are disqualified.

8 If one was standing in the southern [portion of the Temple Courtyard], but he extended his hands into the northern portion and slaughtered [a sacrifice of the most sacred order], his slaughter is acceptable.

9 If, [by contrast, a priest] was standing in the southern [portion of the Temple Courtyard], but he extended his hands into the northern portion and received the blood [of such a sacrificial animal], his receiving of the blood is unacceptable.

10 If he brings his head and the majority of his body into the northern [portion of the Temple Courtyard], it is considered as if he was standing there.

11 If one slaughtered [such an animal] in the northern portion [of the Temple Courtyard] and then in the convulsive movements that accompanied its death, it moved to the southern portion or even if [a priest] took it to the southern portion, it is acceptable. If after these convulsive movements took it to the southern portion and then it returned to the northern portion and its blood was received there, it is acceptable.

Similarly, if [animals to be slaughtered as] sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity were inside [the Temple Courtyard] and one was standing outside the Temple Courtyard and inserted his hand inside and slaughtered it, his slaughter is acceptable.

12 If, [while standing outside the Temple Courtyard, a priest] inserted his hand inside and received the blood, the receiving of the blood is unacceptable. Even if [the entire body of the priest] performing the service was inside [the Temple Courtyard], and his locks of hair were outside, his service is unacceptable, for [when describing the priests' service in the Temple, Leviticus 10:9] states: "When you come to the Tent of Meeting." Implied is that one must enter in his entirety.

13 If in the convulsive movements that accompanied its death, [such an] animal moved out of [the Courtyard] after its blood was received, it is acceptable. For even if the organs and fats to be offered on the altar, and the meat of sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity, were taken outside [the Courtyard] before [the blood] was presented [on the altar], the sacrifice is acceptable, as will be explained.

14 If the entire body of [such an] animal was inside the Temple Courtyard and its foot was outside and it was slaughtered, the sacrifice is unacceptable. For [when speaking of bringing the sacrifices, Leviticus 17:5] states: "And they shall be brought to God." Implied is that they should be entirely within [the Courtyard].

15 If one slaughtered [a sacrificial animal] while it was located entirely in [the Temple Courtyard], and afterwards, it moved one of its feet outside, he should cut off the meat until he reaches the bone, and afterwards, the blood should be received. If he received the blood and afterwards, cut off the meat, it is disqualified because of the fat of the meat that is outside [the Temple Courtyard].

With regard to sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity, there is no need to cut off [the meat]. Instead, he should bring its foot back inside [the Temple Courtyard], and receive the blood. For [even] if meat from sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity were taken out [of the Temple Courtyard] before their blood was cast [on the altar], [the sacrifice] is acceptable.

16 If one hung the animal [above the earth] and slaughtered it in the free space of the Temple Courtyard, it is unacceptable, for [Leviticus 1:11] speaks [of slaughtering animals] "on the flank of the altar," implying that one must slaughter on the ground.

17 If the [sacrificial] animal was on the ground, but [the slaughterer] was hanging in the air and he slaughtered the animal while hanging, this disqualifies sacrifices of the most sacred order. Sacrifices of lesser sanctity, by contrast, are acceptable.

18 If one slit the lesser portion of the organs that must be slit for ritual slaughter outside [the Temple Courtyard], and one completed the slaughter inside or one slit the lesser portion of the organs in the southern portion of [the Temple Courtyard], and completed the slaughter in the north, they are unacceptable. For ritual slaughter is considered as one continuous, integral act from the beginning to its completion.

19 If one was hung and received the blood from the neck of a [sacrificial] animal that is located on the ground, [the act] is unacceptable, because this is not the manner of Temple service.

20 If one was standing in the Temple Courtyard and hung a receptacle over his arm and received the blood in the air, or lifted the animal and thus received the blood in the air, [the act] is acceptable, for the open space above the place is considered as the space itself.

21 If one placed one receptacle within a second receptacle and received the blood, [the act] is acceptable, one substance is not considered as an interposing substance for another substance of the same type. If one placed fibers inside the receptacle and received the blood, [the act] is acceptable, because the fibers are porous and thus the blood descends into the receptacle and there is no interference. If, however, one does this while taking a handful of flour from a meal offering and took the handful with the fibers, it is unacceptable.

22 Receiving the blood [of a sacrificial animal], bringing it to the altar, casting it on the altar and bringing the limbs [of a sacrificial animal] to the ramp, are all tasks that are only acceptable if performed by a priest who is fit to perform service, as we explained with regard to taking the handful of flour from a meal offering or snipping of the head of a fowl.

23 Bringing [blood or limbs] to the altar in a way other than walking is not considered as bringing them. Therefore if a priest receives the blood [and while] standing in that place, casts it on the altar, the sacrifice is disqualified.

24 If [the priest] received [the blood] with his right hand and then transferred [the receptacle in which he received] it to his left hand, he should return it to his right hand. If he received [the blood] with an ordinary utensil, the sacrifice is disqualified. If he received it in a sacred receptacle and transferred it to an ordinary receptacle, he should return it to a sacred receptacle.

25 If [the blood] spilled out of the receptacle on to the floor [of the Temple Courtyard, the sacrifice] is acceptable if one gathers up [the blood]. If, however, it spilled out from the neck of the [sacrificial] animal to the floor, and then was collected and placed in a sacred receptacle, the sacrifice is disqualified.

26 If some of the blood from the neck of the [sacrificial] animal was spilled on the ground and not collected, but [a priest] received the remainder from the neck of the animal, [the sacrifice] is acceptable, provided the blood that was received is [the animal's] lifeblood and not blood concentrated [in the limbs] or the blood of the skin.

27 If any of the individuals who are unacceptable to perform Temple service receive the blood [of a sacrificial animal], bring the blood to the altar, or cast it on the altar as required by law, the sacrifice is disqualified. If [a priest] who is acceptable for such service receives the blood and gives it to one who is unacceptable, but the latter does not walk with it, but instead stands in his place, he should return it to the acceptable [priest]. If, however, the unacceptable person carried it [toward the altar] and then returned it to the acceptable [priest] who carried it [to the altar] or the acceptable priest carried it [to the altar] and then gave it to the unacceptable one who carried it, since it was carried by the unacceptable person, whether at the beginning or the end, the sacrifice is disqualified, because this matter cannot be corrected.

28 [The following laws apply if] the blood was received by an unacceptable person. If any of [the animal's] lifeblood remains, an acceptable [priest] should receive the blood, bring it [to the altar], and cast [it upon it]. [The rationale is that] individuals who are unacceptable for Temple service do not cause the remainder of the blood to be considered as remnants.

An exception is one who is impure. Since he is fit to carry out Temple service when a sacrifice is brought in a state of impurity as explained, he causes [the blood to be considered as] remnants. What is implied? If an impure [priest] received the blood [of a sacrificial animal] even if an acceptable [priest] received [the animal's] lifeblood afterwards and cast it [upon the altar], the sacrifice is disqualified. For [the blood] received by the acceptable [priest] afterwards is considered as remnants and is of no consequence.

29 When even the slightest substance is taken from one of the [sacrificial] animal's limbs after it was slaughtered, but before its blood was cast upon the altar, it is disqualified. Even if one [merely] mutilated the ear of an animal before [its blood] was received, it is as if [its blood] was not received. [This is derived from Leviticus 16:14 which] states: "And he shall take from the blood of the bull." [Implied is that] it must be entirely whole at the time [the blood] is received. If one received [the blood] of an imperfect [animal] and cast it upon the altar, [the sacrifice] is unacceptable.

30 If, however, its substance was reduced after [its blood] was received, before it was cast [on the altar], even if the meat was lost before the blood was cast [on the altar] or it was consumed by fire, he should cast the blood [on the altar] as long as an olive-sized portion of the meat or the organs and fats to be offered on the altar's pyre remain. If not even that remains, he should not cast the blood. With regard to a burnt-offering, even if half an olive-sized portion from the meat and half an olive-sized portion of the organs and fats [remain, he should cast the blood], because the entire [animal] is [offered on the altar's] pyre.

31 If less than an olive-sized portion [of a burnt-offering remains], [the blood] should not be cast [on the altar]. If it is cast [upon it], the sacrifice is not received with favor [Above]. If the meat is disqualified before [the blood] is cast on the altar or it was taken out of the Temple Courtyard, the blood should not be cast. If, however, it was cast, the sacrifice is received with favor [Above].

32 When the meat of sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity was taken out of the Temple Courtyard before the blood was cast [on the altar], even though the blood was cast [upon the altar] while the meat was outside, the sacrifice is acceptable, because ultimately, the meat will be taken outside [the Temple Courtyard].

Casting [the blood on the altar] is effective with regard to [the obligation to have the sacrificial meat] which was taken out [of the Temple Courtyard] burnt, but not to have it permitted to be eaten.

33 Similarly, when the organs and fats to be offered on the altar from sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity were taken out [of the Temple Courtyard] before their blood [was cast on the altar] and the blood was cast [on the altar] when they were outside, the sacrifice was not disqualified. If they were returned [to the Temple Courtyard], they should be offered on the altar's pyre. Even if they were not returned [to the Temple Courtyard], one is liable for violating the transgressions [against partaking of] piggul, notar, and impure [sacrificial] meat if he partakes of them.

34 With regard to any sacrifices [brought by] a private individual, whether the meat became impure, but the fats are intact or the fats became impure, but the meat remains intact, the blood should be cast on the altar. If they both became impure, the blood should not be cast. If, however, it was cast on the altar, the sacrifice is received with favor [Above], for the High Priest's forehead plate arouses [God's] favor. Similarly, when fats and organs to be offered on the altar's pyre or the limbs of a burnt-offering became impure and they were [nonetheless] offered on the altar, the High Priest's forehead plate arouses [God's] favor, as explained. With regard to any of the communal sacrifices, [even if] all of the meat and fats became impure, the blood should be cast [upon the altar].

35 When the blood of sacrificial animals was taken outside the Temple Courtyard, the sacrifice is disqualified. Even though it was brought back inside and cast on the altar, the sacrifice is not received with favor [Above].

36 No blood from sacrificial animals is susceptible to ritual impurity at all. For [Deuteronomy 12:16] states with regard to blood: "You shall pour it on the earth like water." [Implied is that] blood which is poured out like water is considered as water and is susceptible to ritual impurity. The blood of sacrificial animals, by contrast, is not poured out like water and hence is not susceptible to ritual impurity.

37 When the sun sets and the blood from a sacrificial animal [slaughtered that day] has not been cast [on the altar], the sacrifice is disqualified. If [the blood] is cast [on the altar afterwards], [the sacrifice] is not received with favor [Above].

Chapter 2

1 [With regard to the presentation of] the blood from any of the sacrifices on the outer altar: as long as one makes one presentation of blood, atonement is generated. Even with regard to a sin-offering, one presentation is of fundamental importance. Making the remaining [three of] the four [required] presentations is [merely] the optimum manner of fulfilling the mitzvah, as [implied by Deuteronomy 12:27]: "The blood of your sacrifices shall you pour on the altar." [One can infer that one] pouring of blood on the altar is of fundamental importance.

2 Whenever [a priest] poured [blood] over the altar when he should have cast it upon it, the obligation is fulfilled, as [implied by the verse:] "The blood of your sacrifices shall you pour."

3 With regard to all of the blood presented on the inner altar, if one of the presentations is lacking, the sacrifice does not bring atonement. Instead, all of them are integral for the atonement, for Scripture was precise with regard to their number, as [Leviticus 4:7, 17; 16:14] states: "seven times."

4 If the owner died after one of the presentations of the blood of a sin-offering was made, the remainder of the presentations should be made after his death.

5 If, however, he made one presentation during the day, he should not make the [remaining] three at night.

6 If one made one [of the presentations of blood required to be made on] the inner altar on [that altar] and made the remainder on the outer [altar], he is liable for [karet] for offering [a sacrifice] outside its appropriate place.

7 If [a priest] was sprinkling [the blood of a sacrifice on the altar] and his hand was cut off before the blood reached the space above the altar, the sprinkling of the blood is not acceptable.

8 If one changed [the order] of corners [of the altar on which the blood was presented when bringing] a sin-offering - whether for a sin-offering [whose blood] is offered on the inner altar or a sin-offering [whose blood] is offered on the outer altar - [the sacrifice] is disqualified. If, however, [the order of the presentation of the blood] for other sacrifices is changed, [the sacrifices] are acceptable.

9 If [the priest] presented the blood beyond the corner of the altar - whether for a sin-offering or for another offering and whether for the inner altar or for the outer altar - [the sacrifice] is unacceptable.

10 When blood that according to [the Torah's] command should have been presented above the midpoint of the altar was presented below it;

if according to [the Torah's] command, it should have been presented below the midpoint of the altar, but it was presented above it;
if [blood that] according to [the Torah's] command should have been presented inside [the Temple] and was presented on the outer altar;
if [blood that] should have been presented on the outer altar was presented in [the Temple]; or if blood that should have been presented on the outer [altar] was presented on the ramp in a place that is not opposite the foundation [of the altar], [in all these instances,] the meat of the sacrifice is unacceptable. Nevertheless, the owners of the sacrifices receive atonement because of it, for its blood has reached the altar. Although it did not reach the proper place, it is as if it reached its [proper] place with regard to atonement.
When does the above apply? When the person casting [the blood] is acceptable for Temple service. If, however, a person fit for Temple service received [the blood] and gave it to a person who is unacceptable and that unacceptable person presented [blood] that should have been presented above [the midpoint] of the altar below its midpoint, [blood] that should have been presented [on the] outer [altar] was presented inside [the Temple Sanctuary], [blood] that should have been presented inside [the Temple Sanctuary] was presented[on the] outer [altar], or one presented [the blood] on the ramp in a place that is not opposite the foundation [of the altar], the meat of the sacrifice is not disqualified if [any of the sacrificial animal's] blood of life remains. Instead, an acceptable person should receive the remainder of the blood of life and cast it [on the altar] in its appropriate place.

11 [The following rules apply when] the blood of sacrificial animals becomes mixed between two types of blood or between two cups of blood. If [the blood of sacrifices that require] one presentation [of blood] was mixed with [the blood of others that require] one presentation [of blood], one presentation should be made of the entire [mixture]. Similarly, if [the blood of sacrifices that require] four presentations [of blood was mixed] with [the blood of others that require] four presentations, four presentations should be made of the entire [mixture]. If, [however, the blood of sacrifices that require] one presentation [of blood] was mixed with [the blood of others that require] two presentations that are four, one presentation should be made of the entire [mixture].

If [blood that was] to be presented on the upper [half of the altar] became mixed with [blood that was] to be presented on the lower [half of the altar], all [the blood] should be poured into the [waste] channel and the sacrifices are disqualified. Even if the remainder of [the blood from] a sin-offering is mixed with the blood of a burnt-offering in which instance, all of the blood should be presented on the bottom of the altar, the entire [mixture] should be poured into the [waste] channel.

12 If [blood from a sin-offering became mixed with the remnants of the blood of a burnt-offering] and [the priest] did not inquire [concerning the law], but instead presented some of the mixture on the upper portion [of the altar] and some on the lower portion, it is acceptable. If he presented a portion on the upper [portion of the altar] and then inquired, he should present [the remainder] on the lower portion. He is considered to have fulfilled his obligation for both [sacrifices].

13 If blood that was required to be presented in the Temple building became mixed with blood to be presented on the outer [altar], the entire [mixture] should be poured into the [waste] channel. If he did not inquire and took the mixture of the blood and presented some in the Temple [building] and some outside - whether first he presented it inside and then he presented it outside or first he presented it outside and then he presented it inside - everything is acceptable.

When does the above apply? With regard to the blood [of the sacrifices that must] be presented on the outer [altar] with the exception of a sin-offering. If, however, the blood of a sin-offering that should be presented outside becomes mixed with the blood of a sin-offering that should be presented inside, it is acceptable [only] if one made the presentation outside and then made the presentation inside. If, however, one made the presentation inside and then made the presentation outside, [the sacrifice whose blood was to be presented outside] is unacceptable. [The rationale is that] the blood of a sin-offering that was brought into the Temple building - even the blood of a sin-offering brought by an individual [whose meat] should be eaten - becomes forbidden, as [implied by Leviticus 6:23]: "Any sin-offering whose blood has been brought [into the Tent of Meeting... shall not be eaten]."

[The above applies] provided [the blood] is brought in through the gate to the Temple Building, for the prooftext speaks of it being "brought," implying an ordinary manner of entrance. If, however, it was brought in through a wicket or through a window or the roof, it is not disqualified.

14 When the blood from a bull brought [because of the violation of a law] forgotten [by the High Court] or from a goat brought [because of the violation of the prohibition against] idol worship which should be brought into the Sanctuary was brought to the Holy of Holies, it is disqualified. For this place is inward with regard to the appropriate place for this blood.

Similarly, with regard to the bull and the goat brought on Yom Kippur whose blood is brought into the Holy of Holies, if the blood [of these offerings] was brought into the Holy of Holies and sprinkled there, was then taken to the Sanctuary and afterwards, returned to the Holy of Holies, it is disqualified. [The High Priest] should not complete the sprinkling [of the blood] in the Holy of Holies. Once he departs, he has departed.

Similarly, if he completed the sprinklings in the Holy of Holies, then brought the blood into the Sanctuary and made some of the sprinklings [required there], then took [the blood] out of the Sanctuary and afterwards returned it, he should not complete the sprinklings in the Sanctuary. [The rationale is that] since the blood was taken out of its place, it became disqualified.

15 If the blood of an [ordinary] sin-offering was received in two cups and one of them was taken outside, the one that remained inside is acceptable and the sprinklings may be performed. If, [by contrast,] one [of the cups] was taken into the Sanctuary and sprinkled there, even the one left outside is disqualified, as [implied by the prooftext] : "whose blood has been brought in," i.e., even if only a portion of its blood was brought in to the Sanctuary to bring about atonement, it is disqualified.

16 [The following rules apply when] the blood of an [ordinary] sin-offering was taken into [the Sanctuary] to achieve atonement, but nothing was done and instead, he took it out without sprinkling it inside. If he brought it in unknowingly, [the blood] remains acceptable and should be sprinkled outside, for nothing to achieve atonement was done in the Sanctuary. If he brought it in intentionally, it is disqualified.

17 If the sin-offering itself was brought into the Sanctuary, it is acceptable, because [the prooftext] mentions "whose blood was brought in," [i.e., it is the blood] and not the meat [that disqualifies it].

18 When a sin-offering of a fowl moved in its death throes and entered the Sanctuary, it is acceptable.

19 If the blood of a sin-offering of a fowl was taken into the Sanctuary in its neck, there is an unresolved doubt whether its neck is considered a receptacle [which would disqualify the sacrifice].

20 If the blood of a sin-offering of a fowl was spilled and then collected, there is an unresolved question: Does the receptacle disqualify the blood or not? Therefore the fowl should be burnt like all the sin-offerings of fowl concerning which there are unresolved doubts.

21 When [a priest] received the blood of a sin-offering in four cups and made one presentation [on the altar] from each cup, the remainder of all four cups is poured on the altar's base, as [Leviticus 4:30] states: "And all of its blood shall be poured [on the base of the altar]." If he made all four presentations from one cup, the remnants of that cup should be poured on the altar's base and the other cups poured in the drainage canal.

22 When blood falls into water or into ordinary blood, it should not be sprinkled on the altar. If it was sprinkled, it is disqualified. When water fell into blood in a receptacle, if it has the appearance of blood, it is acceptable. If wine or ordinary blood fell into it, we make an assessment [as follows]: Were it to have been water would there have been enough to nullify the blood in the receptacle to the extent that it would no longer have the appearance of blood, he should not sprinkle from [the mixture]. If there would not have been enough to nullify its appearance, he should sprinkle from it.

23 When the blood of sacrificial animals becomes mixed with the blood of animals that are disqualified from the altar or with the blood of sacrificial animals that were disqualified because of unsatisfactory ritual slaughter, the entire mixture should be poured into the drainage canal. Even if all the cups [of blood] were offered aside from one, it should be poured into the drainage canal and all of those offerings are unacceptable.

If the [life-]blood [of a sacrificial animal] became mixed with blood concentrated [in the limbs], [the mixture] should be poured into the drainage canal. If, [however,] one did not ask and presented [the blood on the altar], [the sacrifice] is acceptable.

24 If one cast the organs and fats offered on the altar, the limbs of burnt-offerings, the handfuls [of meal offered on the altar], the frankincense, or the meal-offerings that are to be burnt on the [altar's] pyre after they were consecrated in a sacred utensil, whether by hand or with a utensil, whether with one's right hand or with one's left hand, they are acceptable.

25 When wine or water was poured [on the altar as a libation] with a bowl, the hin measure, or another sacred utensil, it is acceptable. If they were poured with an ordinary vessel or by hand, they are unacceptable.

26 When one arranged the limbs [of a burnt-offering] or the handful [of meal from a meal-offering] and then arranged the logs for the altar's pyre above them or arranged them at the side of the limbs, there is an unresolved doubt whether this is considered as the typical way of having them consumed by fire or not. Therefore as an initial preference, one should not offer them in this manner, but if one did, it is acceptable.

1 When sacrifices of the most sacred order were slaughtered on the top of the altar, it is as if they were slaughtered in the northern [portion of the Temple Courtyard], as [Exodus 20:21] states: "You shall slaughter upon it your burnt-offerings and your peace-offerings." This teaches that the entire altar is an appropriate place for the slaughter of burnt-offerings and peace-offerings.

2 When a burnt-offering was slaughtered on the top of the altar or it was slaughtered below [on the ground of the Temple Courtyard] and then brought up to the top of the altar, it should be skinned and cut into portions in that place. The inner organs should be taken down and washed below and then brought back [to the top of the altar]. The skin should be taken down and given to the priests.

3 Similarly, when [other] sacrifices that had been slaughtered were brought up to the altar, they should be skinned and cut into portions in that place. The inner organs should be taken down and washed below and then brought back [to the top of the altar]. The skin and the meat should be taken down and given to the owners. The remainder [of the sacrifice] should be offered on the altar's pyre.

Why shouldn't he bring down the entire [carcass] instead of skinning it and cutting it up on the top of the altar? Because anything that is fit to be offered on the pyre if it was brought up to the top of the altar should not be taken down, as [indicated by ibid. 29:36]: "Everything that touches the altar shall be sanctified."

Does [the above principle apply] even when [the entity brought to the top of the altar] is not fit [to be offered on the altar's pyre]? It is taught [Leviticus 6:2] "It is the burnt-offering on the pyre." Just as the burnt-offering is fit to be consumed by the altar's pyre should not be taken down once it was taken up [to the altar], so too, any entity that is fit for the altar's pyre if it is brought up, it should not be brought down.

4 When [an animal to be sacrificed as] a burnt-offering is brought up to the top of the altar while alive, it should be brought down, because it is not yet fit [to be consumed by the altar's pyre].

5 Similarly, a handful of meal from a meal-offering that was not consecrated in a sacred vessel and all entities that are forbidden to be offered on the altarshould be taken down from the altar even if they were brought up, because from the outset, they were not fit [to be offered on the pyre].

6 Similarly, when a consecrated animal was slaughtered at night, its blood was spilled, or its [blood] was taken out of the Temple Courtyard, if it was taken up [to the altar's top], it should be taken down.

7 [Different rules apply] if, by contrast, sacrificial animals were left overnight - whether their blood, their meat, or their fats and organs were left overnight;
a sacrificial animal was taken out of the Temple Courtyard;
it became impure or disqualified because of a disqualifying thought concerning the time [it was to be eaten] or the place [it was to be eaten];
it was sacrificed for the sake of a different offering;
impure [priests] received its blood and cast it on the altar; [this is significant] since they are fit to perform Temple service when a sacrifice is brought in a state of impurity;
when the blood was presented in an improper place;
or sacrifices of the most sacred order were slaughtered in the southern portion of the Temple Courtyard or their blood was received there.
Although in all of these situations, [the sacrifices] are disqualified, if [the meat, fats, and/or organs] were brought to the top of the altar, they should not be taken down.

8 [This is the general principle:] Whenever an entity is disqualified in the Temple Courtyard, the holiness [of the altar] accepts it. Just as when these entities were brought up, they should not be taken down, so too, if they were taken down, they should not be brought up a second time. For they have been disqualified.

9 If the [altar's] fire took hold of them [before they were brought down from the altar], they should be brought up again [so that] they will be consumed by its fire.

10 When the handful of meal [from the meal-offering] becomes disqualified as piggul, and a portion of it is on the ground and a portion took fire, the entire [handful] should be brought up [to the altar to be consumed].

11 When limbs, fats, and handfuls of meal were left overnight on the top of the altar, it is as if they were left overnight in the Temple Courtyard. If they were brought down from the altar, they should not be brought up again. If, however, they were not brought down, they should be offered on the altar's pyre in all situations.

12 The open space above the altar is considered as the altar. When one brought the fats and the organs of sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity up [to the altar] before their blood was poured on the altar, they should not be taken down, because they have become "the food of the altar."

13 [The following law applies when a person] sets aside two [animals for] a guilt-offering, one intended to serve as surety for the other. If he slaughtered both of them and brought the fats and organs of one up [to the altar] before [the blood] was cast [upon it], they should be brought down.

14 When an unacceptable sacrifice and unacceptable wine libations were brought up to the altar, the sacrifice should not be taken down as we explained. The wine libations, [by contrast,] should be taken down. Similarly, when wine libations are brought independently and they were disqualified and brought to the top of the altar, they should be taken down.

15 When melikah was performed on a fowl by a non-priest and then it was brought to the top of the altar, it should not be taken down. If, [by contrast,] a handful of meal was taken by a non-priest and brought to the top of the altar, it should be brought down. Even though both of these acts disqualify [the offerings], [the handful from the meal-offering] is considered as if it was never consecrated at all. [These laws apply to] a non-priest as well as to anyone else who is disqualified [from performing sacrificial service].

16 The following, however, should be taken down [even though] they were brought up to the top of the altar, anything that is not fit for the altar's pyre. [This includes:] the meat of sacrifices of the most sacred order, the meat of sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity, the remainder of the omer, the remainder of the meal-offerings, the two breads [offered on Shavuot], the showbread, the incense offering, the wool that is on the heads of sheep, the hair on the beards of goats, the bones, the sinews, the horns, and the hoofs if they are not attached to [the animal's body]. [In all these instances,] if [these entities] were brought to the top [of the altar], they should be brought down.

17 If some of the oil from the handful of meal was squeezed out on a bone [that had been laying on the altar] and then the bone was taken down, it should be returned [to the altar]. [The rationale is that] there is an unresolved doubt whether entities attached to entities that should be brought up [to the altar] are considered as if they should be brought up as well.

18 The inner altar sanctifies unacceptable entities whether they are fit for it or not fit for it, but the outer altar only sanctifies unacceptable entities that are fit for it, as we explained.

What is implied? When sacrifices that were disqualified are brought up to the outer altar, they should not be brought down. If an unfitting incense offering was offered upon it, it should be brought down, because an incense offering is not fit for the outer altar. If, by contrast, a handful of meal from the meal-offering was placed on the inner altar, it should not be taken off, whether it was fit or not fit. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

Just as the altar sanctifies any entity that is fit for it, so too, the ramp, and other sacred utensils, sanctify what is fit for them. For with regard to the sacred utensils, [Exodus 30:29] states: "Any entity that touches them will be sanctified." Thus when an entity that is fit for it reaches the ramp, it should not be brought down even though it is disqualified. Similarly, if any entity that is fit for a sacred vessel reaches a sacred vessel, it should never be redeemed even though it was disqualified, as stated in Hilchot Issurei HaMizbeiach.

19 Vessels made for liquids do not consecrate solids and vessels made for solids do not consecrate liquids.

To what does the above apply? To the liquid and dry measures that existed in the Temple which we mentioned in Hilchot K'lei HaMikdash. Receptacles, by contrast, consecrate both liquids and solids. Sacred utensils sanctify blood that was disqualified and cause it to be offered [on the altar].

20 Sacred vessels only consecrate [entities] in the Temple. Also, they only consecrate [entities placed in them] willfully, from their insides, and when intact. [The following rules apply if] a hole was made within them. If they could still be used to perform the original task for which they were used when intact, they consecrate what is placed within. If not, they do not consecrate [their contents].

They consecrate [their contents] only when they are full. The measures do not consecrate their contents when they are lacking unless one intends to fill them. If one does not intend to fill them, they consecrate their contents only in that [the contents] could [later] be disqualified, but not to have them offered.

21 [When an entity is placed] in a sacred vessel at an inappropriate time, it is consecrated only to the extent that it is disqualified, not that it should be offered.

What is implied? When an entity whose mitzvah is performed during the day is placed into a sacred vessel at night, it is disqualified. It should be burnt, but not sacrificed. For example, if a handful is taken from a meal-offering at night and that handful is placed in a sacred vessel, it should be burnt.

22 When an altar became damaged, all of the sacrificial animals that were in the Temple and had been slaughtered, but whose blood had not been cast on the altar, are disqualified. For there is no altar on which to cast the blood and [Exodus 20:21] states: "And you shall slaughter upon it your burnt-offerings and your peace-offerings." Implied is that when you slaughter [your offerings,] it shall be intact and not blemished.

23 Sacrificial animals that were alive and located in the Temple Courtyard at the time [the altar] became damaged are not disqualified. Instead, when the altar is repaired, they should be sacrificed. [The rationale is that] living animals are not deemed unacceptable forever.

24 If animals were consecrated before the altar was built, they should be sacrificed after the altar was built, for the fact that they could not [be sacrificed] originally is not a disqualifying factor.

25 Similarly, sacrificial meat should not be eaten while the altar is damaged, as [Leviticus 10:12] states: "You shall eat it as unleavened bread near the altar." This also applies to sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity; they should not be eaten in Jerusalem while the altar is damaged until it is repaired.

Chapter 4

1 [All of the following:]
a) the offspring of [an animal designated as] a sin-offering,
b) an animal exchanged for [an animal designated as] a sin-offering, c)[an animal designated as] a sin-offering whose owner dies, and
d) such animal that was lost and then found only after the owner secured atonement, should be consigned to die.
[In the latter instance, if the first animal designated as a sin-offering] was found after the second that was set aside was slaughtered, but before its blood was presented on the altar, there is an unresolved doubt if it should be consigned to death or left to pasture until it contracts a disqualifying blemish. Therefore it should be consigned to death.
What is meant by being consigned to death? Not that one should kill them with a utensil or by hand. Instead, they should be brought into a room, locked inside, [and left] until they die. All of these matters were conveyed by Moses our teacher.
All of the above applies only to a sin-offering designated by an individual. [An animal designated as] a communal sin-offering, by contrast, which was lost and then discovered after atonement was secured - whether it is fit [to be offered as a sacrifice] or unfit- should be left to pasture until it contracts a blemish and then sold. The proceeds should be used for freewill offerings.

With regard to communal sin-offerings, it is impossible to speak of offspring, exchanges, or the owners dying, because all of the communal offerings are male. The community cannot exchange one sacrificial animal for another as will be explained. And the entire Jewish people will not die.

2 When the bull and/or the goat of Yom Kippur were lost, other [animals] were set aside instead of them [and sacrificed, and then the original animals were found], they should be left to pasture until they contract a disqualifying blemish. [Then] they should be sold and the proceeds used for freewill offerings. [The rationale is that] a communal sin-offering is never consigned to death. [This same law applies when] the goats sacrificed as [atonement for the worship of] false divinities are lost other [animals] were set aside instead of them [and sacrificed, and then the original animals were found].

Why are [the animals that were lost and then discovered] themselves not offered as freewill offerings, for they are male? This is a decree, forbidding [offering them] after atonement was achieved, [lest they be offered as freewill offerings] before atonement [was achieved].

3 [The following rules apply when a person] designated [an animal as] a sin-offering and it was lost, he designated another one instead of it, then the first one was found, and they both stood [before him]. If he took one of them and attained atonement through its [sacrifice], the other should be consigned to death. If he asks the advice [of the court], he is told to gain atonement through the one set aside first. The second should be left to pasture until it contracts a disqualifying blemish. [Then] it should be sold and the proceeds used for a freewill offering.

If one of them was unblemished and the other had a disqualifying physical blemish, the unblemished one should be sacrificed and the blemished one should be redeemed. If, [after it was redeemed,] the blemished one was slaughtered before the blood of the unblemished one was cast [upon the altar], it is forbidden to benefit from [the blemished one]. If they were both blemished, they should both be sold, a sin-offering should be purchased from the proceeds, and the remainder used for freewill offerings.

4 [The following rules apply when a person] designated [an animal as] a sin-offering and it was lost, he designated another one instead of it and it was [also] lost, and he designated a third. Afterwards, the lost ones were found, and all three stood [before him]. If he received atonement through the first animal [that was set aside], the second should be consigned to death and the third left to pasture [until it contracts a disqualifying blemish]. If he received atonement through the third animal [that was set aside], the second should be consigned to death and the first left to pasture. If he received atonement through the second animal [that was set aside], the first and the third should be consigned to death.

5 When a person sets aside two [animals for] a sin-offering for surety, he may gain atonement through which one he desires, the second should be left to pasture until it contracts a disqualifying blemish. [Then it should be sold and] the proceeds used for a freewill offering.

6 When a person sets aside [an animal that] is pregnant as a sin-offering and it gives birth, it and its offspring are considered as two animals set aside for a sin-offering and as surety for it.

7 If one set aside a sin-offering and then its year passed, it should be left to pasture until it contracts a disqualifying blemish. [Then] it should be sold and the proceeds used to bring another animal in its place. Similarly, if [an animal] was set aside as a sin-offering and it contracted a disqualifying blemish, [it should be sold and] the proceeds used to bring another animal in its place.

8 Whenever [an animal designated as] a sin-offering was lost and then discovered before [the owner] achieved atonement, - even though when it was discovered it was blemished or its year had passed - it is not consigned to death. Instead, it should be left to pasture until it contracts a disqualifying blemish. [Then it should be sold and] the proceeds used for a freewill offering.

If it was found after [the owner] achieved atonement, even if it was discovered when it was blemished or its year had passed, since it was lost at the time atonement was achieved, it is consigned to death.

9 If [the animal] was stolen or robbed at the time atonement was achieved and afterwards returned, it is not consigned to death. Instead, it is allowed to pasture [until it becomes blemished], for all we heard from Moses our teacher was that [an animal] that was lost [should be consigned to death].

If it first was lost at night, even though it remained lost at the time atonement was achieved, it is not consigned to death. Instead, it is allowed to pasture [until it becomes blemished].

10 If [the owner] considered [an animal designated as a sin-offering] lost, but the shepherd did not or the shepherd considered it lost, but the owner did not, it is not consigned to death [if it is discovered after another animal was offered in place of it]. Instead, it is allowed to pasture [until it becomes blemished].

11 All of those [animals mentioned in the above laws] that are allowed to pasture, may pasture until they contract a blemish. [Then they are sold and] the proceeds used to purchase a freewill offering.

12 If [the animal] was considered lost by both [the owner] and the shepherd, but another person - even in a far corner of the world - knows of its existence, there is an unresolved doubt whether it should be consigned to death. Therefore it should be consigned to death.

13 [If the animal designated as a sin-offering] was hiding behind a door or behind a stairwell, it is considered as lost, for no one will see it at the time atonement is gained. If it is in a field or in a swamp, there is a doubt whether it is lost, for perhaps there is a person who saw it at the time atonement is achieved. Therefore it is consigned to death because of the doubt.

14 When a person sends [an animal designated as] a sin-offering from a distant country, we sacrifice it under the assumption that he is alive.

When does the above apply? With regard to a sin-offering of a fowl or a sin-offering of an animal for a woman who does not perform semichah, as we explained. [Different rules apply with regard to an animal set aside as] an unconditional guilt-offering. [If] its owner died or received atonement, it should be left to pasture until it contracts a disqualifying blemish. [Then it should be sold and] the proceeds used for a freewill offering. Whenever it is deemed that [an animal designated as] a sin-offering should be consigned to death, [one designated as] a guilt-offering should be left to pasture until it contracts a disqualifying blemish. [Then it should be sold and] the proceeds used for a freewill offering.

15 [If] any [animal set aside as] a guilt-offering that is consigned to pasture [until it contracts a disqualifying blemish] is sacrificed as a burnt offering itself, it is acceptable. Why is it not the initial preference to offer it as a burnt-offering? [This is] a decree, [using such an animal for a burnt-offering] after [its owner] gained atonement [is forbidden] lest [such an animal be used for a burnt-offering] before [the owner] gained atonement.

16 When a person sets aside a female [animal] for a guilt-offering in which he [is obligated], it should be left to pasture until it contracts a disqualifying blemish. [Then] it should be sold and the proceeds used for a guilt-offering. If his guilt-offering was offered, the proceeds from the sale should be used to purchase a freewill offering. This also applies to her offspring.

17 When a person sets aside a female [animal] for a burnt-offering in which he [is obligated] and she gives birth to a male, [the offspring] should be left to pasture until it contracts a disqualifying blemish. [Then] it should be sold and the proceeds used for a burnt-offering.

18 If, however, an ordinary person set aside a male [animal] for a sin-offering, a king set aside a she-goat as a sin-offering, or an anointed priest set aside a cow, these are not consecrated [at all], their physical person is not consecrated, nor is their worth consecrated. Therefore they may be sold [even] when unblemished.

19 [The following laws apply when a person] brought a conditional guilt-offering and then discovered that he did not sin or that he definitely sinned. [Should he become aware of this] before the animal was slaughtered, it should be left to pasture until it contracts a disqualifying blemish. [Then it should be sold and] the proceeds used for a freewill offering. [The rationale is that] a person's heart feels contrite because of his sins. Since he designated [the animal as a sacrifice] because of a doubt, [we assume that] he resolved to consecrate it [regardless]. If he designated [an animal as a conditional guilt-offering] even because of witnesses and the witnesses were disqualified through hazamah, [the above ruling applies and] the proceeds used for a freewill offering.

If this was discovered after [the animal] was slaughtered, the blood should be poured out and the meat burnt as prescribed with regard to other sacrifices that were disqualified. If this was discovered after the blood was cast [on the altar], the meat should be eaten by the priests like that of other guilt-offerings.

20 [This law] does not apply with regard to an unconditional guilt-offering. [In that instance,] if the person became aware that he did not sin before [the animal designated as a sacrifice was slaughtered], it should be allowed to go out and pasture among the flock like an ordinary animal. There is no holiness associated with it at all. If [he became aware of his innocence] after [the animal] was slaughtered, it should be buried. If [he became aware] after the blood was cast [on the altar], the meat should be taken to the place where [invalid sacrifices] are burnt like other sacrifices that were disqualified.

21 When a person became liable to offer a conditional guilt-offering and he set aside two [animals] as surety, he should gain atonement through one of them and the second should be left to pasture until it contracts a disqualifying blemish. [Then] it should be sold and the proceeds used for a freewill offering. Needless to say, this law applies with regard to an unconditional guilt-offering.

22 All of the guilt-offerings mentioned in the Torah should be brought when they are in their second year of life and their price should be [two] silver shekalim with the exception of the guilt-offering brought by a person afflicted by tzara'at and the guilt offering brought by a nazirite which should be brought in their first year of life and their cost has no limit.
A conditional guilt-offering comes from both young lambs and elder ones. According to the Oral Tradition, we learned that it be brought only from [two] silver shekalim.

23 If the price of rams decrease and a ram cannot be found for two silver selaim, the person has no means of correcting [his circumstance]. He must wait until their price inflates and then bring one for two selaim, for the Torah was precise about their price and gave it an explicit limit.

24 If a person set aside an animal as a guilt offering which was worth [only] one sela at the time it was set aside, but its worth appreciated to two at the time of atonement, it is acceptable. For the fact that it was initially unacceptable does not make it permanently disqualified, since it was not fit to be sacrificed until it was worth two [selaim]. Even though it increased in value on its own, a person can gain atonement through the increase in value of consecrated property.

If it was worth two selaim at the time it was set aside, but its worth depreciated to one at the time of atonement, it is unacceptable. If its value later appreciated to two, it becomes acceptable again. For living animals are never permanently disqualified, as we explained. To what can the matter be likened? To a physical blemish that was contracted, but which disappeared.

25 [The following rule applies when a person] set aside two selaim for a guilt-offering and purchased two rams for a guilt-offering with them. If one of them was worth two selaim, he should offer it as his guilt-offering and the other should be left to pasture until it contracts a blemish [and then sold]. The proceeds should be used for a freewill offering.

26 If a person was obligated to bring a guilt-offering that was a year old, and instead, brought one that was two years old, brought one that was a year old when he was obligated to bring one that was two years old, or brought one when the time for him to bring it had not come, it is unacceptable. It should be [left] until the next day and then it should be taken to the place where sacrifices are burnt.

This is the general principle: Any factor that disqualifies a sin-offering disqualifies a guilt-offering except a guilt-offering that was slaughtered with the intent that it was another sacrifice, which is acceptable, as will be explained.

27 When a burnt-offering that must be brought by a nazirite, a woman who gives birth, or a person who is being purified after tza'arat, was slaughtered when it was more than twelve months old or the time for the owner to bring it had not come, it is acceptable and its accompanying offerings are required to be brought.

This is the general principle: Any factor that does not disqualify a burnt offering brought willingly does not disqualify a burnt-offering that is obligatory regardless of whether the one bringing it is considered to have fulfilled his obligation or not.

Chapter 5

1 When a person sets aside money for a sin-offering and dies, the money should be [thrown] to the Mediterranean Sea. Similarly, when a person sets aside money for a sin-offering, the money is lost, another sin-offering is offered in its place, and then the [initial] money is found after atonement was achieved, [the money should be thrown] to the Mediterranean Sea.

2 When a person sets aside money for a sin-offering, the money is lost, and he set aside other money in its stead, but did not have the opportunity to purchase a sin-offering with the later funds before the first funds were found, he should purchase a sin-offering with the combined funds. The remainder should be used for freewill offerings.

3 When a person sets aside money for a sin-offering, the money is lost, and he set aside [an animal] as a sin-offering in its stead, but before he sacrificed it, the [original] funds were found and the [animal was discovered] to have a disqualifying physical blemish, it should be sold and he should purchase a sin-offering with the combined funds. The remainder should be used for freewill offerings.

4 When a person set aside [an animal] as a sin-offering, it was lost, he set aside money in its stead, but was not able to purchase [an animal] as a sin-offering with it before the [first] animal was found, but it [was discovered] to have a disqualifying physical blemish, it should be sold and he should purchase a sin-offering with the combined funds. The remainder should be used for freewill offerings.

5 If he set aside two piles of money for surety [that he will be able to purchase a sin-offering], he should gain atonement with one of them and the other should be used for freewill offerings.

6 If he set aside [an animal for] a sin-offering or the money for a sin-offering, because he thought that he was obligated [to bring one] and then he discovered that he was not so obligated, [the animal or the money] is of ordinary status; it is not consecrated.

If he set aside two [animals for] sin-offerings or the money for two [animals] because he thought he was obligated to bring both and then it was discovered that he was only liable to bring one, he should bring one as a sacrifice and the other should be used for freewill offerings.

7 When he picks up coins in his hand or was in the process of collecting them and said: "I will bring my sin-offering from these," the remainder are not consecrated. Similarly, it appears to me that an inference can be drawn [from this ruling] to [similar situations involving] other sacrifices and the remainder are not considered as consecrated.

8 When a person sets aside money for a meal-offering of a sinner and brings a meal-offering from those funds, or he set aside a meal-offering itself, and [in either of the above instances, money] was left over, the remainder should be used to bring a freewill meal-offering. Any extra [meal left after] the tenth of the ephah that is brought by the High Priest as his chavitin offering should be left to rot. Similarly, the remainder [of meal left after preparing] the bread for a thanksgiving offering or the bread for a nazirite's offering should be left to rot.

The remainder of money for wine libations should be used for freewill offerings. We have already explained in [Hilchot] Shekalim, that any money remaining from the half-shekalim are considered as ordinary funds.

9 [Any money] left over [from that set aside to purchase] pairs of doves for zavim, zavot or for women after childbirth, sin-offerings, or guilt-offerings should be used for freewill offerings. They should be offered as burnt-offerings, as explained.

[Any money] left over [from that set aside to purchase] burnt-offerings should be used for burnt-offerings, [to purchase] peace-offerings, for peace-offerings, [to purchase] meal-offerings, for meal-offerings, [to purchase] a Paschal sacrifice, for peace-offerings, [to purchase] nazirite-offerings, for nazirite-offerings, [to purchase] the offerings for a particular nazirite, for [freewill] offerings to be brought by that nazirite.

When does the ruling that [money] left over [from that set aside to purchase] a sin-offering should be used for freewill offerings apply? With regard to a fixed sin-offering. When, however, one was obligated to bring an adjustable guilt offering and set aside money for a sin-offering of an animal and became poor, he should bring a fowl instead. He may transfer the holiness from those funds to the fowl and benefit from them. Similarly, if he set aside money for a fowl and became poor, he should bring a [meal-offering] of a tenth of an ephah instead. He may transfer the holiness from those funds to [the meal] and benefit from them.

10 If a person set aside an animal [for an adjustable guilt-offering], it contracted a disqualifying physical blemish, [and he became poor], it may be sold and the proceeds used to purchase a fowl. If, however, he set aside a fowl [for such an offering], it was disqualified, [and he became poor], he may not sell it and bring a tenth of an ephah from the proceeds of the sale, for a fowl [that was consecrated] may not be redeemed, as stated in [Hilchot] Issurei HaMizbeiach.

11 [The following rules apply to] all those obligated by the Torah to bring pairs of doves who set aside money for those doves. If they desired to use all the money for sin-offerings of fowl alone, they may. If they desire to use it for burnt-offerings of fowl, they may. Even if they had [originally] said: "This is the money for my sin-offering and this is the money for my burnt-offering," he may mix the money together and buy the two offerings together, or use the money solely for sin-offerings, or solely for burnt-offerings. [The rationale is that the identity of] pairs of doves is designated only when purchased by the owners or when offered by a priest.

12 Therefore if one set aside money for a pair of doves without making a determination and died, all of the money that was undetermined should be used for freewill offerings. [The rationale is that] it is all fit to used for a burnt-offering.

13 [The following laws apply when someone] was obligated to bring a sin-offering and he said: "I pledge a burnt-offering," and set aside money saying: "This is for my obligation." If he desires, he may use them to bring an animal as a sin-offering or he may use them to bring an animal as a burnt-offering. If he died and left the money, it should be taken to the Mediterranean Sea.

Chapter 6

1 If one of [the animals designated as] a sin-offering that was consigned to death or an ox that was condemned to be stoned becomes intermingled with any other sacrificial animals - even in a ratio of one to a myriad - they should all be consigned to death. [The rationale is that] living animals are important and are never considered insignificant [in a mixture].

If [the animals] were sacrificed, [the sacrifices] are acceptable, because living animals are never permanently disqualified.

2 If [sacrificial animals] became intermingled with [animals that are] forbidden to be offered on the altar, they should all be allowed to pasture until they contract disqualifying physical blemishes. They should then be sold and the proceeds from the sale of the choicest animal among them should be used to bring sacrifices from the type in which [the forbidden animal] became intermingled.

3 If sacrificial animals become intermingled with unblemished ordinary animals, the ordinary animals in the mixture should be sold as sacrifices of that type, and they should all be sacrificed.

What is implied? If four animals that were designated as peace-offerings became intermingled with four unblemished ordinary animals, the four ordinary animals should be sold to someone who is obligated to bring peace-offerings and they should all be offered as peace-offerings. Similar laws apply with regard to burnt-offerings and guilt-offerings.

The proceeds of the sale are considered as ordinary money, for they are the proceeds of the sale of ordinary animals.

4 When an ox that was consecrated became intermingled with ordinary animals, the largest among them is considered as the consecrated one and the others should be sold for sacrifices of that type. If sacrifices of the most sacred order became intermingled with animals consecrated for the same purpose, each one should be offered for the sake of its owner, even though none [of the owners] recognize their sacrificial animal.

When does the above apply? With regard to sacrifices to be brought by women in which there is no obligation for semichah. With regard to sacrifices to be brought by men, since each one of them is obligated to perform semichah on his sacrifice, these animals should not be offered until each one gives his portion [in the sacrificial animal] to his colleague or until they all become blemished and are sold. [In that instance,] each one should then bring a sacrificial animal equal in value to the more select of that type.

5 If [sacrificial animals of] two [different] types become intermingled, e.g., a peace-offering with a burnt-offering, they should not be sacrificed, even as the more sacred. [The rationale is that] we should not cause sacrificial animals to become disqualified.

6 Just as we may not reduce the time [in which sacrifices] may be eaten, so too, we may not limit the people eligible to partake of them, nor the place where they can be eaten. Instead, what should be done? All [of the sacrificial animals of mixed identity] should be allowed to pasture until they contract a disqualifying physical blemish. Then each one should be sold individually. He should purchase a sacrifice for each type of the value of the most choice animal. He must suffer the loss from his own resources.

7 Even though the person already sacrificed the burnt-offering or the peace-offering which he was obligated to bring, he should nevertheless bring a different burnt-offering and peace-offering from the proceeds [of the sale] of the mixture.

8 When a sin-offering becomes intermingled with a peace-offering, [the two] should be allowed to pasture until they contracted disqualifying physical blemishes and were redeemed. He should bring a peace-offering of the value of the most choice animal and a sin-offering of the value of the most choice animal. If he took the initiative and offered another [animal as a] sin-offering for the sin-offering that was set aside for him first, they should all be consigned to death.

9 Similarly, if money for a sin-offering becomes mixed together with money for a guilt-offering, one should take two animals and transfer the holiness of the money for the sin-offering wherever it is on [the animal set aside as] a sin-offering and transfer the holiness of the money for the guilt-offering on [the animal set aside as] a guilt-offering.
If he already offered his sin-offering, all of the money should be taken and thrown to the Mediterranean Sea. If he had already offered his guilt-offering, all of the money should be used for freewill offerings.

10 When a thanksgiving-offering becomes mixed with an animal exchanged for it, they should both be offered and the bread [that accompanies the thanksgiving-offering] should be waved with [both of] them.

If a thanksgiving-offering becomes mixed with other sacrificial animals, even if the person offered [another animal as] his thanksgiving-offering, all [the sacrificial animals] should be allowed to pasture until they contract a blemish. He should then bring another thanks-offering of the value of the most choice animal and the other offering of the value of the most choice animal.

11 If [a thanksgiving-offering] becomes mixed with a nazirite's ram, they should both be sacrificed and the bread waved with them.

12 When a firstborn offering becomes intermingled with a Paschal sacrifice, they should both be allowed to pasture until they contract a disqualifying physical blemish, and then eaten as a [blemished] firstborn offering.
Why aren't they sacrificed? Because a Paschal sacrifice may be eaten by any person until midnight and the firstborn offering is eaten for two days and is eaten only by priests. [We follow the principles that] we do not cause sacrifices to be disqualified and we do not reduce the amount of people eligible to partake of them.

13 Similarly, when a tithe offering becomes intermingled with a Paschal sacrifice, when they contract a disqualifying physical blemish, they should be eaten according to the prescriptions regarding a tithe offering. When a firstborn and a tithe offering become intermingled, they may be eaten [as ordinary meat] after contracting a disqualifying physical blemish.

14 Similarly, when other sacrificial animals become intermingled with a firstborn or a tithe offering, they should be allowed to pasture until they contract a disqualifying physical blemish. They may be eaten according to the restrictions applying to a firstborn offering or a tithe offering that became blemished.

15 When a guilt-offering became intermingled with a peace-offering, even though only the fats and the organs are offered and the meat is eaten, they should not be offered. Instead, they should be allowed to pasture until they contract a disqualifying blemish and he should bring a guilt-offering of the value of the more choice one and a peace-offering of the value of the more choice one. [The owner should] suffer the loss of the difference [between the value of these animals and the animals lost] from his own resources. If he took the initiative and offered his guilt-offering first, they should both [be allowed to pasture until they become blemished and sold, with the proceeds] used for freewill offerings.

16 It is possible for sacrificial animals of any type to become intermingled with other sacrificial animals of the same species with the exception of [animals consecrated] as sin-offerings and [those consecrated as] guilt-offerings, because guilt offerings may be brought only from male sheep and sin-offerings are brought from female sheep.

17 If any of the sacrificial animals [of two types] that were intermingled while alive were sacrificed, they are acceptable, because living animals are never permanently disqualified.

18 [The following rules apply with regard to] any animal found between Jerusalem and Migdal Eder or that radius to any other direction. If it is a female [that can be estimated to be] a year old, it is placed in a closed room to die, lest it be a sin-offering. If it [appears to be] two years old, it should be brought as a peace-offering and bread should be brought with it, lest it be a thanksgiving-offering.

If a male that [appears to be] two years old is found, there is no way of correcting the situation, for it is possible that it is a guilt-offering whose owner has not yet received atonement.

If one found a male animal that is a year old, he should allow it to pasture until it becomes blemished, bring two animals in its stead and make a stipulation, stating: "If the [blemished animal] was a burnt-offering, this is designated as a burnt-offering in place of it. If it was a peace-offering, this is a peace-offering in place of it." He then offers the first as a burnt-offering. Its accompanying offerings should be brought from communal funds. The other should be brought as a peace-offering together with bread, lest it be a thanksgiving-offering.

What should be done with the animal that was found? It should be eaten after it contracts a blemish. For even if it was a firstborn offering or a tithe offering, it could be eaten after it was blemished. If it was a Paschal sacrifice whose time had passed, it is considered as a peace-offering. And during the time the Paschal sacrifice [must be offered], everyone is careful regarding it. If one might ask: Maybe it is a guilt-offering of a nazirite or a person purified from tzara'at? These are not frequently found. Therefore [the Sages] showed no concern about them.

19 If sacrifices became intermingled with other sacrifices after the animals were slaughtered, they should be eaten according to the laws pertaining to the more severe category. If [such sacrifices] became intermingled with sacrificial animals that were disqualified or ordinary animals that were slaughtered in the Temple Courtyard, they should [be left] until their form is no longer recognizable and then be taken to the place where sacrifices are burnt.

20 When the limbs of a sin-offering become mixed with the limbs of a burnt-offering, the entire mixture should [be left] until their form is no longer recognizable. [Afterwards,] they should be burnt in the Temple Courtyard in the place where sacrificial animals that were disqualified are burnt.

21 When a limb from a blemished [sacrificial] animal becomes mixed with the limbs of sacrificial animals - even one in a thousand - they should all be taken to the place where sacrifices are burnt. Even if all the limbs [of the sacrifices] were offered except for one, it should be burnt in the Temple Courtyard in the place where sacrificial animals that were disqualified are burnt.

22 When pieces [of meat] from sacrifices of the most sacred order become mixed with sacrifices of a lesser degree of holiness or those which are eaten for one day become mixed with those eaten for two days, they should be eaten according to the prescriptions of the more severe of the two.

23 When a piece [of meat] from a sin-offering that has become impure becomes intermingled with 100 pieces of meat from a pure sin-offering or a slice of the showbread that has become impure becomes intermingled with 100 slices of the showbread that are pure, [the mixture] may be considered acceptable, as we explained in [Hilchot] Terumot.

24 If, however, a piece [of meat] from a sin-offering became mixed with 100 pieces of ordinary meat or a piece of the showbread which is pure becomes mixed with 100 pieces of ordinary bread, [the mixture] should not be considered as acceptable. Instead, the entire mixture should be eaten by priests, as is true with regard to any mixture of consecrated food and ordinary food.

Chapter 7

1 Whenever anyone who is unacceptable to perform Temple service performs the rite of melikah, the melikah is unacceptable. [Nevertheless,] even though the dove [killed by such a melikah] is unacceptable, it is not considered as a nevelah of a kosher fowl with regard to the laws of ritual impurity.

Similarly, if one performed melikah at night or slaughtered an ordinary dove in [the Temple Courtyard] or a consecrated dove outside [the Temple Courtyard], they are not nevelot.

2 If one performed melikah on turtle-doves before they reached the appropriate age or on young doves who passed the appropriate age or on a dove whose wing shriveled, whose eye was lost or whose leg was cut off, it is considered as a nevelah in all contexts. This is the general principle: Any disqualifying factor that takes place after [a dove] entered the Temple Courtyard disqualifies it, but does not render it a nevelah. If the disqualifying factor did not take place after it was brought into the Temple Courtyard, [the dove] is a nevelah in all contexts.

3 For this reason, when a person performs melikah and the animal is discovered to be tereifah, he performed melikah with a knife, or performed melikah on an ordinary dove in [the Temple Courtyard] or a consecrated dove outside [the Temple Courtyard], they are considered as a nevelah in all contexts. For melikah permits and purifies only a dove that is acceptable to [be offered on] the altar.

4 In contrast, if melikah was performed on a dove that was sodomized, set aside for pagan sacrifice, worshiped, given to a prostitute as her fee, exchanged for a dog, was a tumtum or an androgynus, it is considered as a nevelah in all contexts. It causes a person's garments to become impure when it [enters his] gut. The rationale is that the holiness [of a sacrifice] does not fall upon them and thus it is not considered as having been disqualified [after entering] the Temple Courtyard.

5 We already explained in [Hilchot] Ma'aseh Hakorbanot, that [the blood from] a sin-offering of fowl is presented on the lower [half of the altar] and [the blood from] a burnt-offering of fowl is presented on the upper [half of the altar]. When [the blood from] a sin-offering of fowl is presented on the upper [half of the altar], it is unacceptable. [This applies] whether the blood was presented in the manner of a sin-offering or in the manner of a burnt-offering, whether it was offered for the sake of a burnt-offering or for the sake of a sin-offering.

6 Similarly, when [the blood from] a burnt-offering of fowl was presented on the lower [half of the altar], even if he performed melikah on one of the signs of ritual slaughter on the lower half and the other sign on the upper half, it is unacceptable. [This applies] whether the melikah was performed in the manner of a burnt-offering or in the manner of a sin-offering, whether it was offered for the sake of a sin-offering or for the sake of a burnt-offering.

7 When melikah was performed on a sin-offering of a fowl on the lower half of the altar in the manner as it should be performed for a burnt-offering for the sake of a sin-offering, as it should be performed for a sin-offering for the sake of a burnt-offering, or as it should be performed for a burnt-offering for the sake of a burnt-offering, it is unacceptable.

8 Similarly, when a burnt-offering of a fowl was presented on the upper [half of the altar] in the manner as it should be performed for a sin-offering for the sake of a burnt-offering or as it should be performed for a sin-offering for the sake of a sin-offering, it is unacceptable. If, however, he performs it as it should be performed for a burnt-offering for the sake of a sin-offering, it is acceptable, but it is not considered as if the owner fulfilled his obligation.

9 All of these fowl that are disqualified because of the place [in the altar] where their blood was presented, because of the difference in the manner in which [melikah] is performed, or the intent for which they are offered, are not considered as a fowl that has become a nevelah with regard to the laws of ritual impurity. Similarly, when a sin-offering or a burnt-offering of fowl becomes piggul, impure, or notar it does not cause impurity in one's gut as does a fowl that has become a nevelah, for all of these became disqualified [after having entered] the Temple Courtyard.

10 When a sin-offering of fowl is brought because of a doubt, it should be offered as required, but not eaten. Instead, it should be burnt like all other sacrificial animals that become disqualified.

When is such a sacrifice brought because of a doubt? When there is an unresolved question whether a woman is a zavah, impure because of childbirth, or the like. There is no concept of an animal being brought as a sin-offering because of a doubt, because if a person is unsure whether or not he committed a sin, he should bring a conditional guilt-offering, as will be explained in Hilchot Shegagot.

11 [The following rules apply when] a sin-offering of fowl is brought because of a doubt and then it is discovered that the woman is definitely obligated to bring [the sacrifice]. If she realized this before melikah was performed on [the dove], it should be offered with certainty and eaten. If she did not discover this until after melikah was performed, the sprinkling and presentation of its blood [on the altar] should be completed. Then it should be burnt, so that it will not be said that a sin-offering of fowl brought because of a doubt is eaten. For at the outset, [this offering] was brought because of a doubt.

12 If, after melikah was performed, she discovered that she was not obligated to bring a sacrifice, it should be buried.

Chapter 8

1 When a sin-offering of a dove becomes intermingled with a burnt-offerings of doves or a burnt-offering of a dove becomes intermingled with sin-offerings of doves, even one in a myriad, they should all be consigned to death.

When does the above apply? When their identity had been explicitly determined when they were purchased by the owner, [saying]: "This is a sin-offering. This is a burnt-offering." Different rules apply, however, if one brought doves to fulfill his obligation, some [for] a sin-offering and some for a burnt-offering, without stating explicitly [what each was, instead, they were brought] without specification and then a [dove designated as] a sin-offering or as a burnt-offering became mixed with these undesignated [doves] brought to fulfill his obligation.

2 What are the appropriate laws? If [a dove designated as] a sin-offering becomes intermingled with this unspecified [group of doves] brought to fulfill one's obligation, only the number of doves to be brought as sin-offerings in the unspecified [group] are acceptable. The number of burnt-offerings in the unspecified [group] and the sin-offering that became intermingled with them are disqualified, for a sin-offering has become intermingled with burnt-offerings.

3 Therefore if the unspecified [group] is [at least] twice as large as the number of sin-offerings [that became intermingled with them], half of the unspecified group is acceptable, and half are disqualified. It appears to me that [the priest offering the sacrifices] should offer all of them on the lower portion of the altar according to the rites appropriate for a sin-offering.

4 Similarly, if a burnt-offering becomes intermingled with this unspecified [group of doves], only the number of doves to be brought as burnt-offerings in the unspecified [group] are acceptable. The number of sin-offerings in the unspecified [group] and the burnt-offering that became intermingled with them are disqualified, for a burnt-offering has become intermingled with sin-offerings.

Whether there are more doves in the unspecified group than the number of burnt-offerings that became intermingled with them, there were more burnt-offerings than doves in the unspecified group, or they were of equal amounts, only the amount of burnt-offerings in the unspecified group are acceptable. Therefore if the unspecified group was twice as large as the number of doves that became intermingled with them, half of the unspecified group is acceptable, and half are disqualified. It appears to me that [the priest offering the sacrifices] should offer all of them on the upper portion of the altar according to the rites appropriate for a burnt-offering.

5 When one unspecified group becomes intermingled with another unspecified group - whether they were all for one purpose, e.g., doves brought by zavim together with doves brought by zavim, or for two purposes, doves brought by zavim together with doves brought by women after childbirth, whether they were both brought by the same person, or they were brought by two separate people, if they were both similar, half are acceptable and half are disqualified. [This applies] whether [the priest] offered all of them on the upper portion of the altar or all on the lower portion of the altar, or half were offered on the upper portion of the altar and half on the lower portion, half are always acceptable and half are always disqualified, because half [of the mixture] are burnt-offerings and half are sin-offerings and a sin-offering is offered on the lower portion of the altar and a burnt-offering is offered on the upper portion.

[To explain:] If he offered them all on the upper portion, half are acceptable and they are burnt-offerings. If he offered them all on the lower portion, half are acceptable and they are sin-offerings. If half were offered on the lower portion of the altar and half on the upper portion, half of the half offered on the upper portion are acceptable [and the other half are disqualified,] because of the mixture. [The acceptable ones] are burnt-offerings. And half of the half of those offered on the lower portion are acceptable and they are sin-offerings.

6 [The following rules apply if] two unspecified groups became intermingled with each other and one was larger than the other, e.g., one had four doves and one had six. If he offered them all on the upper portion of the altar, or all on the lower portion, half are acceptable and half are disqualified for the reason we explained. [Different laws apply] if he offered half on the lower portion of the altar and half on the upper portion. If he did this after he asked, the lesser amount are acceptable. If he did this on his own initiative, the greater amount are acceptable.

7 This is the general principle: Whenever, on his initiative, the priest offered half on the upper portion of the altar and half on the lower portion, and it is impossible that [the doves of] one [owner] will not have been offered on both halves of the altar, the greater amount is acceptable. Since it is known that a portion of [this person's] sacrifices will be [offered] on the upper portion of the altar and a portion on the lower half, all of his sacrifices are acceptable.

8 When two individuals purchase pairs of doves together or give the money for them to the priest [to purchase them], the priest may offer whichever he desires as sin-offerings and whichever he desires as burnt-offerings. For [the identity of the sacrifices] in the pair is determined only when purchased by the owners or when offered by the priest, as we explained.

9 If there were [groups of doves], some [groups of] sin-offerings and others, burnt-offerings, before a priest and he offered both [groups] on the upper portion of the altar or both on the lower portion, half are acceptable and half are not. If he offered half on the upper portion and half on the lower portion without knowing whether it was the sin-offerings or the burnt-offerings that he offered on the lower portion, they are all unacceptable. For we surmise that it was the burnt-offering that were offered on the lower portion and the sin-offerings on the upper portion.

10 If there were three groups of doves before him: one sin-offerings, one burnt-offerings, and one undefined, half burnt-offerings and half sin-offerings, without the purpose [for any given dove] being defined, if he offered all of them on the upper portion or on the lower portion, half are acceptable and half are not.

11 If he offered half on the upper portion and half on the lower portion, only the group that was undefined that was offered half on the upper portion and half on the lower portion is acceptable. It is divided between the owners and [the portion allotted to] each one is considered as valid for them, for the priest does not know which groups were specified [as being sin-offerings] and which one was left undefined. The two specified groups are not acceptable, because it is not known which one was offered on the upper portion of the altar and which one, on the lower portion and it is possible that the burnt-offerings were offered on the lower portion and the sin-offerings on the upper portion.

1 When a dove from an unspecified group flies to free spaces or among doves that are consigned to death, or one of the doves dies, a second one should be taken for its pair.

2 If it flies among [doves] that are fit to be offered, it is disqualified and it disqualifies one [of the group], for when a dove flies from an unspecified group to among those which will be offered, it becomes disqualified and it disqualifies another one corresponding to it.
What is implied? A dove from a group of unspecified doves flies to an unspecified group of ten doves. If [the priest] offered five on the lower portion [of the altar] and six on the upper portion, five of the burnt-offerings from the six offered on the upper portion are acceptable and four of the sin-offerings from the five offered on the lower portion are acceptable. [The rationale is that] one says: "Perhaps the dove that flew is one of the five offered on the lower portion."

Similarly, if he offered six on the lower portion and five on the upper portion, five sin-offerings and four burnt-offerings are acceptable. For one might say: "Perhaps the dove [that flew] is one of the five offered on the upper portion." Thus from the ten [from the second group], nine are acceptable and [the dove] disqualified one.

3 [The following rules apply when there is one] unspecified group of four doves and another unspecified group of four doves. If one from the first group flew to the second group, it disqualified one of the second group. If, after it became intermingled among them, one of the second group flew to the first group, it disqualifies one of the first group. Thus there are only two doves in the first group that are acceptable.

4 If, again, one of the first group flew back to the second group, even if [they continue flying back and forth] the entire day, they do not add to the number disqualified, for even if they become entirely intermingled with each other, half are acceptable and half are disqualified, as we explained.

5 [The following rules apply when there is one] unspecified group of two doves, a second group of four doves, a third of six, a fourth of eight, a fifth of ten, a sixth of twelve, and a seventh of fourteen. If one of the first group flew to the second, one of the second flew to the third, one of the third to the fourth, one of the fourth to the fifth, one of the fifth to the sixth, and one of the sixth to the seventh - and then, one flew back from group to group until one returned to the first group from which the original one had flown, one dove is disqualified in the first movement from group to group and one is disqualified in the return. Thus the first and second groups do not have any [acceptable doves]; the third group has two; the fourth, four; the fifth, six; the sixth, eight, and the seventh, twelve.

If one of the doves flew from [group] to [group] a second time and then one flew back from the last [group], going from group to group until it reaches the first, one dove is disqualified in the movement from group to group and one is disqualified in the return. The third and the fourth groups do not have any [acceptable doves]; the fifth group has two; the sixth, four, and the seventh, ten.

If one of the doves flew from [group] to [group] a third time and then one flew a fourth time, going from group to group, one dove is disqualified in the movement from group to group and one is disqualified in the return. Thus the fifth and the sixth are disqualified entirely and the seventh has eight acceptable doves remaining, i.e., when the fourteen doves are offered [on the altar], seven on the upper portion and seven on the lower portion, eight will be acceptable and six will be disqualified because of the intermingling of the doves that flew back and forth.

6 [The following laws apply when there was] a group of doves that was unspecified and another group [in which the doves for the sin-offering and the burnt-offering] had already been specified. If one of the doves from the unspecified group flew to the group that had been specified, [the owner of the unspecified group] should take a partner for the remaining dove.

If [the above group became intermingled and then one of the doves] returned [to the unspecified group] or [at the outset,] one of the doves from the specified group flew to the unspecified group and it was not known whether it was the one designated as a burnt-offering or the one designated as the sin-offering, all of the doves in the unspecified group should be consigned to death. [The rationale is that] if it was the one designated as a burnt-offering that became intermingled, all of the sin-offerings [in that group] are disqualified. And if it was the one designated as a sin-offering that became intermingled, all of the burnt-offerings [in that group] are disqualified. Therefore, they should all be consigned to death.

7 [The following laws apply when there were] a group of doves that were designated as sin-offerings on one side, others designated as burnt-offerings on the other side, and an unspecified group in the middle. If one of the unspecified group flew to the group on one side and another, to the other group, nothing is lost. Instead, the owner should say: "The one which flew to the sin-offerings is a sin-offering. The one which flew to the burnt-offerings is a burnt-offering."

If, after they became intermingled, one from each of the sides returned to the center, the two in the center should be consigned to death, for they are a burnt-offering and a sin-offering mixed together and those on the sides should be offered - these as sin-offerings and these as burnt-offerings - as was their original state.

If those [which returned to] the center flew to the sides, they must all be consigned to death for perhaps the burnt-offering became intermingled with the sin-offerings and the sin-offering became intermingled with the burnt-offerings.

Chapter 10

1 When a woman says: "I pledge a pair of doves when I give birth to a male," when she gives birth to a male she must bring four doves: two because of her vow, they are burnt offerings, as we explained, and two which she is obligated to bring because of the birth, one, a burnt-offering and the other, a sin-offering. Therefore the priest must offer three doves on the upper portion of the altar and one dove on the lower portion.

If he erred and offered two on the upper portion and two on the lower portion, and he did not consult [with the woman], she must bring another dove and offer it on the upper portion of the altar.

When does the above apply? When she brought all four doves from one type; either they were all turtle doves or young doves. If, however, she brought two turtle doves and two young doves and two were offered on the upper portion [of the altar] and two on the lower portion, she must bring one more turtle dove and one more young dove on the upper portion to fulfill her obligation. For if at the outset, two turtle doves were offered on the lower portion, another turtle dove must be brought on the upper portion to complete her obligation. [Or] if two young doves were offered on the lower portion, another young dove must be brought on the upper portion to complete her obligation. For a person should not bring a pair to fulfill his obligation that comprises one turtle dove and one young dove. Instead, either they should both be turtle doves or both be young doves.

2 If she made her vow explicit, telling the priest: "These are for my vow and these are for my obligation," and the priest offered two on the upper portion and two on the lower portion without knowing which ones he offered on the upper portion and which ones he offered on the lower portion, she must bring three doves, two for her vow and one to complete her obligation. The two should be offered on the upper portion of the altar. [The rationale is that] she made her vow explicit and possibly the two brought because of her vow were offered on the lower portion, thus disqualifying them.

When does the above apply? When she brought the four doves from which she explicitly defined two as being for her vow from one type. If, however, [she brought them from] two types, she must bring four other doves: the two from the type she designated explicitly for her vow should be offered for her vow and the other two may be from either type she desires for her obligation. One should be offered on the upper portion [of the altar] and one on the lower portion.

3 [The following laws apply if a woman] defined [which types of doves to be offered to fulfill] her vow, saying: "If I give birth to a male, I pledge two turtle doves," and she gave birth and brought four doves: two for her vow and two for her obligation. The priest offered two on the upper portion [of the altar] and two on the lower portion, but did not know which were offered on the upper portion and which were offered on the lower portion and she also forgot and did not know the type of doves she had pledged for her vow, whether turtle doves or young doves. She should bring two turtle doves and two young doves for her vow. [All] four should be offered on the upper portion of the altar. She should bring another dove to complete her obligation and it should be offered on the lower portion.

When does the above apply? When originally she brought all of the four of one type. If, however, they were of two types, she must bring six other doves: two turtle doves and two young doves for her vow and for her obligation, she should bring either two turtle doves or two young doves and offer one on the upper portion of the altar and one on the lower portion.

Similarly, if she gave them to the priest and forgot what she gave him and the priest went and offered them, but was not aware where he offered all of the doves, whether he offered them all on the upper portion, all on the lower portion, or half above and half below, she should bring two turtle doves and two young doves for her vow and two turtle doves or two young doves for her obligation.

4 If she defined [which type of offering to be offered to fulfill] her obligation and [which types of doves to be offered to fulfill] her vow and forgot what she defined, it is [also] possible that her obligation was a lamb for a burnt-offering and a dove - either a turtle dove or a young dove - as a sin-offering. Therefore she must bring six doves - four for her vow and two for her obligation. And she must bring one sin-offering, either a young dove or a turtle dove, with a lamb. Thus she will have brought seven doves and a lamb.

5 None of these sin-offerings should be eaten, because they are all offered because of a doubt.

Chapter 11

1 Whenever any of the persons who are disqualified from performing Temple service take the handful of meal from a meal-offering, the offering is disqualified. Similarly, if one of these individuals collected the frankincense, the offering is unacceptable, even if he did not take the handful of meal.

2 [In all the following situations, a meal-offering] is disqualified:
a) the handful [of meal] was taken by an acceptable [priest] and given to one who is not acceptable;
b) [the priest] took the handful with his right hand and then transferred it to his left hand and then placed it in a utensil;
c) he took the handful [of meal] from a sacred utensil and placed it in an ordinary utensil.

3 If [while] taking a handful of meal, he lifted up a pebble, a grain of salt, or a particle of frankincense, it is disqualified.

4 If he took the handful when he was outside [the Temple Courtyard] and then entered [the Courtyard], he should take a handful inside the Courtyard and it is acceptable.

5 If the handful became scattered on the floor [of the Temple Courtyard], he should collect it again.

6 [In all the following instances,] a meal-offering [is unacceptable]:
it was not placed in a sacred utensil,
the handful of meal was not placed in a sacred utensil, it was brought to the altar while not in a sacred utensil, or it was mixed with oil outside the Temple Courtyard; [it is acceptable] only if it was mixed with oil in the Courtyard.

7 All of the meal-offerings are acceptable even if oil was poured over them by someone who was unacceptable for Temple service, e.g., a non-priest or the like, or such a person mixed [the oil with the meal], broke [wafers] into pieces, or put salt upon them. If [such a person] approached the altar with them or waved them, a priest should approach the altar with them and/or wave them again. If a priest did not approach the altar with them and/or wave them again, they are [nevertheless] acceptable. [This is derived from Leviticus 2:2:] "And he shall bring it to the sons of Aaron and [one] shall take a handful..." From taking the handful and onward, the mitzvah must be performed by a priest. Pouring and mixing [the oil] may be performed by a non-priest.

8 When even the slightest amount of oil from another meal-offering or oil that was not consecrated falls into a meal-offering, it is disqualified. If [the full measure of] its oil is lacking, it is disqualified. If, [by contrast, the full measure of] its frankincense is lacking, it is acceptable provided there are at least two particles of frankincense upon it. If there is only one particle, it is disqualified, as it is written: "on all its frankincense."

9 If he added to its [measure of] oil and frankincense, [including] up to two lugim for every isaron and [up to] two handfuls of frankincense for every meal offering, it is acceptable. If one uses two lugim or two handfuls or more, it is disqualified.

10 If one placed oil on the meal offering of a sinner or on the handful of meal taken from it, it is disqualified. If one placed frankincense on it, it should be gathered up. If [the frankincense] is ground, [the offering] is unacceptable because of the doubt, because it is impossible to gather [the frankincense].

11 If one placed oil on the remnants [of such a meal-offering] after the handful was removed, he is not liable for lashes, nor does he disqualify the offering, for the handful is acceptable.

12 If he placed even the smallest amount of oil on an olive-sized portion of the meal-offering, he disqualifies it because of the doubt involved. If, however, he placed oil on less than an olive-sized portion, he does not disqualify it. One does not disqualify [a meal-offering] with frankincense unless he places an olive-sized portion [on the offering].

13 Even if he placed frankincense on the smallest portion of the meal-offering, he disqualifies it until he gathers it.

14 If one mixed water with the meal and then took a handful, it is acceptable. [The Torah's requirement that the offering be] "dry" [refers only] to oil.

15 A meal-offering from which a handful was taken twice - or many times - is acceptable, provided an olive-sized portion is offered on the altar's pyre at once. For no less than an olive-sized portion may be offered on the altar.

16 If one offered the handful [of meal on the altar] without salt, it is unacceptable, for the salt is an absolute requirement for a meal-offering, as we explained. When a meal-offering was lacking before the handful was taken, he should bring [more meal] from home and complete the measure. For taking the handful is what defines [the meal as] an offering, not placing it into a sacred vessel.

17 When a person donates a handful of frankincense independently, it is unacceptable if it is lacking at all. Similarly, if the two bowls of frankincense that accompany the [show]bread are lacking even the slightest amount, they are unacceptable. They must contain two handfuls from the beginning until the end.

18 [The following rules apply when a] person set aside two handfuls [of frankincense] for one offering and one was lost. If this occurred before the handful [of meal] was taken, [the association between them and this offering] was not [yet] established. If it occurred afterwards, [the association] has been established and [the offering] is unacceptable, because he increased its frankincense.

Similar [laws apply if one] sets aside four handfuls for the two bowls of the [show]bread and two were lost. If this occurred before the bowls were removed [from the showbread], [the association between them] was not established and they are acceptable. If it occurred after the bowls were removed, [the association] was established and they are disqualified, because of the extra amount.

19 When the handful taken from a meal offering became impure and then it was offered on the altar's pyre, the High Priest's forehead plate causes it to be considered acceptable, as [Exodus 28:38] states: "And Aaron shall bear [the iniquity....]"

If the handful was taken outside the Temple Courtyard and then brought in and offered on the altar's pyre, the forehead plate does not cause it to be considered acceptable. For the forehead plate causes [sacrifices tainted by] impurity to be considered acceptable, but not those which are taken outside the Temple Courtyard.

20 If one took the handful from a meal-offering and then the entire remainder [of the offering] became impure, was burnt, was taken out of the Temple Courtyard, or was lost, the handful should not be offered on the altar's pyre. [After the fact,] if it was offered, it is accepted [Above]. If a small amount of the remnants [of the offering] remained acceptable, the handful should be offered. [Nevertheless,] the remnant that remains is forbidden to be eaten.

21 If there was a divider in the lower portion of a vessel containing an isaron [of flour] for a meal-offering, even though [the flour] is mixed together above, one should not take a handful. If one did, it is unacceptable.

22 If, [by contrast,] the container was separated by a divider above, but [the contents] were mixed together below, one may take a handful from it.

23 If one divided the isaron in a single container and thus the portions were not touching each other, but there was no divider between them, there is an unresolved doubt whether the container causes [the two portions to be considered as] combined or not. Therefore, [at the outset,] one should not take the handful [in such an instance]. If one did take the handful, it should not be offered on the altar's pyre. If it was offered, it is accepted [Above], but the remainder [of the offering] should not be eaten.

24 If one took a handful [of flour from a meal-offering] and placed the handful on the top of the [Golden] Table [elevated to] the height of the arrangement of the showbread, the Table causes it to be sanctified in that it can be disqualified, but it does not sanctify it so that it can be offered. For [the handful of flour] should not be sacrificed until it was sanctified in a sacred vessel fit for the handful [of flour].

25 If he attached the handful to the wall of the vessel and took it or overturned the vessel above his hand and took the handful while the opening of the vessel was turned downward, it should not be offered on the altar's pyre. If it was offered, it is accepted [Above].

26 [The following rules apply when] an isaron was divided and one of its portions were lost, another portion was set aside in its stead, the lost portion was found and the three are all placed in one container, but are not touching each other. If the portion that was lost becomes impure, it is combined with the first portion and they are disqualified. The portion that was set aside [as a replacement] is not combined with them and it should be supplemented [to produce a full isaron].

If the portion set aside [as a replacement] becomes impure, it and the first portion are combined and disqualified. The portion that was [lost and] discovered is not combined with them. If the initial portion becomes impure, both the portion that was lost and the portion set aside because of it are combined with it.

27 Similar concepts apply with regard to taking the handful. If one took the handful from the portion that was [lost and then] discovered, the remainder of it and the first portion may be eaten and the portion that was set aside [afterwards] may not be eaten. If one took the handful from the portion that was set aside [afterwards] the remainder of it and the first portion may be eaten and the portion that was [lost and then] discovered may not be eaten. If one took the handful from the first portion, neither [of the other] two may be eaten. [The rationale is that] they are both extra portions. For together they are an entire isaron and thus resemble an entire isaron from which a handful was not taken and which is hence, forbidden.

[One might ask:] How can the handful [that was taken] be offered, since there is an isaron and a half [in the vessel]? Because taking the handful is dependent on the intent of the priest and when he takes the handful, he has his mind on an isaron alone and the portions [of the isaron] are not touching each other.

28 When a handful [taken from] a meal-offering became mixed with a handful [taken from] another meal-offering, they should both be offered on the altar's pyre together and they are acceptable. Similarly, it is acceptable if a handful [taken from a meal-offering] became mixed with a meal-offering of a priest, the meal-offering from an accompanying offering, or the chavitin offering of the High Priest. They should be offered on the altar's pyre together. [The rationale is that all of these substances] are offered on [the altar's] fire in their entirety.

29 [The following rules apply when] two meal-offerings from which a handful had not been separated become mixed together. If [the priest] can remove a handful from each one separately, they are acceptable. If not, they are disqualified.

30 When a handful [taken from a meal-offering] becomes mixed together with a meal-offering from which a handful had not been taken, it should not be offered on the altar's pyre. If one did offer the entire mixture, the owner of [the offering] from which the handful was taken is considered to have fulfilled his obligation and the owner of the one from which the handful was not taken is not considered to have fulfilled his obligation.

31 If the handful [taken from a meal-offering] becomes mixed together with the remaining portions of the offering or the remaining portions become mixed together with the remaining portions of another meal-offering, it should not be offered. If it was offered, the owner is considered to have fulfilled his obligation.

Chapter 12

1 If one adds to or subtracts from the measure for the two loaves [offered on Shavuot], the showbread, and the omer that is waved, they are disqualified.

2 With regard to the loaves for the thanksgiving-offering and the cakes of a nazirite that lacked [the required measure], before the blood from the sacrifice was cast on the altar, they are unacceptable. If the blood was already cast on the altar, they are acceptable.

3 Similarly, with regard to the two loaves, if they lacked [the required measure], before the blood from the sacrifice was cast on the altar, they are unacceptable. If the blood was already cast on the altar, they are acceptable.

4 And with regard to the showbread, if they lacked [the required measure], before the the bowls of frankincense were placed on the altar's pyre, it is unacceptable. If the bowls of frankincense were already placed on the altar's pyre, it is acceptable.

5 With regard to the accompanying offerings that lacked [the required measure]: whether the sacrifice was offered or not, they are acceptable, but other accompanying offerings must be brought to complete [the required measure].

6 [The following rules apply when] accompanying offerings were sanctified in a sacred vessel and then the sacrifice was disqualified. If it was disqualified through ritual slaughter, the accompanying offerings have not been sanctified so that they must be offered. If it was disqualified from the reception of the blood and onward, the accompanying offerings have become sanctified, because what sanctifies the accompanying offerings so that they should be offered is solely the slaughter of the sacrifice [in an acceptable manner].

What should be done with [these accompanying offerings]? If there was another sacrifice that had already been slaughtered at that time, they should be offered together with it. If there was not another sacrifice that had already been slaughtered at that time, they are considered as if they were disqualified because they were left overnight and they should be destroyed by fire.

When does the above apply? With regard to communal sacrifices, because the heart of the court makes stipulations concerning them. [Different rules apply with regard to] individual sacrifices. Such [accompanying offerings] should not be offered together with another sacrifice even if it was sacrificed at that time. Instead, they should be left until they become disqualified because they remained overnight and then they should be destroyed by fire.

7 Whenever a sacrifice was offered for a purpose other than that for which it was consecrated, the accompanying offerings should be offered with it.

8 [The following laws apply with regard to] the offspring of a thanksgiving-offering, an animal onto which the holiness of a thanksgiving-offering was transferred, and [a situation in which] one separated his thanksgiving-offering, it was lost, and he separated another one instead of it. If [any of these animals] were to be offered after the owner's obligation was not satisfied with the original thanksgiving-offering, bread need not be brought with it. If the owner's obligation was satisfied with the original offering and it and the one separated in place of it, it and its offspring, or it and the animal onto which its holiness was transferred are both present before us, bread is required to be brought with both of them.

When does the above apply? When one vowed to bring a thanksgiving-offering. When, however, one designated an animal as a thanksgiving-offering, an animal set aside instead of it or one onto which its holiness was transferred require that bread [be offered with them]. Its offspring does not require bread. [This applies] whether or not the owner's obligation was already satisfied with the original offering.

9 [The following laws apply if one] set aside an animal as a thanksgiving-offering and it was lost, he set aside a second one in its stead and it was also lost, he then set aside a third animal in its place and then the first two were found. Thus the three animals are standing before us. If he fulfills his obligation with the first one, the second one does not require that bread be brought with it. The third one, however, requires bread.

If he fulfills his obligation with the third one, the second one does not require that bread be brought with it. The first one, however, requires bread. If he fulfills his obligation with the middle one, both the others do not require bread.

10 [The following laws apply when one] sets aside money for a thanksgiving-offering and it was lost, other money was set aside in its place, but [the owner] did not have the opportunity to buy a thanksgiving-offering until the first money was found. He should bring a thanksgiving-offering and its bread from a combination of the two. From the remainder, he should bring a thanksgiving-offering, but it does not require bread. It does, however, require accompanying offerings.

Similarly, when one sets aside [an animal for] a thanksgiving-offering and it was lost, money was set aside in its place, and afterwards [the original animal] was found, he should bring a thanksgiving-offering without bread with that money. Similarly, if one sets aside money for a thanksgiving-offering and it was lost, a thanksgiving-offering was set aside in its place, and then the money was found, the money should be used to purchase a thanksgiving-offering and its bread. The second thanksgiving-offering should be offered without bread.

11 [The following laws apply if a person] says: "This is a thanksgiving-offering and this is its bread." If the bread is lost, he should bring other bread, If the thanksgiving-offering is lost, he should not bring another thanksgiving-offering. [The rationale is that] the bread is brought because of the thanksgiving-offering, but the thanksgiving-offering is not brought because of the bread.

12 When a person set aside money for his thanksgiving-offering and some remained, he should use it to bring bread. If he set aside money to bring bread and some remained, he should not use it to bring a thanksgiving-offering.

13 [The following rules apply when] one says: "This is a thanksgiving-offering," it becomes intermingled with an animal upon which its holiness was transferred, one died, but he does not know which is which. There is no way to correct the situation of the one which remains. Were one to bring bread with it, [it is possible that he will have erred,] for perhaps this is the animal upon which the holiness was transferred. [But] were he to bring it without bread, it is possible that it is the thanksgiving-offering. Therefore this animal should not be sacrificed at all. Instead, it should be allowed to pasture until it contracts a disqualifying blemish.

14 When one of the loaves of the bread brought with a thanksgiving-offering was broken in pieces, they are all disqualified. If a loaf was taken outside [the Temple Courtyard] or it became impure, the remainder of the breads are acceptable.

If the bread was broken in two, contracted impurity, or was taken outside [the Temple Courtyard] before the thanksgiving-offering was slaughtered, he should bring another bread and then slaughter [the sacrificial animal]. If the above occurred after [the animal] was slaughtered, the blood should be cast [upon the altar], the meat [of the sacrifice] should be eaten, but all of the bread is disqualified. The person [bringing the sacrifice] does not fulfill his vow.

If the blood has been cast [upon the altar] and afterwards some of the breads were broken in two, became impure, or were taken outside, [the person bringing the sacrifice] should separate one of the whole loaves for [all the loaves of that type, including] the one which is broken, one of the pure for [all the others, including] the one which is impure, and one which is in [the Temple Courtyard] for [all the others, including] the one which was taken outside.

15 When a thanksgiving-offering was slaughtered in connection with 80 loaves, 40 of the 80 are not consecrated. If [the person bringing the sacrifice] says: "May 40 of these 80 become consecrated," he should take 40 from the 80 and separate one from each [category brought as] an offering. The other 40 should be redeemed and then they are considered as ordinary bread.

16 When a person slaughters a thanksgiving-offering, but its bread was located outside the walls of Beit Pagi, the bread is not consecrated. If, however, the bread was outside the Temple Courtyard, the bread becomes consecrated even though it is not inside the Courtyard.

17 If he slaughtered [an animal designated as a thanksgiving-offering] before the surface of the bread in the oven becomes hard, even if all of [the breads] became hard except for one, the bread is not consecrated.

18 If he slaughtered [the animal designated as a thanksgiving-offering] and its slaughter was disqualified because of an improper intent concerning the time or the place [where the sacrifice will be offered or eaten] the bread is sanctified. If [the animal] is discovered to have a disqualifying physical blemish, it was tereifah, or it was slaughtered with an improper intent, the bread is not consecrated. These laws also apply with regard to the ram brought by a nazirite.

Chapter 13

1 There are three improper intents that disqualify sacrifices. They are: the intent [to offer a sacrifice] for a different purpose, the intent [to offer or partake of the sacrifice] in an [improper] place, and the intent [to offer or partake of the sacrifice] at an [improper] time.

What is meant by the term "the intent [to offer a sacrifice] for a different purpose"? [The animal was designated as] a burnt-offering and [the priest] had the intent that it was a peace-offering, he slaughtered it for the sake of a burnt-offering and a peace-offering, or for the sake of a peace-offering and a burnt-offering, or he did not slaughter the sacrifice for the sake of its owners. These are all examples of "intents [to offer a sacrifice] for a different purpose."

What is meant by the term "the intent [to offer or partake of the sacrifice] in an [improper] place"? [The priest] slaughtered the sacrificial animal for the correct purpose with the intent of casting its blood or offering a portion of it that was fit to be offered on the altar's pyre outside the Temple Courtyard or eating a portion of it that is fit to be eaten outside the place designated for it to be eaten. These are all examples of "intents

[to offer a sacrifice] in an [improper] place." Sacrifices [that were slaughtered] with such an intent are called sacrifices that were slaughtered outside their proper place.

What is meant by the term "the intent [to offer or partake of the sacrifice] at an [improper] time"? [The priest] slaughtered the sacrificial animal for the correct purpose with the intent of casting its blood [on the altar] after sunset which is not the time at which its blood may be cast, with intent of offering a portion of it that was fit to be offered on the altar's pyre] on the next day, after dawn, which is not the time when it may be offered, or to partake of a portion of it that is fit to be eaten after the time when it is fit to be eaten. These are all examples of "intents [to offer a sacrifice] at an [improper] time." Sacrifices [that were slaughtered] with such an intent are called sacrifices that were slaughtered outside their proper time. They are also referred to be the term piggul. This is the meaning of the term piggul mentioned in the Torah.

2 According to the Oral Tradition, we learned that the Torah's statements [Leviticus 7:18]: "If some of the meat of the peace-offering was eaten on the third day," [should not be interpreted literally]. Instead, it is speaking about one who has the intent while offering the sacrifice that it will be eaten on the third day. The same applies with regard to every sacrifice that, while offering it, one had the intent to partake of it after the time that is appropriate to partake of that type of sacrifice.

Similarly, [the sacrifice is disqualified] if one had the intent to offer portions of it that are fit to be offered on the altar's pyre after the time appropriate for them to be offered. According to the Oral Tradition, the following concept was derived: With regard to both consumption by man and consumption by the altar, if one had the intent that [sacrifices] be consumed after the appropriate time, the sacrifice is considered as piggul.

3 When, however, a sacrifice was not disqualified because of an improper intent, but instead, its blood was cast on the altar in the proper manner, but it remained after the time allotted for it to be eaten, the portion that remains is considered notar. It is forbidden to eat it, but the sacrifice was already accepted and atonement was achieved. It is written with regard to the blood [of a sacrifice, Leviticus 17:11]: "And I gave it to you upon the altar to bring atonement." [Implied is that] since the blood reached the altar according to law, the owners achieved atonement and the sacrifice was acceptable. Therefore the concept of piggul applies only to entities that possess services that will enable [them to be consumed] either by men or by the altar, as will be explained.

The same laws apply if one had one of these three disqualifying intents when slaughtering a sacrifice, receiving its blood, taking its blood to the altar, or casting it on the altar.

4 We derive from the above that it is with regard to these four services that a sacrifice can be disqualified because of an [improper] intent: slaughter, receiving the blood, bringing it [to the altar], and casting it on the altar.

5 A fowl [can be disqualified because of an improper intent] in two services: melikah and squeezing out the blood [on the altar].

6 The meal-offerings from which a handful is taken [can be disqualified because of an improper intent] in four services: taking the handful, placing the handful in a sacred utensil, bringing the utensil to the altar, and casting it on the pyre.

7 If, however, one had an improper intent while performing services other than these: e.g., one had such an intent when skinning [sacrificial animal], when cutting it into pieces, when bringing its internal organs and fats to altar, when mixing [the oil and flour of] a meal-offering, when bringing it close to the altar, or the like, that [improper] intent is of no consequence. [This applies] whether it is an intent [to offer a sacrifice] for a different purpose, an intent [to offer or partake of the sacrifice] in an [improper] place, or an intent [to offer or partake of the sacrifice] at an [improper] time.

8 Similarly, if when performing one of these four tasks or all of them, one has an [improper] intent other than these three intents, that undesirable intent does not disqualify [a sacrifice] at all.

What is implied? When slaughtering [a sacrificial animal], receiving [its blood], bringing [the blood to the altar], and casting [on the altar], a person had the intent to:

a) leave the blood of the sacrifice or the organs and fats to be burnt on the altar for the next day or to remove them from the Temple Courtyard,

b) or he had the intent to cast the blood on the [altar's] ramp, where it is not opposite the base

c) or [take] the blood of sacrifices that must be presented on the upper portion of the altar on the lower portion or those to be presented on the lower portion on the upper portion,

d) or those to be presented on the outer altar on the inner altar, or those to be presented on the inner altar on the outer altar, or to bring the blood of a sin-offering into the inner chamber,

e) he had the intent that impure people or others disqualified from partaking of a sacrifice should partake of it,

f) that the sacrifice be offered by impure people or others who are disqualified from performing sacrificial service,

g) to mix the blood of the sacrifice with unacceptable blood;

h) he intended to break the bones of a Paschal sacrifice or to eat from it while it is not thoroughly cooked;

i) or he intended to burn a sin-offering that must be burnt outside its proper time or outside its proper place;

With regard to any of the above - or similar - intents, the sacrifice is acceptable. Similarly, if when taking the handful of meal, placing it into a vessel, bringing it to the altar, or casting it on the [altar's] pyre, one had the intent to leave the handful or the frankincense until the following day or to take them out of [the Temple Courtyard], the offering is acceptable.

9 We already explained that bringing [blood or limbs to the altar] in a way other than walking is not considered as bringing them. Therefore an undesirable intent does not disqualify [a sacrifice in such an instance]. Carrying [blood or a limb] to a place to which one need not is considered as carrying and [if one has] an undesirable intent while doing this, [the sacrifice] is disqualified.

What is implied? One received the blood and while standing in his place extended his arm to cast it on the altar and while he extended his arm, he had an undesirable intent, that intent does not disqualify it. If, however, he received the blood inside [the Temple Courtyard] and did not carry it toward the altar, but instead, carried it and took it [toward the area] outside [the Courtyard], having a disqualifying intent, [like one] involving the time [the sacrifice would be eaten] or the like, he causes it to be disqualified.

Chapter 14

1 [With regard to the intent that could disqualify a sacrifice:] The only intent that is significant is that of the person performing the Temple service. The intent of the person bringing the sacrifice is of no consequence. Even when we heard that the owner had an intent which would cause the sacrifice to be considered as piggul, if the person performing the Temple service had the proper intent, the sacrifice is acceptable.

2 The intent of [the person performing sacrificial service] is significant only when he is fit to perform this service, he is performing service with an entity fit for service, and is doing so in a place fit for service.

What is implied? If a person who is unfit for Temple service receives the blood, brings it to the altar, or casts it on the altar and at the time he is performing this service has an unacceptable intent with regard to place or time, his intent does not disqualify the sacrifice, because he is not fit to perform Temple service. The blood that he received or a portion that remained after he cast some [on the altar] should be poured into the drainage canal. If "the blood of the soul" remains [within the animal], a person who is fit to perform Temple service should receive it with a proper intent.

If, however, a person who is unfit for Temple service has a disqualifying intent at the time he slaughters [the animal], he disqualifies it with his intent, because ritual slaughter is acceptable if performed by an unfit person, as explained.

They are sacrifices that are acceptable if they are offered for an intent other than specified originally, as will be explained. Therefore, [in those instances,] if a priest who is not fit for Temple service receives the blood, carries it, or casts it on the altar, he disqualifies the sacrifice as if he offered it for the desired intent in which instance, it would be disqualified. Even if "the blood of the soul" remains and it was received by an acceptable [priest] and cast on the altar, the sacrifice was already disqualified. It was not disqualified because it was offered for a different purpose, but because [service] was performed by someone unfit for service, as we explained.

3 What is meant [by the concept that these principles apply only with regard] to "performing service with an entity fit for service"? [For example,] if a handful was taken from the meal-offering of the omer without the proper intent, it is considered as if it was taken with the proper intent and the remnants are eaten. [The rationale is that] it is offered from barley and barley is not a substance fit for other offerings.

Similarly, if one had a [disqualifying] intent with regard to the meal-offering of envy while frankincense was on it, before the frankincense was removed, there is no consequence to that intent, because [it does not involve] an entity fit for service. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

4 What is meant [by the concept that these principles apply only with regard to "performing service] in a place fit for service"? When the altar has become damaged and [the priest offering the sacrifice] had a [disqualifying] intent with regard to the time or place [the sacrifice was to be offered or eaten], he did not disqualify the sacrifice with this intent, because the place was not fit for Temple service at that time.

If one took a handful of flour from a meal-offering outside the Temple Courtyard and had a [disqualifying] intent with regard to the time or place [the meal-offering was to be offered or eaten] while taking the handful, the intent is of no consequence.

5 These are elements of sacrificial [animals] that are not fit to be eaten, but are fit to be offered on the altar's pyre: its blood, its eimorim, the meat of a burnt-offering, and the handful of meal and the frankincense from the meal-offerings from which such a handful is removed.

6 These are the elements that are fit to be eaten and are not fit to be offered on the altar: the meat that is eaten from any of the sacrifices, whether eaten by the priests or by all other people, the remainder of the meal-offering, the two breads [offered on Shavuot], and the showbread.

7 These are the elements that are neither fit to be eaten, nor fit to be offered on the altar's pyre: the meat of the sin-offerings that are burnt [outside the Temple Courtyard], the entire hide of an animal with the exception of the hide of the fat-tail which is fit to be eaten, [and] the murah, the thin membrane that clings to the hide and separates between it and the meat; it is not fit to be eaten. [This category] also [includes] the bones, the giddim, the horns, and the hoofs, the feathers of a fowl, its nails, its beak, the tips of its wings, and the end of its tail. Even with regard to the soft places of the above which cleave to the flesh and would cause bleeding if cut off from a living animal, since they are not important, they are considered as an entity that is not fit to be eaten with regard to the sacrifices. This also applies to the sauce [in which a sacrifice is cooked], the spices [with which it is cooked], a fetus, a placenta, the egg of a fowl, and meat that slipped by the knife at the time the animal was skinned and remains cleaving to the hide; it is called the allal. All of the above are not significant with regard to an intent [that could disqualify] sacrifices. They are considered as a matter that is not fit to be eaten.

8 A [disqualifying] intent is significant [even though] it concerns an entity that ultimately will be destroyed or that will ultimately be burnt.

If, while performing any or all of the four [significant] services, one has a [disqualifying] intent - whether concerning the place or the time - to partake of an entity that is not usually eaten or to offer on the altar's pyre an entity that is not usually offered there, the sacrifice is acceptable.

What is implied? One thought to drink the blood of a sacrifice or partake of its eimorim or of the handful of meal or the frankincense [taken from a meal offering] outside [the Temple Courtyard] or on the following day, the sacrifice is acceptable. [This ruling also applies] if one had the intent of offering the meat of the sacrifice or what remains of the meal-offering outside [the Temple Courtyard] or on the following day.

Similarly, if one had a [disqualifying] intent - whether concerning the place or the time - to partake of or to offer on the altar's pyre the hide [of a sacrificial animal], its bones, giddim, sauce, allal, or the like, the sacrifice is acceptable. Similarly, if one had the intent to partake of the bulls or the goats that are burnt, outside [Temple Courtyard] or on the following day, the sacrifice is acceptable. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

9 If one had the intent that [other] persons who are impure or who are disqualified shall partake of an entity that is fit to be eaten or that these persons should offer an entity that is fit to be offered on the altar's pyre outside of the set times for it to be eaten or offered, the sacrifice is piggul, as we explained. If he [had the intent that they partake of it or offer it] outside the places designated for eating and offering, the sacrifice is unacceptable, but not piggul.

10 The concept of eating does not apply to a substance smaller than an olive, nor does the concept of offering an entity on the altar's pyre apply to a substance smaller than an olive. Therefore if a person had a [disqualifying] intent - whether concerning the place or the time - to partake of less than an olive size portion of an entity fit to be eaten or to offer less than an olive-sized portion of an entity fit to be offered, the sacrifice is acceptable.
If he had the intent to eat half of an olive-sized portion outside [the appropriate place] and offer half an olive-sized portion outside [the appropriate place] or he had the intent to eat half of an olive-sized portion after [the appropriate] time for eating and offer half an olive-sized portion after [the appropriate] time for offering, the sacrifice is acceptable. [The rationale is that] eating and offering are not combined [to be considered as a single activity]. If, however, he used the wording achilah, saying: "Half an olive-sized portion should be eaten and half an olive-sized portion consumed by [the altar's] fire," the [two halves] are combined, for the wording of achilah is one.

If one had a [disqualifying] intent to eat or offer half an olive-sized portion and then in the same thought had an intent concerning another half of an olive-sized portion, the two can be combined. If one had a [disqualifying] intent - whether concerning the place or the time - to eat half of an olive-sized portion and that an animal or beast should eat half of an olive-sized portion, they can be combined because both are called eating.

If one had a [disqualifying] intent that two people partake of the sacrifice, the two are combined. Even though one intended to partake of an olive-sized portion in longer than the time it takes to eat a half a loaf of bread, the eating is combined. If at the time of slaughter, he had a [disqualifying] intent to eat half an olive-sized portion and at the time of casting [the blood on the altar], he had a [disqualifying] intent to eat half an olive-sized portion, the two intents - whether concerning the place or the time - are combined. Similarly, if one had a [disqualifying] intent concerning an olive-sized portion at the time he received [the blood] and [such an intent] concerning an olive-sized portion while bringing [it to the altar, they are combined]. For all the four services [mentioned above] are combined and can be considered as a single service.

If one had a [disqualifying] intent regarding offering half an olive-sized portion of the handful [of meal] and [a similar intent] regarding half an olive-sized portion of the frankincense, they are combined. For with regard to the meal-offering, the frankincense and the handful [of meal] are considered like the eimorim for an animal sacrifice. Therefore, if one had the intent to offer an olive-sized portion of frankincense at an improper time, [the meal-offering] is considered piggul, as we explained.

Whether one had the intent to cast all [of an animal's] blood outside [the Temple Courtyard] or on the following day or had the intent to cast [only] a portion of its blood outside [the Temple Courtyard] or on the following day, since he had a [disqualifying] intent concerning the amount of blood sufficient to present on the altar, [the sacrifice] is disqualified.

Chapter 15

1 Any of the sacrifices - whether individual sacrifices or communal sacrifices - that were sacrificed for a different purpose than that for which they were originally designated are acceptable, but they did not satisfy the obligation incumbent on their owner with the exception of a sin-offering and the Paschal sacrifice. If they are offered for a different purpose, they are unacceptable. [This applies whether] one changes the purpose of the sacrifice at the time of slaughter, at the time he receives its blood, at the time he brings it to the altar, or when he casts it upon it, as we explained.

What is meant by saying that [the owner] does not fulfill his obligation through such [a sacrifice]? For example, one slaughtered [an animal designated as] a burnt-offering as a peace-offering. It does not fulfill the obligation of the owner, neither for the burnt-offering for which he is obligated or for a sin-offering. Instead, he is obligated to bring another sacrifice. Similarly, if one slaughtered a burnt-offering brought by Reuven for the sake of Shimon, it does not fulfill the obligation either of Reuven or of Shimon.

When does the above apply? When one changed the purpose of the sacrifice intentionally. If, however, one erred and had the impression that the [animal designated as] a burnt-offering was [designated as] a peace-offering and carried out all of its services for the sake of a peace-offering, the owner is considered to have fulfilled his obligation. Similarly, when one offered a sin-offering or a Paschal sacrifice for a different purpose in error, they are acceptable. For supplanting [a purpose] mistakenly is of no consequence.

Similarly, if one performs melikah on a fowl [designated as] a burnt-offering or squeezed out its blood for a different purpose, it is acceptable, but does not fulfill the obligation of the owner. And a sin-offering of fowl [brought for a different purpose] is unacceptable.

2 Similarly, all of the meal-offerings that were offered for a different intent than that originally conceived are acceptable, but the owners do not fulfill their obligation with the exception of a meal-offering of a sinner and a meal offering of a sotah. If while performing one of the four services one had an intent for a different purpose, [the meal-offering] is unacceptable.

What is implied? One separated a handful from a freewill meal-offering for the sake of a meal-offering of a sinner, from an offering intended to be prepared in a deep frying-pan for the sake of one to be prepared in a flat frying-pan, or from an offering intended to be prepared in a flat frying-pan for the sake of one to be prepared in a deep frying-pan. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

3 It is forbidden to have an incorrect intent [when performing sacrificial service with] consecrated animals, as will be explained. Therefore if one slaughtered a sacrificial animal for a different purpose or took a handful from a meal-offering for a different purpose, whether intentionally or unintentionally, he is obligated to complete the remainder of the services for the proper purpose. Even if one slaughtered [the animal], received its blood, and brought it to the altar for an improper purpose, one is obligated to cast it on the altar for the proper purpose.

Why are the laws governing a sin-offering and the Paschal sacrifice different from those governing all other sacrifices and the laws governing a meal-offering of a sinner and that of a sotah different from those governing all other meal-offerings? Because the Torah singled them out. With regard to a sin-offering, [Leviticus 4:33] states: "And he shall slaughter it as a sin-offering," i.e., that it must be slaughtered for the sake of a sin-offering. Similarly, all of its other services [must be performed] for the proper intent, as [implied by ibid.:28]: "for his sin," i.e., that its service must be performed for the sake of [atoning for] that sin. And [ibid.:26] states: "And he will atone for him," i.e., [the service must be performed] for the sake of its owner.

And with regard to the Paschal sacrifice, [Deuteronomy 16:1] states: "And you shall offer a Paschal sacrifice to God, your Lord," implying that all of the acts must be performed for the sake of the Paschal sacrifice. [Exodus 12:27] states: "And you shall say, 'It is a Paschal sacrifice unto God,' implying that it must be slaughtered for the sake of the Paschal sacrifice. Thus if one altered the purpose for which it was sacrificed or [offered for] a different owner, it is not acceptable.

And with regard to the meal-offering of a sinner, [Leviticus 5:12] states: "It is a sin-offering." And with regard to the meal-offering of a sotah, [Numbers 5:15] states: "It is a meal-offering [resulting from] envy." [The implication is that] all of the actions associated with them must be performed for that purpose.

4 When a sin-offering is offered for the sake of another sacrifice, e.g., it was offered for the sake of a burnt-offering, a guilt-offering, or a peace-offering, it is unacceptable, as we explained. If, however, it was slaughtered as an ordinary animal, it is acceptable, but the owner does not fulfill his obligation.

5 According to the Oral Tradition, it was derived that [an intent for] sacrificial purposes can disqualify sacrificial animals, but an intent for ordinary purposes does not.

6 If one slaughtered [an animal designated as a sin-offering to atone] for another sin, e.g., it was brought [to atone] for partaking of fat and one slaughtered it [to atone] for partaking of blood, it is unacceptable.

7 If one slaughtered [an animal designated as a sin-offering to atone] for the sake of another person who was obligated to bring a sin-offering, even an adjustable guilt-offering, it is unacceptable.

8 If, however, one slaughtered it for the sake of another person who was obligated to bring a burnt-offering, it is acceptable, but the owner has not fulfilled his obligation.
[The concept mentioned previously derived from Leviticus 4:26:] "And he will atone for him," [i.e., "for him,"] and not for his colleague who is obligated to bring a sin-offering like he is.

9 If one slaughtered [an animal designated as a sin-offering] for the sake of a deceased person, it is acceptable, but it does not satisfy the obligation of the owner, because there is no atonement for the dead [through sacrifices]. If one slaughtered it for the sake of a person who is not obligated to bring a sacrifice at all, not a sin-offering, nor a burnt-offering, nor any other sacrifice, it is unacceptable. [The rationale is that] perhaps he is obligated [to bring a sacrifice], but does not know.

10 If one slaughtered [a sacrificial animal] with the desired intent, but at the time of slaughter had the intent to cast its blood on the altar for a different purpose, it is disqualified, for the intent one has for one service during the performance of another service [is significant]. Thus the intent one had during the time of slaughter is considered as if it was in [the priest's] mind at the time he cast [the blood on the altar]. Therefore [the sacrifice] is disqualified.

11 A Paschal sacrifice that was slaughtered for a different intent - whether for the sake of another sacrifice or whether as an ordinary animal - it is unacceptable, as it is written: "And you shall say, 'It is a Paschal sacrifice unto God,'

When does the above apply? When it was slaughtered on its appropriate time, the day of the fourteenth of Nisan. Moreover, even if it was slaughtered in the morning of that day for a different intent, it is unacceptable. If, however, one slaughtered it with a different intent at a time not appropriate for its [sacrifice], it is acceptable.

[If it was slaughtered] for the sake of others and not for its owner, it is considered as if it did not have an owner on the day [when it should be sacrificed] and it is unacceptable.

12 When a Paschal sacrifice was slaughtered with the proper intent on the fourteenth of Nisan before noon, it is unacceptable, because this is not the time of the sacrifice. If it was older than one year and it was slaughtered at the appropriate time for the sake of a Paschal sacrifice and similarly, if one of the other sacrifices were slaughtered for the sake of a Paschal sacrifice, even if it was slaughtered after noon, they are acceptable, but the owners do not fulfill their obligation.

13 When a thanksgiving-offering is slaughtered for the sake of a peace-offering, the owner's obligation is fulfilled. When a peace-offering is slaughtered for the sake of a thanksgiving-offering, the owner's obligation is not fulfilled. [The rationale is that] a thanksgiving-offering is called a peace-offering, but a peace-offering is not called a thanksgiving-offering.

14 When a burnt-offering was slaughtered for the sake of another person who was not obligated to bring a sacrifice at all, the owner does not fulfill his obligation, for it was not slaughtered for his sake. Although the person for whom it was sacrificed is not liable for any sacrifice in his own mind, it is impossible that he is not obligated [to seek] atonement from heaven, for there is no Jewish person who has never violated a positive commandment.

15 When a burnt-offering that was brought after the death [of the person who set it aside] was offered for the sake [of that person who set it aside and] not for the sake of its owner, the owner is considered to have fulfilled his obligation, for there is no conception of ownership after death.

16 When the two sheep to be brought on Shavuot were slaughtered with the intent that they were rams, the community is not considered to have fulfilled its obligation. If [the priests] thought they were rams and slaughtered them with the intent that they were rams, they are considered to have fulfilled their obligation, for the intent was uprooted in error.

17 When a guilt-offering of a person [to be purified from] tzara'at was slaughtered for the sake of another type of sacrifice or its blood was not placed on the thumb and large toe of the person seeking atonement, accompanying offerings are required. For if it was offered without accompanying offerings, it would be as if one offered a freewill offering. And a guilt-offering is never brought as a freewill offering.

18 When the sheep that is brought together with the omer offering was slaughtered for a different intent, one should not bring two esronim for its accompanying offering. Instead, he should bring one isaron, as is brought for other freewill offerings. [The rationale is that] it did not satisfy the obligation.

Similarly, when [a lamb intended as] a continuous offering was slaughtered for a different intent, the two logs of wood should not be brought up with it, as is done for the other continuous offerings. [The rationale is that] it does not fulfill the obligation of the continuous offering, but instead, is like other freewill offerings.

19 When the sheep offered on Shavout were slaughtered for a different intent or were slaughtered before their appropriate time or after their appropriate time, the blood should be cast upon the altar and the meat eaten even though the obligation of the community was not fulfilled. If it was the Sabbath, the blood should not be cast [on the altar]. If it was cast [upon the altar], it is considered acceptable insomuch as the eimorim should be offered in the evening.

20 Similarly when the peace-offerings of a nazirite were offered for a different intent, even though the owner does not fulfill his obligation, they are eaten for a day and a night and do not require bread. Similarly, when the guilt-offering of a nazirite or the guilt-offering of one [to be purified from] tzara'at were offered for a different intent, they are eaten, even though the owner does not fulfill his obligation.

1 We have already explained that when a person has a disqualifying intent with regard to the place [a sacrifice will be offered or eaten] while performing one of the four [specified] services, the sacrifice is disqualified, but it is not piggul. If he had a disqualifying intent with regard to the time [the sacrifice would be offered or eaten], it is piggul.

When does the above apply? When no other intent is combined together with the intent concerning time. If, however, an intent concerning the place - or with regard to the Paschal sacrifice or a sin-offering, an intent concerning the type of sacrifice - was combined with the intent concerning time, the sacrifice is disqualified, but it is not piggul.

What is implied? If one slaughtered, received [the blood], brought it [to the altar], and cast it [on the altar] with a [disqualifying] intent concerning time or [even if] he had a [disqualifying] intent concerning time while [perfoming] one of these services and his intent was proper or he had no intent while performing the other services, [the sacrifice] was piggul. If, however, one slaughtered with a [disqualifying] intent concerning time, but received [the blood], brought it [to the altar], and cast it [on the altar] with a [disqualifying] intent concerning place or slaughtered with a [disqualifying] intent concerning place, but received [the blood], brought it [to the altar], and cast [on the altar] with a [disqualifying] intent concerning time, [the sacrifice] is not piggul, merely disqualified.

Similarly, if a Paschal sacrifice or sin-offering were slaughtered for a different purpose, but one received [the blood], brought it [to the altar], and cast it [on the altar] with a [disqualifying] intent concerning time, or one slaughtered with a [disqualifying] intent concerning time, but received [the blood], brought it [to the altar], and cast [on the altar] for a different purpose, [the sacrifice] is not piggul, merely disqualified.

The same principles apply with regard to offerings of fowl and meal-offerings. The term piggul applies only when a sacrifice is disqualified because of an intent concerning time, without a [disqualifying] intent concerning place combined with it, neither at the outset or at the end, nor is an intent concerning the type of sacrifice combined with it with regard to those sacrifices that are disqualified when offered for a different purpose.

2 When, while performing one or all of the four services, a person has the intent to eat an olive-sized portion of a substance that is fit to be eaten outside [the limits of where it may be eaten] and an olive-sized portion on the following day;

an olive-sized portion on the following day and an olive-sized portion outside [the limits of where it may be eaten], half an olive-sized portion outside [the limits of where it may be eaten] and half an olive-sized portion on the following day, or half an olive-sized portion on the following day and half an olive-sized portion outside [the limits of where it may be eaten], the sacrifice is disqualified, but not piggul. Similarly, if one combined another disqualifying intent regarding offering [a sacrifice with one regarding time, the sacrifice] is disqualified, but not piggul.

3 If one had the intent to eat or to offer half an olive-sized portion with a [disqualifying] intent concerning place and to eat or to offer an olive-sized portion with a [disqualifying] intent concerning time, [the sacrifice] is piggul. [This applies] whether the [disqualifying] intent concerning the olive-sized portion was first or last. [The rationale is that] half an olive-sized portion is not significant in relation to an olive-sized portion.

4 If he had a [disqualifying] intent concerning time with regard to half an olive-sized portion and a [disqualifying] intent concerning place with regard to [another] half an olive-sized portion, and then a [disqualifying] intent concerning time with regard to [another] half an olive-sized portion, [the sacrifice] is piggul.

Similarly, if one had a [disqualifying] intent concerning time with regard to half an olive-sized portion and then a [disqualifying] intent with regard to an olive-sized portion: with regard to half, a [disqualifying] intent concerning time, and with regard to the other half, a [disqualifying] intent concerning place, [the sacrifice] is piggul.

5 If one had an intent to present blood that should be presented on the lower portion [of the altar] on the upper portion [of the altar] or he had an intent to present [blood] that should be presented on the upper portion [of the altar] on the lower portion [of the altar] or the like, [these] intents that do not disqualify [a sacrifice], as explained; if one combined a [disqualifying] intent concerning time, [the sacrifice] is piggul. If he combined a [disqualifying] intent concerning place alone, [the sacrifice] is unacceptable, but it is not piggul.

6 If one had an intent to present blood that should be presented on the upper portion [of the altar] on the lower portion on the following day, [an intent] to present blood that should be presented on the upper portion [of the altar] on the lower portion on the following day, he had an intent to present blood that should be presented in the Sanctuary on the outer altar on the following day, or he had an intent to present blood that should be presented on the outer altar in the Sanctuary on the following day, [the sacrifice] is not piggul. Even though he had an intent concerning the time, since he changed the place where the blood was presented in his mind, [the sacrifice] is disqualified, but is not piggul.

Since we have explained in these halachot that when blood is presented in a place other than the desired place, it is considered as if it was presented in the desired place, why is [the sacrifice] not considered as piggul because of this intent to present the blood outside of its desired place on the following day? [The rationale is that] even though the sacrifice is acceptable, since the blood was not presented in its proper place, it does not cause the meat to be permitted to be eaten, as we explained. [There is a general principle:] In any situation where blood is cast upon [the altar, but it] does cause the meat to be permitted to be eaten, if one had the intent to present it at a time [after the prescribed time], it is not piggul. Therefore, [in the circumstances mentioned above,] if one had a [disqualifying] intent concerning time with regard to this sacrifice, it is unacceptable, but it is not piggul.

7 If a person had a disqualifying intent concerning time at the time he took [the handful of flour from a meal-offering], but did not have such an intent at the time he collected the frankincense or he had a disqualifying intent concerning time at the time he collected the frankincense, but did not have such an intent at the time he took [the handful of flour, the meal-offering] is disqualified, but is not piggul. [An offering becomes piggul] only when one has a disqualifying intent with regard to all [the substances which] cause it to be permitted [to be eaten], i.e., the handful of meal and the frankincense, at the time the handful is taken and the frankincense is collected, or when they are both placed into a sacred utensil, brought [to the altar], or cast [upon its pyre].

8 If at the time he cast the handful [of meal] on the altar's pyre, he had the intent to offer the frankincense on the following day, it is not piggul, because an intent to offer something on the altar's pyres while offering something else on the pyre does not cause the offering to be piggul. Similarly, if one offered only the frankincense or only the handful [of meal] and had the intent to eat the remainder on the following day, [the meal-offering] is disqualified, but is not piggul. [The rationale is that a disqualifying intent involving only] half [the substances which] cause an offering to be permitted [to be eaten], does not cause it to be considered as piggul.

If, [by contrast,] one offered only the handful [of meal] and had the intent to offer the frankincense on the following day and afterwards offered the frankincense and had the intent to partake of the remainder [of the offering] on the following day, [the offering] is piggul, for the [disqualifying] intent concerning time has spread throughout the entire meal-offering.

9 If one offered a portion of the handful [of meal] the size of a sesame seed together with the frankincense with the intent that he eat a sesame seed-sized portion of the remainder [of the offering] on the following day, [even if] he continues offering the entire handful [of meal] with the frankincense with [the same disqualifying] intent concerning time, [the meal-offering] is disqualified, but is not piggul. [The rationale is that] even though eating little by little is an ordinary manner of eating, this is not the ordinary manner in which entities are offered on the altar. Instead, it is like a meal-offering whose handful was not offered on the altar's pyre.

10 When there was frankincense placed on the meal-offering of a sinner or that of a sotah and one had a [disqualifying] intent involving time before the frankincense was removed, [the offerings] are disqualified, but are not piggul. If after he collected the frankincense he had a [disqualifying] intent concerning time with regard to the offering, it is piggul.

11 If the remaining portion [of a meal-offering] was diminished between the time the handful was taken and it was offered on the altar and then the handful was offered with a [disqualifying] intent concerning time, there is a doubt whether it was established [as fit to become] piggul and thus it is piggul or it was not established and it is not piggul.

Chapter 17

1 Whenever blood must be presented on the outer altar and the first presentation was made with a proper intent and a second or further presentation was made for the sake of a different sacrifice or he had a [disqualifying] intent with regard to place or time, atonement is achieved and the sacrifice is acceptable.

If the first presentation [of blood] was made with a [disqualifying] intent with regard to time and [the priest] completed the presentation of the blood with a [disqualifying] intent with regard to place, [the sacrifice] is piggul. [The rationale is that] the first presentation of the blood is of fundamental importance.

In contrast, with regard to all of the presentations of blood on the inner altar - since they are all absolute requirements [for the offering of the sacrifice], as we explained - if one of presentations was not made as required, but instead, one had a disqualifying intent, the sacrifice is unacceptable, even if all the other presentations were made as required.

2 If one had a [disqualifying] intent with regard to time when making the first [of the presentations of the blood on the inner altar] and had no specific intent regarding the remainder or he presented all of them as required with the exception of the final one, which he presented with a [disqualifying] intent with regard to time, [the sacrifice] is disqualified, but it is not piggul. [It is not given that distinction] unless one makes [all] the presentations with a [disqualifying] intent with regard to time, for they are all considered as one presentation.

3 [Having a disqualifying intent while] immersing one's finger in the blood of a sin-offering [whose blood is offered] on the inner altar can cause a sacrifice to become piggul.

What is implied? If at the time [the priest] immersed his finger in the blood, he had a disqualifying intent concerning time, it is as if he had such an intent when presenting [the blood on the altar].

4 If a priest was standing in the Temple Courtyard and he had a disqualifying intent concerning time with regard to one of the sin-offerings [whose blood is offered] on the inner altar with regard to an aspect of the sacrifice that is performed in the Sanctuary, [the offering] is not piggul. If he had such an intent with regard to an aspect that is performed in the Temple Courtyard, it is piggul.

5 What is implied? If a priest was standing in the Temple Courtyard and said: "I am slaughtering [this animal] with the intent of presenting its blood tomorrow," [the offering] is not piggul, because presenting the blood is performed inside, in the Sanctuary.

6 If [a priest] was standing in the Sanctuary and he said: "I am presenting [the blood] with the intent to pour the remaining [blood] on the following day, [the offering] is not piggul, because he had a disqualifying intent inside [the Temple Sanctuary] regarding a service performed outside. If, however, he was standing in the Temple Courtyard and slaughtered [the animal] with the intent to pour out the remainder [of the blood] on the following day or to offer the fats and the organs on the following day, [the offering] is piggul, for he had a [disqualifying] intent while outside concerning a service that is performed outside.

7 A [disqualifying intent] concerning a thanksgiving-offering causes the bread [that accompanies it] to become piggul, but a [disqualifying intent] concerning the bread does not cause the thanksgiving-offering to become piggul.

What is implied? When one slaughtered a thanksgiving-offering and had the intent to partake of its meat, cast its blood on the altar, or offer its fats and organs on the following day, the offering and the bread are piggul. If he had the intent to partake of the bread on the following day, the bread alone is piggul; the thanksgiving-offering is not piggul.

8 Similar concepts apply with regard to the two sheep offered on Shavuot with the two breads offered with them. If one had a [disqualifying] intent concerning time with regard to the sheep, the two breads are considered as piggul. If he had the intent to partake of the two breads on the following day, the two breads are piggul and the sheep are not piggul. If while performing one of the four [significant] services, [the priest] had the intent to partake of an olive-sized portion of the meat of the sacrifice together with the bread tomorrow, the bread alone is piggul and the thanksgiving-offering or the sheep are not piggul.

9 When [a priest] offers the two bowls of frankincense that accompany the showbread and, while offering them, had the intent to partake of the showbread on the following day, the bread is piggul.

10 When one slaughters the two sheep for Shavuot and has the intent to eat one of the loaves on the following day, they are both piggul.

11 If one offered the two bowls [of frankincense] and he had the intent to partake of one of the two arrangements of bread on the following day, both arrangements are piggul.

12 Similarly, if one had a [disqualifying] thought concerning time with regard to one of the breads of the thanksgiving-offering or with regard to one of the breads of meal-offering baked in an oven, all of the breads are piggul.

13 If, by contrast, one of the two breads [of Shavuot], one of the two arrangements [of the showbread], or one of the breads of the thanksgiving offering- whether before the casting on the altar or afterwards - becomes impure, only that bread or that arrangement are forbidden to be eaten. What is pure may be eaten in its state of purity.

14 If, while performing the sacrificial service associated with one of the two sheep, [the priest] had the intent to eat an olive-sized portion of the two breads on the following day - and similarly, if while offering one of the two bowls [of frankincense], he had the intent to partake of an olive-sized portion of the showbread on the following day, the bread is disqualified, but it is not piggul. [It is given that distinction] only when he has a [disqualifying] intent while performing all the services that permit the bread to be eaten: [i.e.,] bringing both sheep and offering both bowls [of frankincense] on the altar's pyre.

15 If one slaughtered one [of the sheep] and had the intent to eat half an olive-sized portion from one loaf on the following day and slaughtered the second lamb and had the intent of eating half an olive-sized portion on the following day, [the two intents] are combined to render the loaves piggul. Similar concepts apply with regard to the two bowls [of frankincense] and the two arrangements [of showbread].

16 If one had a [disqualifying] intent concerning time with regard to one of the two sheep and offered the second with a proper intent, the one that was offered with a [disqualifying] intent concerning time is piggul and the other is acceptable.

17 If one slaughtered one of [these two sheep] and had the intent while slaughtering it to partake of the meat of the other one on the following day, they are both acceptable. For the intent one has with regard to one is of no consequence regarding the second.

18 The two lambs [offered on] Shavuot do not cause the bread to be sanctified unless they are slaughtered.

What is implied? If one slaughtered them and cast their blood [on the altar] for the sake of another sacrifice, he did not sanctify the bread. If he slaughtered them with the proper intent and cast their blood [on the altar] for the sake of another sacrifice, the bread is sanctified, but is not sanctified.

If they slaughtered it for the sake of another sacrifice even though he cast [the blood] for the proper intent, the bread was not sanctified.

19 When the two loaves were taken out [of the Temple Courtyard] between the slaughter [of the two sheep] and the casting [of their blood] and the blood of the sheep was cast on the altar with a [disqualifying] intent concerning time, the bread becomes piggul even though it is outside [the Temple Courtyard]. For casting [the blood] has an effect on [bread] that was taken out even though it is still outside [the Temple Courtyard].

20 When the two sheep offered on Shavuos were slaughtered with the proper intent and the breads were lost, they are disqualified if their blood was cast [on the altar] with the desired intent. If their blood was cast [on the altar] with a [disqualifying] intent concerning time after the bread was lost, there is an unresolved doubt if [the meat of the sheep] is permitted to be eaten or not.

Chapter 18

1 Anyone who has an incorrect intent [while performing] sacrificial service violates a negative commandment, for [Leviticus 7:18] states: "He may not intent this."

2 According to the Oral Tradition, it was taught that included in this prohibition is not to cause sacrificial offerings to be disqualified through thought, for this is comparable to causing a blemish in sacrificial animals. Nevertheless, [a transgressor] is not punished by lashes, for thought is not considered as deed.

3 Whenever a sacrifice is defined as unacceptable - whether it was disqualified because of an intent, an action, or something which caused it to be disqualified - anyone who partakes of an olive-sized portion of it intentionally is liable for lashes, as [a result of the prohibition,

Deuteronomy 14:3]: "Do not partake of anything abhorrent."

4 According to the Oral Tradition, we learned that the verse was warning solely against [partaking of] sacrificial animals that were disqualified.

5 Similarly, when sacrificial animals which were [intentionally] blemished, a person who eats an olive-sized portion of them is liable for lashes, for they are included in the category of "anything abhorrent." [It is forbidden to partake of them] until they contract another blemish, [at which time,] they may be eaten because of the blemish, as we explained. Whenever there is a unresolved doubt whether [a sacrificial animal] has been disqualified, lashes are not given.

6 Whenever a sacrifice has been deemed piggul because of a disqualifying intent concerning time, as we explained, anyone who partakes of an olive-sized portion of it intentionally is liable for karet, as [implied by Leviticus 7:18]: "The soul which partakes of it will bear its sin." If one partakes of [the meat of such a sacrifice] inadvertently, he should bring a fixed sin-offering.

7 One is not liable for karet unless one partakes of entities that were permitted for consumption, either by a person or by the altar. If, however, one eats of the entity that permits [the sacrifice to be eaten] itself, one is not liable for karet. Instead, he is liable for lashes like one who partakes of disqualified sacrificial animals for which the transgression of karet is not involved.

What is implied? When a meal-offering becomes piggul, one who partakes of an olive-sized portion of the remaining [meal] intentionally, is liable for karet. If, however, he partakes of the handful [that is separated to be offered on the altar] or from the frankincense, he is not liable for karet, for these are the substances that enable [the meal to be eaten] by men. Similarly, when a sacrifice is deemed piggul, one who partakes of an olive-sized portion of its meat or of the fats and organs offered on the altar or from the meat of a burnt-offering is liable for karet. If, however, he partakes of an olive-sized portion of the blood, he is not liable for karet, because [the casting of] the blood permits the fats and the organs to be offered on the altar and [the offering of] the fats and the organs permit the meat [to be eaten by] a person. [Similarly,] the blood of a burnt-offering permits its meat [to be offered] on the altar. [The presentation of] the blood of a sin-offering of fowl permits its meat to be eaten by the priests. [The presentation of] the blood of a burnt-offering of fowl permits its meat to be offered on the altar.

[The presentation of] the blood of a sin-offering that is burnt permits its fats and the organs to be offered on the altar. Therefore one is liable for [partaking of] the fats and the organs as piggul. [Offering] the handful [of meal] and the frankincense permit a meal-offering to [be eaten by] the priests. [Offering] the two sheep on Shavuot permit the two loaves to [be eaten by] the priests. [Offering] the two bowls of frankincense permit the showbread to [be eaten by] the priests. Sacrificial entities that do not have entities that permit them [to be consumed either by the altar or by man], e.g., the meat of the sin-offerings that are burnt or the meal-offerings that are burnt, are never deemed as piggul.

8 These are the entities that are never deemed as piggul: the handful [of meal] and the frankincense; the incense-offering; the blood [of any sacrifice]; wine - whether wine that comes as part of the accompanying offerings or wine that is offered independently; and the meal-offerings that are burnt in their entirety; for there is not a handful that permits them, e.g., the meal-offering of a priest or the meal-offering of the accompanying offerings; the meat of the sin-offerings that are burnt; and the log of oil brought by a nazirite.

If one would ask [with regard to the latter instance]: Does not the blood of the guilt-offering [brought by the nazirite] permit the oil to be eaten? [In resolution, it can be said that] one is not dependent on the other, for a person may bring his guilt-offering one day and the log of oil after several days, as will be explained in the appropriate place.

9 It is forbidden to leave sacrificial meat beyond the time in which it may be eaten, as [Leviticus 22:30] states with regard to the thanksgiving-offering: "Do not leave it over until the morning." This same applies to all other sacrifices.

One who leaves over sacrificial meat is not liable for lashes, for Scripture enables [the transgression] to be corrected by [the fulfillment of] a positive commandment, as [Exodus 12:10] states: "That which remains from it until the morning should be burnt with fire."

10 One who partakes of an olive-sized portion of the meat of sacrifices that were left beyond their required time intentionally is liable for karet. If he did so unintentionally, he must bring a fixed sin-offering, as [Leviticus

19:8]: "He who partakes of it shall bear his sin, for he has desecrated what is holy unto God; [that soul] shall be cut off."

From when is a person held liable for partaking of notar [this left-over meat]? If it is from sacrifices of the most sacred order, he is liable from dawn. If it is from sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity, he is liable from sunset on the second day which is the beginning of the third day.

Where does the Torah warn against piggul and notar? With regard to [the sacrifices of] the dedication [of the Sanctuary], [Exodus 29:34] states: "[They shall not be eaten, for they are holy." This warns against [partaking of] any [sacrificial food] disqualified [in the Sanctuary], [stating] that there is a negative commandment against partaking of it.

11 Piggul and notar can be combined to reach the minimum measure of an olive-sized portion [for which one is held liable]. All sacrificial foods that became piggul or notar can be combined [for this purpose].

12 It is forbidden to cause sacrificial foods to contract impurity or to create a circumstance that makes them impure, for he disqualifies them. One who makes sacrificial foods impure is not liable for lashes, but a person who is pure who partakes of an olive-sized portion of sacred foods that have become impure is liable for lashes, as [Leviticus 7:19] states: "Meat that will touch anything impure should not be eaten."

The same also applies with regard to other sacrifices. [For example,] if one partakes of an olive-sized portion of the frankincense of a meal-offering that became impure after it was sanctified in a utensil is liable for lashes. [This refers] both to sacrificial food that became impure before atonement was attained or afterwards, whether it became impure because of contact with a primary source of impurity or a derivative of impurity of Scriptural origin. If, however, sacrificial foods contracted impurity that is Rabbinic in origin, one is not liable for lashes for partaking of them; he does, however, receives stripes for rebellious conduct.

[Even one who partakes of sacrificial food that contracts impurity of Scriptural origin] is liable for lashes only when he partakes of it after its blood is cast [on the altar]. If, by contrast, he partakes of it before the casting of its blood, he is not liable for lashes because he partook of impure sacrificial food. He does, however, receive stripes for rebellious conduct.

13 Any person who contracted a form of impurity that would make him liable for karet for entering the Temple who ate an olive-sized portion of sacrificial food - whether the food is pure or impure - intentionally is liable for karet, as [Leviticus 7:20] states: "A soul that will partake... of the slaughter of the peace-offerings that are for God while his impurity is upon him and [that soul] shall be cut off." If he partakes of it inadvertently, he must bring an adjustable guilt-offering.

What is the source that teaches that the verse is speaking about a situation where the person's body is ritually impure? [Leviticus 7:21] states: "When a soul will touch any impurity, whether impurity of a human, an impure animal, or an impure creature and he partook of the meat of the slaughter of the peace-offerings that are for God while his impurity is upon him and [that soul] shall be cut off." The same applies to all other sacrifices of the altar.

Where did [the Torah] warn concerning this prohibition? With regard to a woman who gave birth, [Leviticus 12:4] states: "She shall not touch anything that is sanctified."

14 According to the Oral Tradition, it was taught that [the verse] is a warning to a person who is impure, that he or she should not partake of sacrificial food before he immerses himself [in a mikveh]. If one partakes of sacrificial food after immersion, before sunset of that day and before bringing the sacrifice that brings atonement, he or she is liable for lashes, but not for karet, for [Leviticus 7:20] states "while his impurity is upon him." [Implied is that] the full measure of impurity must be upon him.

15 If a person was impure because of impurity resulting from a Rabbinic ordinance, he is not liable for lashes [if he partakes of sacrificial food]. Needless to say, he is not liable for karet. He does, however, receive stripes for rebellious conduct.

16 One is not liable for karet for partaking of sacrificial food that is made permitted by a particular act unless one partakes of it after that act is performed. If, however, he partakes of the meat [of a sacrifice] before its blood is cast on the altar, he is not liable for lashes for partaking of sacrificial meat while impure.

This is the general principle: Whenever sacrificial food is permitted because [of the performance of] a particular act, one is not liable for the violation of any of the prohibitions against partaking of piggul, notar, or impure sacrificial food unless the act which permits partaking of the food was performed according to law. Whenever there is not a given act that makes sacrificial food permitted, once it is sanctified in a consecrated vessel, one is liable for partaking of it if it becomes impure. Even if [sacrificial] meat becomes impure before the person partaking of it becomes impure, if the act [that would have] permitted the meat to be eaten was performed and the person partook of the sacrificial food, he is liable for karet. Similarly, if a person who is impure partakes of the meat of the sin-offerings that are burnt, after their blood is cast [on the altar], he is liable for karet.

17 It was already explained for you, that even entities for which one is not liable for piggul, one may be liable for notar or because the object contracted ritual impurity?

What is implied? There is no liability for piggul for sacrificial entities that do not have an activity that permits them [to be eaten], but one may be held liable [for partaking of them if they] became notar or impure in such circumstances.

Similarly, even though there cannot be liability for piggul for the very entities that cause the sacrificial meat to be permitted, as we explained, one can be liable [for partaking of such entities if the sacrificial meat] became notar or impure with the exception of the blood. For one is liable for only one transgression for partaking of it.

18 When a person who is impure partakes of the fats and organs to be offered on the altar, he is liable for karet.

19 [If an impure person] partook of a Paschal sacrifice that was not roasted, or breads of the thanksgiving-offering of which the breads [to be given to the priest] were not taken, he is liable for karet because of the impurity of [his] body even though they are not fit for their [purpose at this stage].

It is impossible for a person to be liable for the transgressions of piggul and notar with regard to consumption of the same sacrifice. [The rationale is that] piggul is a sacrifice that was disqualified because of an unacceptable thought concerning time. It does not fulfill the obligations of a sacrifice and is not acceptable at all. Notar, by contrast, refers to the remnants of a sacrifice that was offered as required which remained after the time [prescribed] for its consumption.

20 When one combined [different types of sacrificial food that were] piggul, notar, and impure and partook of them, he is liable. Even though there was more of one type of prohibited substance than another, it does not nullify it, because [these] prohibited substances do not nullify each other.

21 When [sacrificial meat] that was piggul, notar, or impure was brought up to the altar, once the fire takes hold of the majority of it, their prohibitions take flight.

The fat and the organs can be combined with the meat, both with regard to a burnt offering or to other sacrifices with regard to the prohibitions of piggul, notar, or [sacrificial meat] that has become impure.

22 When a sacrifice becomes piggul or notar after the time for its consumption passes and a person partakes of it, from its skin, from the sauce or spices [in which it is cooked], the allal, the murah, from the giddim, the horns, and the hoofs, the nails, the beak [of a fowl], its feathers, or its eggs, he is not liable for karet. Similarly, if an impure person partakes of these substances from an acceptable sacrifice, he is not liable for karet. He is, however, given stripes for rebellious conduct.

23 If one partook of a fetus or a placenta, he is liable for [violating the prohibitions of] piggul, notar, or [sacrificial meat] that has become impure like one who partake of any other [portion of] the meat of a sacrifice.

24 [The prohibitions of] piggul, notar, or [sacrificial meat] that has become impure do not apply with regard to sacrifices brought by gentiles. Nor do they apply to sacrificial blood, as explained. Similarly, one is not liable for karet for [the prohibitions of] piggul, notar, or partaking of [sacrificial entities] while impure for partaking of frankincense, the incense offering, or the wood [of the altar].

Chapter 19

1 It is a positive commandment to burn all the sacrifices that have become impure, as [Leviticus 7:19] states: "And the meat that will touch anything that [imparts] impurity may not be eaten. It must be burnt with fire." Similarly, it is a mitzvah to burn notar, as [ibid.:17] states: "What remains from the meat of the sacrifice on the third day shall be burnt with fire." Included in [the category of] notar is piggul and all other sacrifices that were disqualified. They must all be burnt.

2 When a sacrifice becomes piggul or is [otherwise] disqualified, it should be burnt in the Temple immediately. Whenever there is a doubt whether a sacrifice has been disqualified, it should be left until the next day and then burnt in the Temple.

3 There is an unresolved doubt with regard to the bulls and the goats which are to be burnt whether leaving them overnight or taking them outside [the Temple Courtyard] before the time to take them out disqualifies their meat as it would their fats and organs or not. Therefore, as a stringency, it is considered as if they were disqualified and they should be burnt in the Temple Courtyard.

Similarly, there is an unresolved doubt if half [such] an animal was taken out [including] the majority of one limb. Therefore, as a stringency, it is considered as if it was disqualified and it should be burnt in the Temple Courtyard.

Similarly, if five people carried [such] an animal to take it outside the Temple Courtyard and three departed from [the Courtyard] and two remained, but the three removed half of the animal, [such animals] are disqualified because of the doubt and they should be burnt in the Temple Courtyard. It appears to me that in such instances, it is not necessary to wait until the following day. [The rationale is that] regardless [such animals] will be burnt, even if they are not disqualified.

4 [The following laws apply when] meat is found in the Temple Courtyard: [Whole] limbs are [considered as parts of] burnt-offerings. Pieces [of meat] are considered as parts of sin-offerings. Pieces which are found in Jerusalem are considered as parts of peace-offerings. Everything should be left until the following day and then taken out to the place where sacrifices are burnt lest it be notar.

[One might ask: If so,] of what benefit will it be that it be considered as [part of] a burnt-offering, a sin-offering, or a peace-offering? [To define the law for one] who transgressed and partook of it.

Notar is burnt only during the day, as stated: "On the third day, [it] shall be burnt with fire."

5 Although peace-offerings are forbidden to be eaten from the beginning of the night of the third day, [the remainder] is only burnt during the day, whether [it is burnt] at the appropriate time or not at the appropriate time. Similarly, piggul is burnt only during the day.

Burning [sacrificial meat] that is impure, notar, or piggul does not supersede [the prohibitions against forbidden labor on] festivals. Needless to say, it does not supersede [the prohibition against work on] the Sabbath.

It is permitted to burn [sacrificial meat] that is impure, notar, and piggul together.

6 When the meat of a sacrifice of the most sacred order became impure in [the Temple Courtyard], it should be burnt in [the Temple Courtyard]. When it became impure outside [the Temple Courtyard], it should be burnt outside [the Temple Courtyard]. [This applies] whether it became impure because of a primary source of ritual impurity or a derivative of ritual impurity.

The priests never refrained from burning meat that contracted impurity from a primary source of impurity - and thus it is defined as impure to the first degree - with meat that contracted impurity from a derivative of impurity, even though this would increase the level of its impurity. For [an entity that is] of third degree impurity that touches an entity of first degree impurity is considered as of secondary impurity, as explained in [the appropriate] place. Moreover, even oil that became impure because it touched a person who immersed on that day, which is of third degree impurity is permitted to be burnt in a metal lamp that was touched by a person who is impure because of contact with a human corpse, in which instance, the lamp is a primary source of impurity. Although the oil becomes impure to the first degree when it touches the lamp, since it was already deemed impure, we are not concerned with the increase of the impurity. We are only careful that an entity that is pure will not become disqualified.

7 Notar left over from sacrifices of a lesser degree of holiness should be burnt by the persons bringing the sacrifice in their homes.

8 [The following rules apply when a person] left Jerusalem and remembered that he had sacrificial meat in his possession. If he already passed Mt. Scopus, he should burn it where he is. If not and it is the size of an olive-sized portion, he should return and burn it in Jerusalem. If he is a guest who does not have a home, he should burn it before the Temple with wood designated for the arrangement of wood [of the altar].

9 All of the bones of the sacrifices that do not have marrow need not be burnt with the exception of the bones of the Paschal sacrifice. We already explained that when a sacrifice was disqualified after it was skinned, its hide should be given to the priests or to the owners, in the instance of sacrifices of a lesser degree of holiness. If, however, [a sacrifice] was disqualified before it was skinned, the hide is considered as the meat and it should be burnt in its entirety.

Similarly, if a sacrifice was skinned and then it was discovered to be tereifah or it was disqualified because of an improper thought concerning time or place, since the sacrifice was not accepted, the hide should be burnt. [This applies] both to sacrifices of the highest degree of sanctity and to sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity. If, however, a sacrifice was offered for the sake of a different intent, even though the obligation of the owners was not fulfilled, since it is acceptable, the hide is given to the priests or the owners, as explained [above]. When a sacrifice was skinned before the blood was cast [on the altar and the sacrifice was disqualified afterwards, the hide] is not disqualified.

10 These are the entities that should be burnt: sacrificial meat that became impure, notar, or was disqualified, and also a meal-offering that became impure, notar, or was disqualified, a conditional guilt-offering in an instance when it became known to the transgressor that he definitely did not sin before its blood was cast [on the altar], a sin-offering of fowl that is brought because of a doubt, the hair of a nazirite who is ritually pure, and [produce that is] orlah or kilei hakerem. Entities that are not fit to be burnt - e.g., liquids that are orlah or kilei hakerem - should be buried.

11 These are the entities that should be buried: sacred animals that died, whether they were consecrated to [be offered on] the altar or for the sake of the Temple treasury - when sacred animals miscarry and discharge a fetus or a placenta, it should be buried - an ox that is stoned to death, a calf whose neck is broken, the fowl [used for the purification of] a person afflicted with tzara'at, the hair of a nazirite who became impure, a firstborn donkey [which was not redeemed], a mixture of milk and meat, and ordinary animals that were slaughtered in the Temple Courtyard.

12 When a person weaves the full length of a sit from the hair of a nazirite or a firstborn donkey with a weave of goatshair, it should be consigned to flames.

13 [If] any of the entities that must be buried [are burnt], it is forbidden to benefit from their ashes. It is permitted to benefit from the ashes of all of the entities that must be burnt, [even if] they are sacred, with the exception of the ashes of the outer and inner altars and the ashes of the Menorah.

14 None of the entities to be burnt should be buried and none of the entities to be buried should be burnt. [The rationale for the latter point is that] even though he is stringent by burning it, he is being lenient with regard to its ash, for the ashes of the entities that are buried are forbidden.

15 If a person was offering sacrifices together with [a priest] and he told him: "[The sacrifices became] piggul," or if he was involved with entities that are ritually pure with a person and he told him, "They became impure," his word is accepted. A Jew is not suspected of lying in such an instance. If, by contrast, he told him: "The sacrifices which I offered for you on this and this day became piggul" or "those pure objects became impure," [different rules apply]. If [the person is one] whom he trusts, he should rely on his word. If not, according to the letter of the law, his word [need] not be relied upon. One who wishes to be stringent is praiseworthy.

Mishneh Torah, Service on the Day of Atonement

Trans. by Eliyahu Touger, Moznaim Publishing

Chapter 1

1 On the fast day of Yom Kippur, we sacrifice a continuous offering in the morning and in the late afternoon according to the order followed every day. And the additional sacrifices of the day are offered: a bull, a ram, and seven sheep - all these are burnt-offerings - and a sin-offering of a goat whose service is performed outside and which is eaten in the evening.

Besides these additional offerings are sacrificed:

a) a young ox as a sin-offering; it is burnt;

b) a ram as a burnt-offering; both of these are brought by the High Priest;

c) the ram which is brought from communal funds that is mentioned in the passage Acharei Mot; it is the ram mentioned in the Book of Numbers as part of the additional offering; it is called the ram of the people.

In addition, two goats are brought from communal funds: one is offered as a sin-offering and it is burnt and the other is the goat sent to Azazel.

Thus there are a total of fifteen animals sacrificed on this day: two continuous offerings, a bull, two rams and seven sheep; these are all burnt-offerings, two goats as sin-offerings, one offered outside the Temple building which is eaten in the evening and one whose blood is offered in the Temple building and which is burnt, and the bull of the High Priest which is a sin-offering that is burnt.

2 The sacrificial service for all these fifteen animals that are offered on this day may be performed only by the High Priest. This applies both to a High Priest anointed with the oil of anointment or initiated into office by wearing the garments of the High Priest.

If Yom Kippur fell on the Sabbath, even the additional offering of the Sabbath should be sacrificed only by the High Priest. Similarly, all of the other services performed on this day, the offering of the daily incense offering, the kindling of the Menorah's lamps, are all performed by a married High Priest, as Leviticus 16:6 states: "And he shall atone for himself and his household." "His household" refers to his wife.

3 For seven days prior to Yom Kippur, the High Priest departs from his home and stays in his chamber in the Temple. This is a tradition received from Moses our teacher. He is separated from his wife for these seven days, lest his wife become a niddah in the midst of relations and he become impure for seven days and thus unable to perform the Temple service.

A substitute High Priest is prepared so that if this one becomes disqualified, the other may serve instead of him. Whether the disqualifying factor takes place when offering the continuous offering of the morning or the disqualifying factor occurred after he offered his sacrifice, the replacement need not be installed in his office by offering a special sacrifice. Instead, the performance of the sacrificial service of the day installs him. He should begin from the service where the other ceased. After Yom Kippur, the first High Priest resumes his position and the second ceases to serve in this capacity. All of the mitzvot incumbent on a High Priest are incumbent on him, but he does not carry out the service of the High Priest. If he does perform that service, his service is acceptable. When the first dies, he is appointed in his place.

4 During these seven days, he is sprinkled with the ashes of the Red Heifer on the third day after he was separated and on the seventh day which is the day before Yom Kippur, lest he have contracted impurity from a corpse unknowingly. If the third or the seventh day of the sprinkling falls on the Sabbath, the sprinkling is not performed.

5 For all of these seven days, he is trained to perform the Temple service. He casts the blood on the altar, offers the incense, kindles the lamps, and offers the limbs of the continuous offering on the altar's pyre so that he will be familiar with the Temple service.

He is given sages from the elders of the court who read the relevant passages for him and teach him the service necessary to be performed on the holy day and its order. They tell him: "My sir, the High Priest, read by yourself, for perhaps you have forgotten or you never learned this point." On the day before Yom Kippur in the morning, they would have him stand in the eastern gates of the Temple Courtyard and cause bulls, rams, and sheep to pass before him so he would be familiar and accustomed with the Temple service.

6 Throughout these seven days food and drink are not withheld from him. Nevertheless, on the day before Yom Kippur before nightfall, they would not let him eat amply, for indulgence in food leads to sleep. And they would not let him sleep, lest he would have a seminal emission. They would not feed him foods that increase semen, e.g., eggs, warm milk, and the like.

7 In the era of the Second Temple, heresy erupted in Israel, and the Sadducees emerged, may they speedily perish, who did not believe in the Oral Law and who maintained that the incense offering of Yom Kippur would be placed on fire in the Sanctuary outside the Parochet and when its smoke rose up, they would bring it into the Holy of Holies. Their rationale was that they interpreted the Torah's phrase Leviticus 16:2: "For in a cloud I will appear on the Kaporet,"as referring to the cloud of the incense offering. In contrast, according to the Oral Tradition, our Sages learned that the High Priest should place the incense on the coals only in the Holy of Holies, before the Ark, as ibid.:13 states: "And he shall place the incense on the fire before God." Since in the Second Temple era, the Sages suspected that the High Priests would tend towards such heresy, they would have him take an oath on the day preceding Yom Kippur. They would tell him: "My sir, the High Priest, we are agents of the court and you are our agent and an agent of the court, we administer an oath to you in the name of He Who causes His name to dwell in this house that you not deviate at all from what we told you."

The High Priest would turn away and cry because they suspected him of heresy and they would turn away and cry, because they placed suspicion on a person whose conduct was unknown. Maybe he had no such thoughts in his heart.

8 Throughout the entire night of Yom Kippur, the High Priest would sit and expound Torah teachings if he was a sage. If he was a scholar, expositions were delivered in his presence. If he would frequently read the Bible, he would read aloud. If not, they would read for him so that he would not sleep.

What would they read for him? The Holy Scriptures. If he sought to doze off, the young Levites would snap their fingers before him and say: "My sir, the High Priest, stand up and cool your feet on the ground," so that he would not sleep. They would keep him busy until the time for the slaughter of the morning sacrifice arrived. They would not have the sacrificial animal slaughtered until they were certain that dawn had broken lest the animal be slaughtered at night.

1 All of the procedures involving the offering of the continuous offerings and the additional offerings of this day are performed by the High Priest while he is wearing his golden garments. The unique services of this day, by contrast, are performed while he is wearing his white garments.

The unique services of the day are: the offering of the bull brought by the High Priest, the offering of the two goats including the one sent to Azazel, and the offering of the incense in the Holy of Holies. All of these services are performed while wearing white garments.

2 Whenever the High Priest must change his clothes, removing one set of garments and putting on the others, he must immerse himself in a mikveh, as Leviticus 16:23-24] states: "And he shall remove the linen garments...

and wash his flesh with water in a holy place and put on his garments." The High Priest would immerse himself five times and sanctify his hands and feet ten times on that day.

What is implied? At the outset, he would remove the ordinary garments he was wearing and immerse himself. He would ascend, dry himself, put on his golden garments and, sanctify his hands and feet. He would slaughter the continuous offering, offer the daily morning incense, and kindle the lamps of the Menorah. He would then offer the limbs of the continuous offering on the pyre of the altar together with the chavitin offering and the wine libations. Then he would offer the bull and the seven sheep of the additional offering of the day.

Afterwards, he would sanctify his hands and feet and remove his golden garments. He would immerse himself, ascend, dry himself, put on his white garments, and sanctify his hands and feet. He would then perform the unique service of the day, reciting all the confessions, performing the lottery of the goats, sprinkling the blood in the Temple building and offering the incense offering in the Holy of Holies. He would entrust the goat to the one who would send it to Azazel, remove the fats and organs of the bull and the goat that will be burnt and entrust the remainder to the one who will burn them.

Afterwards, he would sanctify his hands and feet and remove his white garments. He would immerse himself, ascend, dry himself, put on his golden garments, and sanctify his hands and feet. He would then offer the sin-offering of a goat of the additional offerings of the day, his ram and the ram of the people. These are all burnt-offerings. He would offer the fats and organs of the bull and the goat that were burnt, and offer the continuous offering of the afternoon.

Afterwards, he would sanctify his hands and feet and remove his golden garments. He would immerse himself, ascend, dry himself, put on his white garments, and sanctify his hands and feet. He would then enter the Holy of Holies and remove the incense-ladle and the fire-pan. Afterwards, he would sanctify his hands and feet and remove his white garments. He would immerse himself, ascend, dry himself, put on his golden garments, and sanctify his hands and feet. He would then offer the daily, afternoon incense offering and kindle the lamps of the Menorah for the afternoon. He would then sanctify his hands and feet, remove his golden garments, put on his ordinary clothes and depart.

3 All of these immersions and the sanctification of his hands and feet were performed in the Temple Courtyard, as the verse states: "And he shall wash his flesh with water in a holy place," with the exception of the first immersion which he is permitted to perform outside the Temple, for it is only to heighten his awareness so that he will remember any old situation that caused him to become impure and separate himself from this impurity by immersing himself with that intent.

If a High Priest did not immerse himself between a change of clothes or did not sanctify his hands and feet between a change of clothes and between one type of service and another and still performed the service, his service is acceptable.

4 If the High Priest was elderly or sick, iron slabs should be made white-hot in fire from the previous day, and on the next day they would be cast into the water to remove its chill. This is permitted because prohibitions defined as shvut need not be observed in the Temple. Alternatively, hot water is mixed with the mikveh water to remove its chill.

5 Every other day, the High Priest sanctifies his hands and feet from the basin like the other priests. On this day, he sanctifies them from a golden pitcher as an expression of honor for him.

Every day, the priests ascend on the eastern side of the ramp and descend on the western side. On this day, they ascend in the center and descend in the center before the High Priest to glorify him.

Every day, the priest who merited to bring the incense offering would gather coals in a silver fire-pan and then shift the fire into a golden fire-pan. On this day, the High Priest gathers the coals with a golden fire pan and enters the Temple Building with it so as not to weary him with additional service. Similarly, the fire-pan used every day holds four kabbin of coals and the one used on this day, three. The one used every day was heavy and the one used this day, light. The one used every day had a short handle and the one used this day, a long one. All of these were measures to make it easier for the High Priest so that he would not weary.

Every day, there were three arrangements of fire on the altar. On this day, there were four. Another arrangement was added in order to glorify the altar and adorn it.

6 The Torah's statements Leviticus 16:17: "And he shall atone for himself, for his household, and for the entire congregation of Israel" is interpreted by the Oral Tradition as referring to the recitation of the confessional.

Thus he recites three confessions on this day:
one for himself first;
one for himself together with the other priests; both of these are recited over the bull which he brings as a sin-offering;
and the third is recited for the entire Jewish people on the goat sent to Azazel. In each of these confessions, he recites God's explicit name three times.
What is implied? He says: "I beseech you, HaShem, I have sinned, transgressed, and committed iniquity before You. I beseech you, HaShem, please atone for the sins, transgressions, and iniquities that I committed..., as ibid.:30 states: "For on that day, he shall atone for you to purify yourselves for all your sins, before God you shall be purified." Thus he mentions God's name three times in his confession. And he does this in each of these confessions.
When he places the lot on the goat of the sin-offering, he proclaims: "A sin-offering for HaShem." Thus he mentions God's explicit name ten times on this day. On all occasions, he recites the name as it is written, pronouncing His explicit name.
Originally, the High Priest would raise his voice when pronouncing God's name. When the number of wanton people increased, he would recite it in a low voice, swallowing it in a sweet chant until even his priestly brethren could not recognize it.

7 When all the priests and the people standing in the Temple Courtyard would hear God's explicit name recited by the High Priest in holiness and purity, they would bow, prostrate themselves, and fall on their faces, saying: "Blessed be the name of His glorious kingdom forever and ever." The rationale is that Deuteronomy 32:3 states: "When I call out the name of God, ascribe greatness to our Lord."

During the three confessions, he would intend to complete the recitation of God's name while the people were blessing, and then he would say: "You shall be purified." It is acceptable to recite the confessional of Yom Kippur and the confessional over the bulls that are burnt throughout the entire day.

Chapter 3

1 There were two lots: upon one was written: "for God," and upon the other "for Azazel." It was acceptable to make them from any substance, whether from wood, from stone, or from metal. There should not, however, be one that is large and the other small, one that is silver and the other, gold. Instead, they should both be the same. Originally, they were made of wood and in the Second Temple era, they made them of gold.

The two lots would be placed in a container that could fit no more than the High Priest's two hands, so that he would insert both of his hands at the same time and remove the lots without having the intent to chose one. This container was not sacred. It was made out of wood and was called a kalpi.

2 Where was the lottery conducted? In the eastern portion of the Temple Courtyard, to the north of the altar. They would place the kalpi there and position the two goats facing the west with their rears to the east. The

3 He would quickly grab the lots from the kalpi and lift up the two lots in his two hands for the two goats. He would open his hands. If the lot "for God" was lifted up in his right hand, the segen would say: "My sir, the High Priest, raise your right hand." If it was lifted up in his left, the head of the clan would say: "My sir, the High Priest, raise your left hand."
He would then place the two lots on the two goats, the lot in his right hand on the goat to his right and the lot in his left, on the goat to his left. If he did not place the lots on the goats, the service was not disqualified, but the mitzvah was lacking. For placing the lots on the goats is a mitzvah that is not an absolute requirement. The selection of the lots, by contrast, is an absolute requirement, even though it is not an act of service. Therefore it is acceptable if a non-priest places the lots on the goats, but it is invalid if a non-priest lifts the lots from the kalpi.

4 He ties a crimson cord weighing two selaim on the head of the goat to be sent to Azazel and positions it in the direction where it will be sent and ties such a cord on the goat to be slaughtered, hanging it over the place where it will be slaughtered. He then slaughters both his sin-offering of a bull and the goat for which the lot "for God" was lifted up.

5 He brings their blood into the Temple Building, where he sprinkles each 43 times. The sprinklings are as follows: First he sprinkles the blood of the bull eight times in the Holy of Holies between the staves of the ark within a handbreadth of the kaporet, as Leviticus 16:14 states: "He shall sprinkle before the kaporet." He should sprinkle once upward and seven times downward. According to the Oral Tradition, we learned that when the above verse mentions the seven sprinklings, the intent is seven in addition to the first sprinkling.

He would count: one, one plus one, one plus two, one plus three, one plus four, one plus five, one plus six, and one plus seven. Why would he count in this manner? So that he would not forget and include the first sprinkling among the seven.

Afterwards, he would sprinkle the blood of the goat between the staves of the ark seven times, once upward and seven downward. He counts the sprinklings as he did for the blood of the bull.

He then goes and sprinkles the blood of the bull eight times in the Sanctuary on the parochet: once upward and seven downward. For with regard to the blood of the bull, the above prooftext states: "on the kaporet and before the kaporet." He counts as he counted within the Holy of Holies. He then sprinkles the blood of the goat eight times on the parochet, once upward and seven downward. For ibid.:15 states with regard to the blood of the goat: "And you shall do with its blood what you did with the blood of the bull." He also counts the sprinklings as he counted them inside the Holy of Holies. While performing all of these sprinklings, he would not intend to sprinkle above or below, but instead would be like one who is lashing.

After the sprinklings, he mixes both bloods - the blood of the bull and the blood of the goat - together and performs four sprinklings - one on each of the corners of the golden altar in the Sanctuary - and seven sprinklings on the center of this altar.

6 For all these 43 sprinklings, he dips his finger in the blood of the sacrificial animal, dipping once for each sprinkling. He should not sprinkle twice from one dipping. He would pour out the remainder of the blood on the western portion of the altar's base.

7 Afterwards, he would send the living goat to be taken to the desert with a person prepared for this task. Anyone is acceptable to take the goat, but the High Priests ordained a fixed practice and they would not let an Israelite take it. Booths were built on the way from Jerusalem to the desert. One person or many people would spend the day in each booth so that they would accompany him from booth to booth. In each booth, they would say: "Here is food and here is water." If he became weak and it was necessary for him to eat, he would eat, but no one ever required this. The people in the last booth would stand at the end of the Sabbath limits and watch his actions from a distance.

What would he do? He would divide the crimson cord tied to the goat's horns.He would tie half to a rock and half between its two horns. He would then push it backward and it would roll over and descend. It would not reach half of the mountain before it was broken into separate limbs, He would then sit in the last booth until nightfall. Sentries would be positioned along the way who wave flags so that the people in the Temple would know that the goat reached the desert.

After sending the goat with the person who would take it to the desert, the High Priest would return to his bull and the goat whose blood he sprinkled inside the Temple Building. He rips open their bellies and removes their fats and organs, places them in a container to offer them on the altar's pyre. He cuts up the remainder of their meat into large pieces that are still connected like a net. He does not separate them and he sends them with other persons to take them out to the place where they are burnt. There they are cut up together with their hide, as we explained.

8 After the goat reached the desert, the High Priest would go out to the Women's Courtyard to read from the Torah. While he would read, the bull and the goat were burnt in the ash-pile. Thus one who sees the High Priest reading does not see the bull and the goat being burnt. They may be burnt by a non-priest, as we explained.

9 This reading is not part of the Temple service. Therefore if the High Priest desires to read in his own ordinary white garments he may. If he desires to read while wearing his priestly white garments, he may. For the priestly garments were made with the intent that benefit could be derived from them at a time when one is not involved in sacrificial service, as we explained.

10 How would he read? He would sit in the Women's Courtyard while all the people stand in front of him. The attendant of the synagogue takes the Torah scroll and gives it to the head of the synagogue. The head of the synagogue gives it to the segen and the segen gives it to the High Priest.
The High Priest stands and accepts it and stands and reads the passage

Acharei Mot and ach bieasor which is in the passage of the festive offerings until the conclusion of the matter. He then roles close the Torah scroll and places it in his bosom and declares: "More than I have read for you is written here." He then reads the passage ubieasor in the Book of Numbers until its conclusion by heart.

Why does he read it by heart? Because we do not roll a Torah scroll from passage to passage in front of a congregation. Why does he not read it from another scroll? Because one person should not read from two Torah scrolls, because this will cast aspersions on the validity of the first.

11 When he reads, he recites a blessing before the reading and afterwards as one recites the blessing for the Torah reading in a synagogue. Afterwards, he adds seven blessings, which are retzei, modim, selach lanu avinu ki chatanu, he concludes the latter blessing: "Blessed are You, God, Who forgives the sins of His people Israel with mercy." Thus three blessings are recited as ordained.

He then recites a separate blessing for the Temple. Its theme is that the Temple should continue standing with the Divine Presence in it. He concludes it: "Blessed are You, God, Who dwells in Zion."

He then recites a separate blessing for the Jewish people. Its theme is that God should deliver the Jewish people and sovereignty should not depart from them. He concludes it: "Blessed are You, God, Who chooses Israel."

He then recites a separate blessing for the priests. Its theme is that the Omnipresent should find favor in their deeds and service and bless them. He concludes it: "Blessed are You, God, Who sanctifies the priests."

He then recites prayers, supplication, praises, and requests according to his proficiency and concludes "God, deliver Your nation Israel, for Your nation Israel is in need of salvation. Blessed are You, God, Who heeds prayer."

Chapter 4

1 The order of all the practices carried out on this day is the following: At midnight, the lottery is held for the removal of the ashes of the altar. The wood for the altar is arranged and the ashes are removed from the altar as is done each day according to the order we explained until they reach the slaughter of the continuous offering.

When they reach the slaughter of the continuous offering, a linen sheet is spread out between the High Priest and the people. Why is linen used? So that all will realize that the special service of the day is performed in linen garments. The High Priest removes his ordinary garments, immerses himself in the mikveh, puts on his golden garments, and sanctifies his hands and feet. He slits the majority of the two signs for kosher slaughter on the animal sacrificed as the continuous offering, but allows another person to complete the slaughter. He receives the blood and casts it on the altar as is commanded.

Afterwards, he enters the Temple Sanctuary and offers the morning incense-offering and lights the lamps of the Menorah. He offers the limbs of the continuous offering and the chavitin-offering on the altar's pyre and pours the libations according to the order in which the continuous offering is brought every day, as we explained. After the continuous offering, he offers the bull and the seven sheep of the additional offering of the day.

Afterwards, he sanctifies his hands and feet and removes his golden garments. He immerses himself, puts on his white garments, and sanctifies his hands and feet. He approaches his bull. The bull was standing between the Entrance Hall and the altar with its head to the south, but facing the west. The High Priest would stand to the east and face the west. He would place his two hands on the head of the bull and recite the confessional. He would say: "I beseech You, O God. I have sinned, transgressed, and committed iniquity, both I and my household. I beseech You, O God, atone for the sins, transgressions, and iniquities that I and my household have committed, as it is written in the Torah of Moses Your servant Leviticus 16:30: 'For on that day, he shall atone for you to purify yourselves for all their sins, before God you shall be purified.'

Afterwards, he performs the lottery for the two goats. He ties a crimson cord on the head of the goat to be sent to Azazel and positions it in the direction where it will be sent and ties such a cord on the goat to be slaughtered, hanging it over the place where it will be slaughtered. He approaches his bull a second time and places both his hands on its head and recites a second confessional. He would say: "I beseech You, O God. I have sinned, transgressed, and committed iniquity, I, my household, and the descendants of Aaron, Your holy nation. I beseech You, O God, atone for the sins, transgressions, and iniquities that I, my household, and the descendants of Aaron, Your holy nation, have committed, as it is written in the Torah of Moses Your servant Leviticus 16:30: 'For on that day.... '

Afterwards, he slaughters the bull and receives its blood. He gives it to another priest to stir so that it will not coagulate. He places it on the fourth projection outside the Temple Building. He takes the fire pan and uses it to remove burning coals from the altar from those close to the western side, for ibid.:12 speaks of taking coals "from the altar before God." He places it on the projection in the Temple Courtyard. The kaf is taken out for him and a container filled with incense that is extremely fine. He would take a full handful of incense. The handfuls of incense should not be pressed closely to his hand, nor piled up upon it, but rather overlapping it slightly. A High Priest with large hands should take large handfuls; one with small hands, smaller handfuls. He should place the incense in the kaf.

We already explained, that carrying a sacrificial substance in one's left hand disqualifies it with regard to the blood of the sacrificial animals and other services. Hence, it would be appropriate that he should carry the firepan in his left hand and the kaf with the incense in his right hand. Nevertheless, because of the weight of the firepan - and because it is hot - he would not be able to carry it with his left hand until he reached the Holy Ark. Therefore he should carry the firepan in his right hand and the kaf with the incense in his left.

He proceeds through the Sanctuary until he reaches the Holy of Holies. He finds the Parochet folded over. He proceeds into the Holy of Holies until he reaches the Holy Ark. When he reaches the ark, he places the firepan down between the two staves. In the Second Temple, when there was no ark, he would place it on the Foundation Stone. He would hold the edge of the kaf with his fingertips or with his teeth and push the incense with his thumb into his hand until he has a full handful as before. This was one of the difficult tasks in the Temple.

He would pile the incense over the coals with his hands on the inner portion of the firepan so that the incense would be close to the Ark and far from his face so that he would not be burnt. He waits there until the entire chamber fills up with smoke and then departs.

He walks backwards little by little with his face to the Holy of Holies and his back to the Sanctuary until he departs from within the parochet. He recites a short prayer in the Sanctuary so as not to scare the people, lest they say: "He died in the Sanctuary." He would pray in this manner: "May it be Your will, God, our Lord, that if this year was to be arid, it should be rainy. May the sovereignty not depart from the House of Judah. May Your nation Israel not be in need of sustenance. And may You not accept the prayers of wayfarers."

2 When the incense-offering was brought in the Holy of Holies, all of the people would withdraw from the Sanctuary alone. They would not withdraw from the area between the Entrance Hall and the altar, for it is not necessary to depart from between the Entrance Hall and the altar except when bringing the daily incense-offering and when blood is being presented in the Sanctuary, as we explained in Hilchot Temidim.

Afterwards, he takes the blood of the bull from the priest who was stirring it and takes it into the Holy of Holies. He sprinkles it eight times between the staves of the Ark. He departs and places it down in the Sanctuary on a golden base located there. He then departs from the Sanctuary and slaughters the goat, receives its blood, and brings it into the Holy of Holies. He sprinkles it eight times between the staves of the Ark. He then departs and places it down on a second gold base in the Sanctuary.

Afterwards, he lifts up the blood of the bull from the base and sprinkles it on the parochet opposite the ark eight times. He puts down the blood of the bull and picks up the blood of the goat and sprinkles it on the parochet opposite the ark eight times.

Afterwards, he pours the blood of the bull into the blood of the goat and pours the entire mixture into the container where the blood of the bull had been held so that they will be mixed thoroughly and stands before the golden altar, between the Menorah and the golden altar. He begins to apply the mixture of blood on the corners of the golden altar. He proceeds to circle it, sprinkling the blood on its corners from the outside as he proceeds.

He begins from the northeast corner, proceeds to the northwest, the southwest, and then to the southeast. In all instances, he applies the blood from below upward with the exception of the last application in which instance, the corner is directly before him. Hence he applies the blood from above downward so that his garments will not become soiled. He then moves the coals and the ashes of the Golden Altar back and forth until its golden surface is revealed. He applies the blood of the mixture on the pure golden surface of the altar seven times on its southern side, the place where he completed applying the blood to the corners. He then departs from the Sanctuary and pours the remainder of the blood on the west base of the outer altar.

Afterwards, he approaches the goat to be sent to Azazel. He places his two hands on its head and recites the confessional, saying: "I beseech You, O God. Your nation, the House of Israel, have sinned, transgressed, and committed iniquity. I beseech You, O God, atone for the sins, transgressions, and iniquities that Your nation, the House of Israel, have committed, as it is written in the Torah of Moses Your servant Leviticus 16:30: 'For on that day, he will atone for you.... ' Afterwards, he sends the goat to the desert.

He removes the fats and the organs from the bull and the goat that were slaughtered and whose blood was brought within the Temple Building and places them in a vessel. He sends the remainder to the ash pile to be burnt. He then goes out to the Women's Courtyard and reads the Torah there after the goat reaches the desert.

He then sanctifies his hands and feet, removes his white garments, immerses himself, puts on his golden garments, and sanctifies his hands and feet. He sacrifices the goat that is offered outside that is one of the additional offerings of the day and sacrifices his ram and the ram of the people, as ibid.:24 states: "And he goes out and offers his burnt-offering and the burnt-offering of the people." He offers the fats and organs of the bull and the goat which are burnt and offers the afternoon continuous offering.

Afterwards, he sanctifies his hands and feet, removes his golden garments, immerses himself, puts on his white garments, and sanctifies his hands and feet. He enters the Holy of Holies and removes the kaf and the firepan.

Afterwards, he sanctifies his hands and feet, removes his white garments, immerses himself, puts on his golden garments, and sanctifies his hands and feet. He offers the afternoon incense-offering and kindles the lamps of the Menorah for the evening as on other days. He then sanctifies his hands and feet, removes his golden garments, puts on his own clothes and goes home. All of the people accompany him to his home. He would make a festive celebration because he departed from the holy place in peace.

1 All of the services which the High Priest performs while wearing the white garments inside the Temple Building must be performed in the order in which we mentioned. If he performed one of them before another, his acts are of no consequence.

2 If the High Priest took a handful of incense before he slaughtered the bull, his act is of no consequence. Although taking the handful of incense is performed in the Courtyard, it is necessary for service performed inside the Temple Building. Similarly, if the goat was slaughtered before the blood of the bull was presented inside the Holy of Holies, the act is of no consequence. Although the slaughter is performed in the Temple Courtyard, its blood is brought within the Temple Building.

3 If the ram and the goat from the additional sacrifices of the day were offered before the service of the day in the Holy of Holies was performed, they are of no consequence.

4 If the blood of the goat was presented in the Holy of Holies before the blood of the bull, i.e., before the High Priest completes its service, he should sprinkle the blood of the bull as commanded. Afterwards, he should bring another goat, slaughter it, and sprinkle its blood as commanded. The first goat is disqualified.

If, when sprinkling the blood on the parochet in the Sanctuary, he sprinkled the blood of the goat before the blood of the bull, he should sprinkle the blood of the goat a second time after the blood of the bull.

5 If the blood of the goat spilled before he completed presenting it in the Holy of Holies, he should bring other blood and begin sprinkling it anew in the Holy of Holies.

6 If he completed the presentation of the blood in the Holy of Holies and began presenting it in the Sanctuary and the blood was spilled before he completed them, he should bring other blood and begin from the first sprinklings in the Sanctuary.

7 If he completed the first part of the presentation of the blood in the Sanctuary and began to apply the blood to the Golden Altar and the blood spilled before the applications were completed, he should bring other blood and begin from the first applications to the altar. For each set of presentations of blood represents a separate phase of atonement.

8 If he completed the application of the blood to the altar and then the blood spilled, he does not have to bring other blood, for pouring the remainder of the blood on the outer altar is not a binding requirement. If the blood of the bull was spilled before he completed all of the presentations, he should bring another bull and take a handful of incense before slaughtering the bull. He should offer the incense, then bring the blood of the second bull and sprinkle its blood.

9 The only one which causes the priests and their clothes to become impure and which is burnt in the ashpile is the last bull with which the atonement was completed.

10 If the blood of the bull became mixed with the blood of the goat before the High Priest completed the sprinklings, he should sprinkle from the mixture once upward and seven times downward for the sake of the bull and then sprinkle from the mixture once upward and seven times downward for the sake of the goat. If they became mixed together before the last sprinkling, he should sprinkle once downward for the sake of the bull and then sprinkle once upward and seven times downward for the sake of the goat.

11 If the cups containing the blood of the bull and the blood of the goat become mixed together and the High Priest does not know which is the cup containing the blood of the bull and which is the cup containing the blood of the goat, he should sprinkle from one of them once upward and seven times downward and then sprinkle from the second one, once upward and seven times downward. And then he sprinkles again from the blood in the first cup, once upward and seven times downward. Thus regardless he will have sprinkled from the blood of the bull and afterwards, from the blood of the goat.

12 The following rules apply when the High Priest received the blood of the bull in two cups and the blood of the goat in two cups and some of the cups became mixed together and it was not known which of the cups contained the blood of the bull and which, the blood of the goat. He should perform all the sprinklings as required by law from the cups that were not mixed together. He should then pour the remainder of the blood from the cups from which he sprinkled on the base of the altar, as required. The cups that were mixed together should be poured into the drainage channel.

13 Even though the High Priest would purchase the bull sacrificed on Yom Kippur from his own resources, as implied by Leviticus 16:6: "The bull for the sin-offering that is his," the Omnipresent nullified his ownership of it in favor of all of his priestly brethren. For if they did not have a share of it, they could not derive atonement through its sacrifice.

Accordingly, if the High Priest died before the bull was slaughtered, the priest who assumes his position does not bring a different bull. Instead, he slaughters the first one. It is not considered a sin-offering whose owners have died which is itself consigned to death, for a sin-offering owned by many is never consigned to death.

If the High Priest slaughtered the bull, but died before sprinkling its blood to gain atonement, the second priest enters the Temple with this blood and performs the sprinkling that brings atonement.

14 The desired manner of performing the mitzvah is that the two goats of Yom Kippur should be alike with regard to their appearance, their size, and their worth. They should be purchased at the same time. Nevertheless, even if they were not alike, they were acceptable. Similarly, if one was purchased on one day and the other on the following day, it is acceptable.

15 The following rules apply if one of these goats die. If it dies before the lottery was held, he should take another one as a pair for the remaining one. If it died after the lottery, he should bring two new goats and conduct the lottery again as he did originally.

He sees which one died. If it was the one to be sacrificed to G-d, he says: "This one for which the lot for God was chosen should replace it." If the dead goat was the one to be sent to Azazel, he says: "This one for which the lot for Azazel was chosen should replace it." The other one of the pair from which the second lottery was made should be left to pasture until it receives a disqualifying blemish. Then it should be sold and the proceeds used for freewill offerings. This course of action is taken, because a communal sin-offering is never consigned to death.

16 When the bull and/or the goat to be offered on Yom Kippur became lost, others were separated in their stead and offered and then the first ones were found, those first ones should pasture until they contract a disqualifying blemish. Afterwards, they should be redeemed and the proceeds used for freewill offerings. Similarly, if the first ones were found before the second were offered, the first ones should be sacrificed. The second ones should be allowed to pasture until they contract a disqualifying blemish. Afterwards, they should be redeemed and the proceeds used for freewill offerings. The rationale for these rulings is that a communal sin-offering is never consigned to death.

17 A disqualifying blemish - even a temporary blemish - renders the goat sent to Azazel unfit. Similarly, if it becomes unfit to be sacrificed because of a time factor, it is disqualified. For example, its mother was slaughtered to feed a sick person on Yom Kippur. Although the pertinent prohibition involves "slaughtering" an animal and its offspring on the same day, pushing the goat to Azazel is equivalent to slaughtering it.

18 If the goat was treifah, it is unacceptable, for Leviticus 16:10 states: "It shall stand alive."

19 If the goat becomes sick and is unable to walk, the one taking it to Azazel should carry it on his shoulders, even on the Sabbath.

20 If the one designated to take it becomes sick, it should be sent with another person.

21 If the one designated to take it becomes impure, he should enter the Temple take it and depart, as Leviticus 16:21 states: "to the desert in the hands of a designated person." Implied is that it should be sent in the hands of the one designated even if he became ritually impure.

22 If that person pushed the goat off the cliff and it did not die, he should descend after it and kill it with any article that will serve that purpose. It is permitted to benefit from the limbs of this goat.

23 If the roof of the Temple Building was opened, the High Priest should not sprinkle the blood of the bull and the blood of the goat, because ibid.:17 states: "in the Tent of Meeting."

24 When the inner altar had not been dedicated by the offering of incense previously, the High Priest should not sprinkle the blood upon it, as ibid. 4:7 states: "the altar of the incense offering."

25 If the incense offering was lacking one of its spices or the smoke-raising herb, the High Priest is liable for death, as Leviticus 16:2 states: "He shall not die, because in a cloud I will appear on the kaporet." Similarly, he is liable for death for entering the Holy of Holies while he is not performing a mitzvah. Therefore, if he transgressed inadvertently by entering, but purposely offered an unacceptable incense offering or offered a complete incense offering together with the one that was lacking, he is liable for death.

26 If he offered an olive-sized portion of the incense offering to be offered in the Holy of Holies in the Sanctuary, he is liable for death.

27 Taking a handful of incense is considered as an element of the Temple service and improper thoughts can disqualify it. Similarly, the scooping of the coals for the incense offering can be disqualified by improper thoughts, for performance of the preparatory acts necessary to bring a sacrifice is considered as bringing the sacrifice itself.

28 There is doubt regarding the proper ruling in all of the following incidents:

a) he collected the incense with his fingertips, with the sides of his hands, or scooped from below upward;

b) he gathered the incense with both hands and then brought them together;

c) the incense was scattered on the earth from his hand and he collected it;

d) a colleague gathered the incense and put it in his hands; or

e) a High Priest collected the incense and died and his replacement entered the Holy of Holies with the incense collected by the first.

In all these instances, as an initial preference, he should not offer such incense. If he did, it is acceptable.

Chapter 1

1 It is forbidden for an ordinary person to benefit from articles sanctified unto God, whether they are entities that are offered on the altar or articles consecrated for the improvement of the Temple. Anyone who derives a perutah' worth of benefit from an article sanctified unto God, is considered as having misappropriated a consecrated article.

2 The concept of me'ilah, misappropriating consecrated articles, does not apply to sacrificial entities from the sacrifices that are permitted to be eaten, e.g., the meat of sin-offerings and guilt-offerings after their blood was cast on the altar, the two breads after the blood of the two sheep was cast on the altar. This applies even if these or the like are eaten by a non-priest. Since it is permitted for some people to benefit from them, anyone who benefits from them is not considered to have misappropriated consecrated articles. Even if they were disqualified and prohibited to be eaten, since there is a time when they are permitted to be eaten, one is not liable for me'ilah.

3 Anyone who purposely misappropriates consecrated articles is liable for lashes and must pay the value he decreased the value of the sacred articles. The warning against me'ilah is derived from Deuteronomy 12:17: "You may not partake of the tithes of your grain... your pledges... in your outlying cities." According to the Oral Tradition, we learned that this is a warning against one who partakes of the meat of a burnt-offering for it must be offered entirely to God. The same applies to all other consecrated articles that are dedicated to God alone, whether something consecrated for the altar or for the improvement of the Temple. If one derives a perutah's worth of benefit, he is liable for lashes. If he misappropriated a consecrated article unknowingly, he must make restitution for the benefit he received and add a fifth. Also, he must bring a ram worth two selaim and have it sacrificed as a guilt-offering. This brings atonement for him and it is called: "the guilt-offering for misappropriation,] as Leviticus 5:15-16 states "And he sinned inadvertently, misappropriating what was consecrated unto God and he shall bring his guilt-offering... and he should make restitution for what he misappropriated from the consecrated articles, adding a fifth." Paying the principal with the additional fifth and bringing the sacrifice is a positive commandment.

4 Payment of the principal and bringing the guilt-offering are essential for the atonement; payment of the additional fifth is not essential. This is derived from the prooftext that speaks of: "the ram of the asham." Our Sages interpreted the term asham as referring to the principal and stated: The ram and the payment of the principal are fundamental requirements. The additional fifth is not a fundamental requirement.

5 If the person brought the guilt-offering before he made restitution for the principal, he did not fulfill his obligation. If one is in doubt whether he derived benefit from a consecrated article or not, he is exempt from making restitution and bringing a sacrifice.

The additional fifth is considered as a consecrated article itself. If one benefits from it, he should add a fifth to the fifth. We have already explained several times that the fifth is one fourth of the principal so that the principal and the fifth will be five units.

6 There are articles for which one is not liable for me'ilah according to Scriptural Law, but from which it is forbidden to benefit according to Rabbinic decree. A person who derives benefit from them must only make restitution for the principal. He need not add a fifth, nor must he bring a guilt-offering.

7 All of the sacrifices offered on the altar - whether sacrifices of the highest degree of sanctity or sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity - are forbidden to be shorn and it is forbidden to perform work with them, as Deuteronomy 15:19 states: "Do not perform work with the firstborn of your oxen and do not shear the firstborn of your sheep." The same applies to all other sacrificial animals. One who shears an ox or works with a sheep is liable for lashes according to Scriptural Law.

One who pulls out hair is not considered as if he shears it. It appears to me that one is not liable unless he shears double the width of a sit. This prohibition should not be more severe than the prohibition against shearing on the Sabbath.

8 When there is a doubt whether an animal is consecrated, e.g., an animal concerning which there is a question whether it is a firstborn or the like, it is forbidden to shear it or work with it, but one who shears it or works with it, is not liable for lashes.

9 When a sacrificial animal contracted a physical blemish and it was redeemed as we explained, it is not permitted to shear it or to work with it. The prohibitions are still in effect until it is slaughtered. If it was slaughtered after it was redeemed, it is permitted to partake of it.

When does the above apply? When the animal was consecrated before it contracted a permanent blemish or it contracted a temporary blemish before it was consecrated. If, however, one consecrated an animal with a permanent physical blemish as a sacrifice for the altar, it is only forbidden to be shorn and for work to be performed with it according to Rabbinic Law. If it is redeemed, it is like an ordinary animal in all regards and like an ordinary animal, it may be shorn and work may be performed with it. The only exceptions to this principle are a firstborn animal and one separated as the tithes. In these instances, the holiness falls on their physical bodies even if at the outset they have permanent physical blemishes. They are never considered as ordinary animals entirely and it is always forbidden to shear them or perform work with them.

It is forbidden to mate an animal that is a firstborn or a sacrificial animal that was disqualified.

10 It is permitted, even as an initial preference, to pull off hair from a sacrificial animal in order to show a physical blemish to an expert. It is forbidden to benefit from the hair that was pulled off or which fell from a consecrated animal, a firstborn animal, or one designated as the tithes, even after it was redeemed and slaughtered because of its blemish. This is a decree lest the sacrifice of such an animal be delayed, because it does not come to bring about atonement.

It is, by contrast, permitted to benefit from wool which fell from an animal designated as a sin-offering or a guilt-offering after it has been redeemed and slaughtered because of a physical blemish. The rationale is that since these offerings come to bring about atonement, the owners will not delay their sacrifice. There is an unresolved doubt if it is permitted to benefit from wool that was pulled off from a burnt-offering.

It is permitted to benefit from any wool that becomes pulled off from sacrificial animals after they have contracted a blemish, for it was not pulled off intentionally. The only exception is the wool of a firstborn animal and one designated as a tithe. In those instances, it is forbidden to benefit from wool even if it was pulled off from such an animal after it contracted a blemish.

11 When a person slaughters a firstborn or another consecrated animal, he may pull off the wool from either side to make a place for the knife, provided he does not remove the wool from its place.

12 It is forbidden to shear and perform work with animals consecrated for the improvement of the Temple according to Rabbinic decree. According to Scriptural Law, they are not forbidden. Therefore one who shears such animals or performs work with them is not liable for lashes. He does, however, receive stripes for rebellious conduct.

13 When one consecrates a fetus for the altar, it is forbidden to perform work with its mother according to Rabbinic decree. The rationale for this decree is that work weakens the fetus. It is, however, permitted to shear the mother, because this does not harm the fetus.

When one consecrates one limb of an animal - whether for the improvement of the Temple or for the altar - there is an unresolved doubt whether or not the entire animal is forbidden to be sheared or for work to be performed with it. Therefore, if one performs such an activity, he is not liable for lashes.

1 The prohibition against me'ilah does not apply to sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity until the blood has been cast on the altar. If the blood has been cast on the altar, the prohibition against me'ilah applies to the fats and organs until they are taken to the ash heap, for they are designated for the altar's pyre. The prohibition against me'ilah does not apply to an entity that is to be eaten, as explained.

Even if the fats and the organs were brought to the altar before the blood was cast upon it, the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply until the blood is cast. If the fats and the organs were taken outside the Temple Courtyard before the blood was cast, the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply until the blood is cast. If the blood was cast while they were outside and they had not been brought back in, the prohibition against me'ilah does apply, for casting the blood has an effect on the status of a sacrifice, whether it leads to a lenient ruling or a stringent one.

2 The prohibition against me'ilah applies to all the sacrifices of the most sacred order from the time they were consecrated until the blood is cast upon the altar. Once the blood is cast, the prohibition against me'ilah applies to the portions of them that are to be consumed entirely by the altar's pyre until they are burnt and taken to the ash heap. The prohibition against me'ilah does not apply to the portions that are to be eaten, as explained.

3 What is implied? The prohibition against me'ilah applies to a burnt-offering - both of fowl and of an animal, the handful of meal and the frankincense from a meal-offering, a meal-offering of priests, the chavitin offering of the High Priest, and the meal-offering of the accompanying offerings, from the time they were consecrated until they were taken out to the ash heap after being burnt on the altar.

4 Similarly, the prohibition against me'ilah applies to the bull and the goats that are burnt from the time they were consecrated until they are burnt - and their burning is complete - in the ash heap and their meat is burnt thoroughly, in their entirety. Before it is burnt thoroughly, the prohibition against me'ilah applies to it even though it is in the ash heap.

5 Similarly, the prohibition against me'ilah applies to the red heifer from the time it was consecrated until it was reduced to ash. Even though its status is that of an entity consecrated for the improvement of the Temple, concerning it, Numbers 19:9 states: "It is a sin-offering." It is one of the conditions established by the court that a person does not violate the prohibition against me'ilah with the ashes of the red heifer.

6 The prohibition against me'ilah applies to all the following: sin-offerings of animals, guilt-offerings, and communal peace-offerings from the time they were consecrated until the blood is cast on the altar. Once the blood is cast, the prohibition against me'ilah applies to their organs and fats until they are taken to the ash heap. The prohibition against me'ilah does not apply to the meat.

Similarly, the prohibition against me'ilah applies to a sin-offering of fowl from the time it is consecrated until its blood is presented on the altar. After its blood was presented, the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply. It is, however, forbidden to benefit from its murah and its feathers. If one benefits from them after the blood is presented, he does not violate the prohibition against me'ilah.

7 The prohibition against me'ilah applies to meal-offerings from the time they were consecrated, even though they have not become consecrated by being placed in a sacred utensil, until the handful of meal is offered on the altar's pyre. Once the handful is offered, the remainder of the offering is permitted to be eaten. If the remainder of the offering becomes disqualified or lacking in substance and then the handful is offered, a question arises. Since offering the handful does not cause the remainder to be permitted to be eaten in such a situation, there is an unresolved doubt if the meal-offering is absolved from the prohibition against me'ilah or not.

8 The prohibition against me'ilah applies to the showbread from the time it was consecrated - even though it was not baked - until the bowls of frankincense are offered on the altar's pyre. Once the bowls of frankincense were offered, it is permitted to be eaten. Similarly, the prohibition against me'ilah applies to the two loaves of Shavuot from the time they were consecrated, even before they were baked, until the blood of the sheep is cast on the altar. After the blood of the sheep was cast, they are permitted to be eaten.

9 The prohibition against me'ilah applies to the libations once they have been consecrated. Once they are poured and descend to the shittin,the prohibition against me'ilah no longer applies.
As long as the water which is poured as a libation on the Sukkot holiday is in the golden jug, benefit should not be derived from it, but one who benefits is not liable for me'ilah. If it was placed in the pitcher, the prohibition against me'ilah applies to it in its entirety, for it is one of the libations.

10 The prohibition against me'ilah applies to the log of oil brought by a person afflicted by tzara'at from the time that it was consecrated in a sacred vessel until the blood of the guilt offering was cast on the altar. Once the blood of the guilt-offering was cast, one should not benefit from it until the placements are made from it, but the prohibition against me'ilah no longer applies. After the placements were made, it is permitted for the priests to partake of the remainder of the oil like the meat of sin-offerings and guilt-offerings.

11 The prohibition against me'ilah does not apply to any of the blood of sacrificial animals that were slaughtered whether before atonement is attained or after atonement is attained until it flows out to the Kidron River. Once it flows out to the Kidron River, the prohibition against me'ilah applies to it because it was sold as fertilizer for gardens and the proceeds of the sale are consecrated. If, however, one lets the blood of a consecrated animal, it is forbidden to benefit from that blood and the prohibition of me'ilah applies to it. Since the animal cannot exist without blood, it is considered as its body.

12 With regard to the bones, the giddim, the horns, and the hoofs which were separated from sacrificial animals of the highest degree of sanctity. The prohibition against me'ilah applies to those separated before the blood was cast on the altar, but not to those which were separated after the blood was cast.

With regard to the bones of a burnt-offering that were separated before the blood was cast on the altar, once the blood is cast, the prohibition no longer applies. The casting of the blood causes them to be permitted. If they were separated after the blood was cast, the prohibition against me'ilah applies to them forever.

When the bones of a burnt-offering fly off the altar before midnight, the prohibition against me'ilah applies. After midnight, that prohibition no longer applies even though they flew off before midnight. The rationale is that since midnight arrived, all of the bones are considered as if they have been consumed by fire and as if they have been reduced to ash.

13 When a coal flies off the altar - whether before midnight or after midnight - it is forbidden to benefit from it, but the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply. The prohibition against me'ilah applies to a coal that was consecrated for the improvement of the Temple. It is forbidden to benefit from a flame, but the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply to it.

14 The prohibition against me'ilah applies to the ashes of the outer altar, both before the ash is removed from the altar and after it was removed.

15 With regard to the ashes of the inner altar and the ashes of the Menorah, we may not benefit from them, but the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply to them.

16 Whenever there is an animal that was consecrated for a sacrifice of the most sacred order that contracted a disqualifying physical blemish - whether the blemish preceded its consecration or came afterwards - the prohibition against me'ilah applies until it is redeemed. This even applies if the animal is unable to be sacrificed because of a time factor.

A different law applies with regard to turtle-doves whose time to be offered has not arrived and young doves whose time to be offered has passed that were consecrated to be offered on the altar. Even though it is forbidden to benefit from them, one who derives benefit has not violated the prohibition against me'ilah. The rationale is that since they are not fit to be redeemed, they are comparable to sin-offerings consigned to death. Therefore the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply to them.

1 When animals consecrated as sacrifices for the altar die, the prohibition against me'ilah no longer applies to their carcasses according to Scriptural Law. Nevertheless, the prohibition continues to apply according to Rabbinic Law. Similarly, if sacrificial animals will become disqualified because of matters that disqualify such animals as we have already explained, the prohibition against me'ilah continues to apply according to Rabbinic decree.

When does the above apply? When there was no time that the sacrificial animal could be eaten by the priests. Different rules apply, however, if animals consecrated as sacrifices of the highest order of sanctity which are intended to be eaten had a time when they were permitted and then disqualified and forbidden to be eaten. Since they were permitted at a given time, the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply to those entities that are fit to be eaten, as we explained.

What is implied? When sacrifices of the highest order of sanctity were disqualified before their blood was presented on the altar according to law, e.g., they were slaughtered in the southern portion of the Temple Courtyard even though the blood was received in the north, they were slaughtered in the north, but the blood was received in the south, they were slaughtered during the day and the blood was cast on the altar at night, they were slaughtered at night, but the blood was cast during the day, they were offered with a disqualifying intent concerning time or place, the blood was received by unacceptable persons even though it was cast by acceptable ones, it was cast by unacceptable persons even though it was received by acceptable ones, all of the blood and the meat were taken out of the Temple Courtyard before the blood was cast, or the blood remained overnight - in all these instances, the principle of me'ilah applies forever, because there was never a time when these offerings were permitted to be eaten.

If, however, the blood reached the altar as commanded, but afterwards the meat or the portions to be offered on the altar remained overnight, or the meat or those portions became impure, or were taken outside the Temple Courtyard, or a portion of the meat was taken outside before the blood was cast, in all these instances and the like, the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply to the remainder of the meat, because there was a time when it was permitted to be eaten, as explained above.

2 If persons who are unacceptable received a portion of the blood and cast it on the altar and then others who are acceptable to perform Temple service received the remainder of the animal's lifeblood and cast it on the altar, the prohibition against me'ilah no longer applies to the meat. The rationale is that the sacrifice is acceptable, because the unacceptable persons do not cause the remainder of the lifeblood to be considered as remnants unless he is unacceptable due to ritual impurity. In that instance, since he is fit for communal Temple service, he causes the remainder of the blood to be considered as remnants.

3 What is implied? If an impure priest received the blood and cast it on the altar, even if afterwards an acceptable person received the remainder of the life blood and cast it on the altar, this sacrificial animal never had a time when its meat was permitted and the prohibition of me'ilah applies to the meat in its entirety. The rationale is that this blood is considered as "remnants" and the casting of "remnants" on the altar is not effective.

We have already explained that the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply to sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity except to the fats and organs after the blood is cast on the altar, provided the casting is effective. If, however, sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity have been disqualified as piggul, the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply to their fats and organs even though the blood has been cast. Similarly, if the blood was taken outside the Temple Courtyard, the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply to their fats and organs even though it was brought back in and cast on the altar.

4 It is forbidden to benefit from any of the sin-offerings that are consigned to death, e.g., the offspring of a sin-offering, an animal onto which its holiness was transferred, or the like. If one benefits, he does not violate the prohibition against me'ilah.

5 The prohibition against me'ilah applies to all the sin-offerings which should be allowed to pasture until they contract a blemish until they are redeemed.

6 The following laws apply if one set aside his sin-offering, it was lost, he set aside another one instead of it, afterwards, the first one was found, and they are both present. If both of them were slaughtered at the same time and the blood of one of them was cast, the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply, neither to the meat whose blood was cast on the altar, nor to the meat of the other even though the second one is not fit to be eaten. The rationale is that if one desires one may cast the blood of this one or the other one. If, however, one slaughtered one after the other, the blood of the first one is not effective with regard to the other, even after it is cast on the altar, for there was no time that it was fit for its meat to be permitted.

7 The prohibition against me'ilah applies to all sin-offerings of fowl or burnt-offerings of fowl that were disqualified because of a deviation in the way they should have been offered or in the place where they were offered. An exception is a burnt-offering of a fowl on which melikah was performed on the lower half of the altar for the sake of a sin-offering. Although it did not fulfill the obligation of the owners, the prohibition of me'ilah does not apply, since he changed its intent, the place where it was offered, and the manner in which it was offered to a type of sacrifice to which the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply.

8 When a meal-offering was brought in a manner causing it to be deemed piggul or it was brought with a disqualifying intent regarding the place - and similarly, if the two breads of Shavuot or the showbread were brought in a manner causing them to be deemed piggul or were brought with a disqualifying intent regarding the place, the prohibition against me'ilah applies to them, because there was never a time when they were permitted to be eaten.

9 Similarly, if the handful of meal taken from a meal-offering was taken outside the Temple Courtyard or if it remained overnight, the prohibition against me'ilah applies to the remainder, because there was never a time when it was permitted to be eaten.

If, however, the handful became impure and it was offered on the altar's pyre, the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply to the remainder, because the High Priest's forehead plate brings about acceptance for the handful when it becomes impure, but not when it remained overnight or was taken outside the Courtyard.

When the remainder of the meal-offering was taken out or became impure and afterwards, the handful was offered on the altar's pyre, even though the remainder is forbidden to be eaten, the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply to it, for the handful was offered as commanded,

10 When one benefits from any of the sacrifices of the highest degree of sanctity before their blood is cast on the altar or from the fats and organs of the sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity even after their blood has been cast, one derives benefit from a burnt-offering, or from the handful of meal, the frankincense, a meal-offering brought by priests, or a chavitin offering, the value of the benefit he received should be used for free-will offerings. If he violated the prohibition against me'ilah with regard to a communal offering, the benefit he received should be given to the chamber.

11 If one benefits from the meat of sacrifices of the most sacred order that became impure before the casting of the blood or one benefits from the fats and organs of sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity that became impure even though he brought them to the top of the altar before the casting of the blood, he is exempt.

12 It is forbidden to benefit from the milk or the eggs of animals or fowl consecrated as sacrifices for the altar, but one who benefits does not violate the prohibition against me'ilah. For that reason, the offspring of a consecrated animal or the offspring of an animal designated for the tithe-offering should not nurse from its mother, but rather from another animal that is not consecrated. A person may make a gift, saying: "The milk of this unconsecrated animal will be consecrated in order that the offspring of consecrated animals will nurse from it so that they do not die."

13 If one consecrated the value of an animal or a fowl to the altar, e.g., he said: "The value of this animal is consecrated for an accompanying offering" or "The value of this young dove is consecrated for a peace-offering," they are like entities consecrated for the improvement of the Temple. The prohibition against me'ilah applies to them, their milk, and their eggs, as will be explained.

1 When a person sets aside money for a sin-offering, a burnt-offering, a guilt-offering, turtle-doves, or young doves, the prohibition against me'ilah applies to them from the time he set them aside. If he set them aside for peace-offerings, the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply.

2 When a person consecrated the value of one limb of an animal to the altar, there is an unresolved doubt whether the holiness spreads throughout the entire animal or not. Therefore it should be offered and not redeemed. If it is redeemed, the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply to the money used to redeem it.

3 When a person sets aside money for the sacrifices to be offered at the conclusion of his nazirite vow, it is forbidden to benefit from it. If one benefits from it, he does not violate the prohibition against me'ilah, because all of the funds are fit to be used to purchase a peace-offering and the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply to a peace-offering, except to its fats and organs after the blood has been cast. If he dies, the money should be used for freewill offerings.

If the money was explicitly designated for the particular sacrifices, the money for the sin offering should be taken to the Mediterranean Sea. One should not benefit from them, nor does the prohibition against me'ilah apply. The money for the burnt-offering should be used for a burnt-offering and the prohibition against me'ilah applies.

When the person said: "This money is for my sin-offering and the remainder for my nazirite offering, if he benefited from all the remaining money, he violates the prohibition against me'ilah. If he benefited only from part of it, he does not violate that prohibition. Similarly, were he to say: "This money is for my burnt-offering and the remainder for my nazirite offering, if he benefited from all the remaining money, he violates the prohibition against me'ilah. If he benefited only from part of it, he does not violate that prohibition. The rationale is that the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply to a peace-offering.

If he set aside money and said: "This is for my burnt-offering; this is for my sin-offering; and this is for my peace-offering," and the money became intermingled, the prohibition against me'ilah applies both whether he benefited from the entire sum or only a portion of the money. What should he do to correct the situation? He should bring three animals and transfer the holiness of the money for the sin-offering wherever it is on one for a sin-offering, that of the money for the burnt-offering on one for a burnt-offering, and that of the money for the peace-offering on one for a peace-offering.

4 When one of the individuals obligated to bring a pair of doves separated money and said: "This is for my obligation," the prohibition against me'ilah applies whether he benefited from the entire sum or only a portion of the money. If the person dies, the money should be used for a freewill offering, as explained above with regard to a nazirite. The prohibition against me'ilah applies to it.

5 When a person sets aside a sin-offering for partaking of forbidden fat and brings it for partaking of blood, he does not secure atonement. Therefore he is not considered to have violated the prohibition against me'ilah. If he set aside money for a sin-offering to atone for partaking of forbidden fat and instead purchased a sin-offering to atone for partaking of blood with it inadvertently, he can secure atonement with that offering. Therefore he has violated the prohibition against me'ilah applies. If he did so intentionally, he cannot secure atonement with that offering. Therefore he does not violate the prohibition against me'ilah.

6 When a person sets aside two selaim for a guilt-offering and uses them to purchase two rams as ordinary animals, he has committed me'ilah, for he purchased ordinary animals with money designated for a guilt-offering. He is obligated to pay ten dinarim, i.e., the two selaim and an additional fifth. He should use this money to buy a ram for a guilt-offering and should bring another guilt-offering to atone for his me'ilah. Therefore if one of the two rams that he had purchased is worth two selaim and the other is worth ten dinarim, he should bring the one worth ten [dinarim] as a guilt-offering for the money that he misappropriated and the additional fifth and he should bring the one worth two selaim as a guilt-offering for his violation of the prohibition of me'ilah.

Different rules apply if he purchased one of the rams as a guilt-offering and one as an ordinary animal. If the one purchased as a guilt-offering was worth two selaim, he should bring that for the first guilt-offering for which he was originally liable. Similarly, if the one purchased as an ordinary animal was worth two selaim, he should bring it as a guilt-offering for his misappropriation of consecrated funds, for he misappropriated one sela of the money originally set aside for a guilt-offering. He should pay five dinarim which should be used for a freewill offering.

7 When one benefits from money set aside for a sin-offering before the sin-offering is offered, he should add a fifth to the amount he benefited from and bring his sin-offering with this money. And he should bring a guilt-offering for his misappropriation of consecrated funds.

Similarly, when one benefits from money set aside for a guilt-offering before the guilt-offering is offered, he should add a fifth to the amount he benefited from and bring his guilt-offering with this money. And he should bring a guilt-offering for his misappropriation of consecrated funds. The rationale is that the money paid for the misappropriation of animals consecrated to be offered on the altar should be used for such sacrifices. Money paid for the misappropriation of articles consecrated for the upkeep of the Temple should be used for that purpose.

In the instance mentioned above, if he discovered that he committed me'ilah with a portion of the money and afterwards, his sin-offering was sacrificed, but he did not set aside the money he misappropriated or he set it aside, but did not include it with the money for his sin-offering, the money he misappropriated and the additional fifth should be taken to the Mediterranean Sea. If he discovered that he committed me'ilah with a portion of the money and afterwards, his sin-offering was sacrificed, the money for the misappropriation and its additional fifth should be used for a freewill offering, for money is not set aside at the outset to be destroyed. In either instance, he must bring a guilt-offering for me'ilah.

Were the above situation to take place with regard to a guilt-offering, whether he discovered that he committed me'ilah before his guilt-offering was offered or afterwards, the money for the misappropriation and its additional fifth should be used for a freewill offering, because it is considered as money left over from a guilt-offering. And he must bring a guilt-offering for me'ilah.

8 A person who sells an animal designated as a burnt-offering or a peace-offering has done nothing of consequence. According to Scriptural Law, the money should be returned to its original state. Nevertheless, our Sages penalized the purchaser and required that the money be used for a freewill offering. Even if the animal was worth four zuzim and it was sold for five, all of the five should be used for a freewill offering. The prohibition against me'ilah, however, does not apply, neither according to Scriptural Law, nor according to Rabbinic Law.

9 The prohibition against me'ilah applies to articles set aside through vows. What is implied? A person said: "This loaf is considered like a sacrifice" or "...consecrated property for me." If he partakes of it, he violates the prohibition against me'ilah, even though the loaf is permitted to others. Therefore such an article cannot be redeemed, for it is only considered as consecrated for this person.

If he said: "This loaf is consecrated" or "...a sacrifice," whether he or someone else partakes of it, the prohibition against me'ilah is violated. Therefore it can be redeemed. If an ownerless loaf was before a person and he said: "This loaf is consecrated," should he take it to partake of it, he is considered to have misappropriated its entire value. If he took it to endow it to others, he is considered to have misappropriated the value of giving such a gift.

10 When a person tells a colleague: "My loaf is considered as consecrated property for you," and then gives it to that colleague, the recipient violates the prohibition against me'ilah when he uses it. The giver does not violate this prohibition, because the article is not forbidden to him. Similar laws apply to all analogous situations applying to other types of vows; the prohibition against me'ilah applies to those forbidden to benefit from them.

All entities forbidden to a person because of a vow can be combined. If he derived a p'rutah's worth of benefit from the combination, he violates the prohibition against me'ilah.

11 When a person says: "These plantings are a sacrifice if they are not cut down today" or "This garment is a sacrifice if it is not burnt today," and the day passed without the plantings being cut down or the garment being burnt, they are consecrated and they should be redeemed like other consecrated property. Only afterwards may one benefit from them.

If, however, he says: "These plantings are a sacrifice until they are cut down," he cannot redeem them. For whenever they will be redeemed, they will become consecrated again until they are cut down and once they are cut down, they need not be redeemed, but one may benefit from them immediately.

When does the above apply? When the person who consecrated them redeemed them. If, however, another person redeemed them, they do become ordinary property even though they have not been cut down and they are permitted even to the person who consecrated them.

1 The prohibition against me'ilah applies whether one consecrates an article that is fit to be used for the improvement of the Temple, for that purpose, e.g., a stone or a beam, consecrates an article fit for the altar for the improvement of the Temple, e.g., sheep or doves, or consecrates an article that is fit to be used for the improvement of the Temple for the altar, e.g., a stone or a beam, or he consecrates for either of these purposes an article that is not fit for either of these purposes, e.g., he consecrated chickens, vinegar, brine, or land. This applies even if he consecrated a dungheap filled with fertilizer, dust, or ash. In all these instances, the prohibition against me'ilah applies from the time the entity was consecrated until it was redeemed if it is an article fit to be redeemed.

2 Any of the articles consecrated for the improvement of the Temple and those entities from entities consecrated to the altar for which the prohibition against me'ilah applies may be combined together to reach the minimum measure required for me'ilah. If one derives a p'rutah's worth of benefit from all of them, he violates the prohibition against me'ilah.

3 If one partook of consecrated food and fed a colleague, or derived benefit from a consecrated object and caused a colleague to benefit. His eating and his colleague's benefit or his colleague's eating and his benefit are all combined to make one liable for me'ilah. If a sum of benefit worth a p'rutah is reached, he violates the prohibition against me'ilah.

4 A combination making one liable for the prohibition against me'ilah can be made over an extended period of time.

What is implied? If one derived benefit from a consecrated article on one day and then derived benefit again after the passage of several years in one continuous state of not knowing, the two events are combined for a p'rutah's worth and he violates the prohibition against me'ilah.

5 The prohibition against me'ilah applies only to articles that have been separated from the earth. If, however, one benefits from consecrated earth or from consecrated articles attached to the earth, he does not violate the prohibition against me'ilah even if blemishes that entity.

What is implied? If one plows a consecrated field or sows it, he is exempt. If he takes its earth, derives benefit from it, and damages the earth, he violates the prohibition against me'ilah. A person who threshes in a consecrated field violates the prohibition against me'ilah, because its dust benefits the field. Thus he has benefited from the dust and damaged the field. Similarly, if one plowed a consecrated field in order to raise dust for grass that was planted there and he took the grass, he violates the prohibition against me'ilah.

A person who dwells in a cave that is consecrated or in the shade of a tree or dovecote that is consecrated does not violate the prohibition against me'ilah, even though he benefited. Similarly, when one consecrates a house that was built, a person who dwells in it does not violate the prohibition against me'ilah. When, however, a person consecrates wood and stones and builds a house, a person who dwells in it violates the prohibition against me'ilah, as will be explained.

6 The prohibition against me'ilah applies to produce that grows on consecrated property.

What is implied? If one consecrated a field and it produced grass or one consecrated a tree and it produced fruit, the prohibition against me'ilah applies. If, however, one consecrated an empty cistern and afterwards, it became filled with water, a dungheap and it became filled with waste, or a dovecote and it became filled with doves, since these are not the products of the consecrated articles, the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply with regard to them. Similarly, one may not benefit - but the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply to - waste and dung in a courtyard that was consecrated. What should be done with them? They should be sold and the proceeds given to the Temple treasury.

When a spring emerges in a consecrated field, it is forbidden to benefit from the water that emerges in the field, but one who derives benefit does not violate the prohibition against me'ilah. If the water emerges outside the field, it is permitted to benefit from it. When a willow grows in a consecrated field, it is forbidden to benefit from it, but the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply.

The following rules apply when an ordinary tree is growing next to a consecrated field and its roots emerge in that field. If there are up to sixteen cubits between it and the consecrated field, it is forbidden to benefit from the roots in the field, but one who benefits from them does not violate the prohibition against me'ilah. If the tree was more than sixteen cubits away from the field, one who benefits from the roots violates the prohibition against me'ilah.

The converse applies when a consecrated tree is growing next to an ordinary field and its roots emerge in that field. If the roots emerge within sixteen cubits, the prohibition against me'ilah applies with regard to them.

If they emerge more than sixteen cubits away, one should not benefit from the roots in the ordinary field, but the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply with regard to them.

7 When there is a nest in the top of a consecrated tree that a fowl built from wood and grass and the like, one should not benefit from the nest and the eggs in it together with the chicks that require their mother. One who derives benefit does not violate the prohibition against me'ilah.

8 When one consecrates a forest, the prohibition against me'ilah applies to it in its entirety, the trees and the nests at the tops of the trees or between them.

9 When the Temple treasurers plant consecrated trees and cut them down, the prohibition against me'ilah applies to those small pieces of wood that were cut off when the trees were cut to size. The prohibition against me'ilah does not apply to the slivers, the sawdust, or to the nivia of the wood, i.e., a hard, round knot in the midst of the wood which resemble a wart, because it will not be useful for work.

10 When a person consecrates his servant, the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply to him, nor to his hair, even though his hair is fit to be cut off. The rationale is that the hair is still attached to the servant and as long as it is attached to him, it grows and increases in value.

11 When a person sows produce that was consecrated, he should redeem it when he sows it. Nevertheless, even if he does not redeem it, the produce that grows from it is not consecrated and the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply to it. If one derived benefit from other consecrated property, he may not pay the principal and an additional fifth from such produce. One is obligated to separate challah from bread made from such grain.

12 When water was placed on consecrated grape dregs for the first, second, and third times, it is forbidden to benefit from it, but one who benefits does not violate the prohibition against me'ilah. The fourth time, the mixture is permitted.
When does the above apply? When the dregs had been consecrated for the Temple's improvement. If they were consecrated for the altar, even from the fourth time onward, they are always forbidden.

13 When a person consecrates a hen for the altar, the prohibition against me'ilah applies to it and its eggs. When a person consecrates a donkey for the altar, the prohibition against me'ilah applies to it and its milk. When a person consecrates a dove for the improvement of the Temple, the prohibition against me'ilah applies to it and its eggs, as we explained.

14 When the tunics of the priestly garments have worn out, the prohibition against me'ilah applies to them, as it does to other consecrated objects. If they are new, since it is permitted to benefit from them, the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply to them.

15 The following rules apply to articles consecrated by gentiles. If he consecrated them for the improvement of the Temple, the prohibition against me'ilah applies. If they were consecrated for the altar, the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply according to Scriptural Law, for with regard to the sacrifices, Leviticus 1:2 states: "Speak to the children of Israel." It is, however, forbidden to benefit from them according to Rabbinic Law.

16 With regard to sound, appearance, and fragrance from a consecrated object, it is forbidden to benefit from them, but the prohibition against me'ilah does not apply.

When does the above apply? When one smelt the fragrance of the incense offering after its cloud ascended. If, however, he smelt the fragrance of the incense offering as its cloud ascends, he violates the prohibition against me'ilah.

Chapter 6

1 There are different situations in which the prohibition against me'ilah applies. There are some articles from which a person benefits that are not ordinarily damageable, e.g., one who uses a pure golden utensil. There are other articles that are damageable, e.g., garments, and utensils made from silver, copper, iron, and the like.

When a person derives a p'rutah's worth of benefit from a consecrated substance that is not attached to the ground, if he benefits from an article that is not ordinarily damageable, e.g., he used a consecrated golden utensil, he violates the prohibition against me'ilah. If he benefits from an article that is damageable, e.g., he wore consecrated garments or chopped with a consecrated axe, he does not violate the prohibition against me'ilah until he causes a p'rutah's worth of damage to consecrated property, i.e., the article from which he benefited itself, with the intent to benefit from it even though it causes damage at that time.

If he derived a half a p'rutah of benefit and damaged a half a p'rutah or he derived a p'rutah of benefit and damaged a p'rutah's worth of another article, but did not benefit from what he damaged or did not damage the article from which he benefited, he does not violate the prohibition against me'ilah unless he derives a p'rutah's worth of benefit and causes a p'rutah's worth of damage to that article while deriving benefit from it.

What is implied? A person removed a patch from a consecrated garment and sewed it unto his garment and wore it, deriving a p'rutah's worth of benefit and causing a p'rutah's worth of damage to the garment from which he removed it, without damaging the patch at all. He does not violate the prohibition against me'ilah, because he derived benefit from one article and damaged another. We already explained, that when a person derives benefit and causes a colleague to derive benefit, the two can be combined to reach the minimum measure of a p'rutah's worth even if there is a long interval between them.

2 When a person removes wool from unblemished animals consecrated as sacrifices of the highest order of sanctity, since he derived a p'rutah's worth of benefit, he violates the prohibition against me'ilah even though he did not damage the animals. The animals are comparable to a cup of gold, for the removal of their wool does not prevent them from being offered. If, however, sacrificial animals incurred a physical blemish, since they are designated to be sold and being shorn causes their worth to decrease, the prohibition against me'ilah applies. Nevertheless, one does not violate that prohibition unless he derives a p'rutah's worth of benefit and causes that amount of damage.

If one removes wool from a sacrificial animal after it dies, since he derived benefit, he violates the prohibition against me'ilah, for there is no conception of reducing an animal's value once it has died. In this instance, this prohibition against me'ilah is of Rabbinic origin, as we explained.

3 When a person misappropriates articles consecrated for the improvement of the Temple unintentionally, since he did not act intentionally, the consecrated article loses its holiness. Anyone who benefits from it afterwards is not liable. If one intentionally misappropriates a consecrated article, since he is not obligated to bring a sacrifice to atone for me'ilah, the consecrated article does not lose its holiness. Instead, it remains in its consecrated state. Hence, if another person comes and benefits from it unintentionally, he violates the prohibition against me'ilah.

When does the above apply? When one misappropriated the article while it was consecrated, used it as if it was an ordinary article, and transferred ownership to another person. If, however, one derived benefit from it and damaged it, but did not transfer ownership to another person, there is the possibility of another person violating the prohibition against me'ilah with it, even though it has already been violated previously.

4 The concept of a second person violating the prohibition against me'ilah with a consecrated article after someone has already done so applies only with regard to an animal and a utensil.

What is implied? One chopped with an axe that was consecrated, derived a p'rutah's worth of benefit, and damaged the axe. Then his colleague came, chopped with it, derived benefit, and damaged the axe; both violate the prohibition against me'ilah. If he gave it to his colleague as a present, he violates the prohibition against me'ilah, but his colleague does not.

If one drank from a golden goblet and derived a p'rutah's worth of benefit, his colleague came, drank, and derived benefit, and then another colleague came, drank, and derived benefit, they all violate the prohibition against me'ilah. If he took the goblet and gave it to his colleague as a present or sold it to him, he violates the prohibition against me'ilah, but his colleague does not.

If one rode on a donkey, derived a p'rutah's worth of benefit, and damaged the donkey, his colleague rode on it, derived benefit, and damaged it, and then another colleague came, rode on it, derived benefit, and damaged it, they all violate the prohibition against me'ilah. If he gave it to his colleague as a present, sold it to him, or rented it to him, he violates the prohibition against me'ilah, but his colleague does not.

Similarly, if he lends out a consecrated axe, he is considered to have misappropriated the amount of satisfaction he received from having lent out the axe. His colleague is permitted to chop with it even as an initial preference. Similar laws apply with regard to an animal.

5 These laws do not apply to an animal consecrated to the altar. Instead, there is the possibility for several individuals to violate the prohibition against me'ilah, one after the other.

What is implied? One removed wool from an animal that is a sin-offering, his colleague came and removed wool, and a third colleague came and removed wool, they all violate the prohibition against me'ilah. Similarly, if one gave it to a colleague and the colleague gave it to a third individual, they all violate the prohibition against me'ilah. It appears to me that the laws applying to meal-offerings, offerings of fowl, libations, and sacrificial utensils are the same as those applying to an animal to be offered as a sacrifice, for in all these instances, the very physical person of the entity is consecrated.

6 When an animal consecrated as a sacrifice of the most sacred order becomes blemished and it is fit to be redeemed, it is considered like an entity consecrated for the improvement of the Temple, whose worth is consecrated. If one gave it to a colleague and the colleague gave it to a third individual, only the first violates the prohibition against me'ilah.

7 Our Sages declared that one who takes a consecrated stone or beam intentionally and gives it to a colleague, they both violate the prohibition against me'ilah. If he gives it to the treasurer in whose possession the article was, that person violates the prohibition against me'ilah, but the treasurer does not.

It appears to me that these concepts were stated only with regard to a person who willfully misappropriates a consecrated object, in which instance the holiness of the consecrated article does not depart.

When a person takes a consecrated p'rutah with the conception that it is his own, he does not violate the prohibition against me'ilah until he uses it for his own desires or gives it as a present. If he gives it to his colleague as a present, he violates the prohibition against me'ilah, but his colleague does not. For, with regard to other consecrated articles, one person violates the prohibition against me'ilah, but the one following him does not, as we explained. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

8 If he takes a consecrated stone or beam, he does not violate the prohibition against me'ilah, because he has not benefited as of yet. If he builds it into his home, he violates that prohibition. If he places it on top of a window in the room without attaching it, he does not violate the prohibition against me'ilah until he dwells under it for a p'rutah's worth of benefit, because merely placing it there is not considered as discernible benefit.

9 If one took a consecrated p'rutah gave it to a bath attendant, he violates the prohibition against me'ilah even though he has not bathed yet, for he benefits in that he could bathe whenever he desires. Similarly, if he gives it to another type of craftsman as payment for his services, he violates the prohibition even though the craftsman has not performed any work.

10 The following rules apply if one purchased an article with a consecrated p'rutah, but did not draw the article after him. If he purchased it from a gentile, he violates the prohibition against me'ilah; if, from a Jew, he does not violate that prohibition.

11 When a person spends consecrated money for his own needs with the understanding that they are ordinary funds, he violates the prohibition against me'ilah even though he did not spend the money for ordinary matters.

What is implied? A person who brings his sin-offering, guilt-offering, or Paschal sacrifice from consecrated funds or a person who is lacking atonement who brings his atonement offering from consecrated funds violates the prohibition against me'ilah. None of the above violate the prohibition until the blood is cast on the altar. Therefore one who brings meal-offerings, libations, or the bread for a thanksgiving offering does not violate the prohibition against me'ilah even though he violates a transgression. The rationale is that these offerings do not involve casting blood on the altar to atone for the person.

12 If a person pays his half-shekel from consecrated funds, when money is taken from the collection of funds and even one animal is purchased and its blood is cast on the altar, the person who paid with the half-shekel violates the prohibition against me'ilah, because he has a portion in the animal whose blood was cast.

13 When a person sets aside his half-shekel and then uses it for his personal needs both he and his colleague violate the prohibition against me'ilah.

The following laws apply when one gives a half-shekel to a colleague to donate on the principal's behalf and the agent donates it on his own behalf. If the money for the sacrifices was already set aside, the agent who made the donation violates the prohibition against me'ilah, for the priest who sets aside the money takes also on behalf of the money that will be collected in the future, as we explained in Hilchot Shekalim. Thus it is considered as if this shekel already reached the treasury. Therefore the agent violates the prohibition against me'ilah. If the money was not taken yet, he does not violate the prohibition against me'ilah.

The prohibition against me'ilah does not apply to money that remains in the chamber.

Chapter 7

1 The following rules apply when a person inadvertently took a consecrated article or consecrated money and gave it to an agent to use as ordinary property or money. If the agent carries out the mission with which he is charged, the principal is considered to have violated the prohibition against me'ilah. If the agent did not execute the agency, but instead acted on his own initiative, the agent is the one who violates the prohibition against me'ilah. What is implied? A person told his agent: "Give that meat to the guests," and instead, the agent gave them bread, or he told him to give them bread and he gave them meat.

If one told his agent, "Bring me from the window," and he brought him from the closet or he told him to bring from the closet and he brought from the window, the agent violates the prohibition against me'ilah. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

If the agent went and brought from the window as instructed, even though the principal told him: "In my heart, I wanted you to bring from the closet," the principal violates the prohibition against me'ilah, for the agent carried out the mission as he charged him. We follow the principle: "Matters in one's heart are not of consequence."

Even if the agent was a deafmute, a mentally or emotionally incompetent person, or a minor to whom the laws of agency do not apply, if they carry out the principal's instructions, the principal violates the prohibition against me'ilah. If they do not carry out his instructions, the principal is exempt.

If one tells his agent: "Give each one of the guests a piece of meat" and the agent told them: "Take two at a time," the principal violates the prohibition against me'ilah, because his instructions were carried out. The agent is exempt, because he is merely adding to the principal's agency. He is not eradicating it. If, however, the agent tells the guests: "Take two at a time on my responsibility," both he and the principal violate the prohibition against me'ilah. If the guests take three at a time, they also violate the prohibition against me'ilah, because each one of the individuals involved had performed the agency with which they were charged and added a further matter on his own initiative. Thus the other is also liable, because his instructions were carried out and the agency was not eradicated. And he is liable because of what he added on his own initiative.

2 When does the above apply? When the pieces of meat were consecrated for the improvement of the Temple. If they were meat from a burnt-offering or the like, only the person who partakes of them violates the prohibition against me'ilah. For he is obligated in another prohibition aside from me'ilah and, with regard to the entire Torah, there is no concept of a prohibition violated through agency except in the case of me'ilah alone and there, provided there is no other prohibition involved with it.

3 When a person gives a p'rutah of consecrated funds to an agent and tells him: "With half, purchase lamps for me and with half, wicks," and the agent used the entire amount for lamps or for wicks, they are both exempt. This law also applies when he told him to use the entire amount for lamps or for wicks and he used half to purchase lamps and half to purchase wicks.

The rationale is that the principal does not violate the prohibition against me'ilah, because his agency was not completed with regard to a p'rutah's worth of value. The agent does not violate that prohibition, because he did not eradicate his agency for a p'rutah's worth.

If, however, one told an agent: "For half a p'rutah, bring me lamps from this-and-this place and for the other half, bring me wicks from that-and-that place," and the agent brought the lamps from the place mentioned for the wicks and the wicks from the place mentioned for the lamps, the agent violates the prohibition against me'ilah.

4 If a principal gave his agent two consecrated p'rutot and told him: "Bring me an esrog" and the agent went and brought him an esrog for a p'rutah and a pomegranate for a p'rutah, the agent violates the prohibition against me'ilah, but the principal is exempt. The rationale is that the principal sent the agent to purchase an esrog worth two p'rutot for him. Therefore if the esrog which the agent brought the principal that cost one p'rutah is worth two p'rutot, they both violate the prohibition against me'ilah.

5 When a person sent a p'rutah via an agent to purchase a particular article and then, before it reached the domain of the storekeeper, the principal remembered that the p'rutah is consecrated, the agent violates the prohibition against me'ilah, because he is acting unknowingly, while the principal has already remembered. As we explained, a person who acts knowingly is not liable for a sacrifice to atone for me'ilah.

If the agent also remembered and was conscious that the money was consecrated before it reached the storekeeper, they are both exempt from a sacrifice to atone for me'ilah and the storekeeper is liable when he uses that p'rutah which became mixed with his money, for he is acting unknowingly.

If the storekeeper was informed that the p'rutah he was given was consecrated, they are all exempt and the purchase is completed, with the article becoming consecrated.

6 What should be done in order to preclude the storekeeper from sinning so he will be permitted to use all the money he received? One should take a non-consecrated p'rutah or any non-consecrated utensil and say: "Wherever the consecrated p'rutah is its holiness should be transferred to this." The p'rutah or the utensil become consecrated and the storekeeper is permitted to use all the money he received.

Similarly, if a consecrated p'rutah becomes intermingled with all the money in a purse or one said: "A p'rutah in this purse is consecrated," he should transfer its holiness and afterwards, he may use all the coins in the purse. If he used coins from the purse without transferring the holiness of the consecrated coin, he does not definitely violate the prohibition against me'ilah until he used all the coins in the purse.

7 If a person said: "One of my purses is consecrated" or "One of my oxen is consecrated," the prohibition against me'ilah applies to all of them and to some of them. What should he do? He should bring the largest of the purses or the oxen and say: "If this is consecrated, it should remain consecrated. If not, wherever the consecrated one is, its holiness should be transferred to this one." He may then use the smaller ones.

8 When a person misappropriates less than a p'rutah's worth of consecrated property, whether intentionally or unintentionally, he must make restitution for the principal, but he need not pay an additional fifth or bring a sacrifice. It appears to me that he is not liable for lashes for misappropriating less than a p'rutah's worth if he acted intentionally.

9 When a person entrusts consecrated money to a homeowner and the homeowner uses them and spends them, he violates the prohibition against me'ilah. The rationale is that he does not have permission to use these funds and the owner did not grant him license to.

10 Different rules apply if he entrusted them to a money-changer or a storekeeper and they were not sealed or tied close with an unusual knot. In these situations, since he is permitted to use them according to law, if he spent them, they are both exempt. The owner of the entrusted article is exempt because he did not tell the storekeeper or the money-changer to use them. And the store-keeper is exempt, because it is as if he used them with permission since they were not tied closed with an unusual knot or sealed.

11 When a woman brought consecrated money to her husband's domain or her testator consecrated property and then died and the consecrated property fell to her as an inheritance, when her husband spends the money on his personal needs, he violates the prohibition against me'ilah.

Chapter 8

1 When workers are working in consecrated orchards, even though it was agreed that they would receive food, they should not eat consecrated figs. If they do, they violate the prohibition against me'ilah. Instead, the Temple treasury should give them money to purchase food.

2 When a person is threshing vetch that is consecrated, he must muzzle the ox. Although Deuteronomy 25:4 states: "Do not muzzle an ox while it is threshing," the latter phrase can be interpreted as "threshing appropriate for it."

3 The holiness of consecrated property should not be transferred as payment for work, but only on money.
What is implied? When a craftsman performs a maneh's worth of work for the Temple treasury, he should not be given a consecrated animal, nor a consecrated garment as payment unless its holiness is first transferred to money. After the article became ordinary property, it can be given to the craftsman as his wages. If the treasurers desire, they may then purchase the animal from the Temple treasury.

4 When the Temple is being built, consecrated wood and stones should not be taken, nor should the building be built with the intent that it is consecrated. Instead, everything should be built from ordinary property. This is a decree lest one of the workers benefit from the shade of the building or lean on a stone or beam while working. After the building is completed, the holiness of consecrated funds is transferred to the building. If the treasurers need wood for the Temple for that day alone, they may purchase it with consecrated funds, for they are not delaying the matter for days in which instance it would be necessary to take precautions lest one lean on them and thus violate the prohibition against me'ilah.

5 When an agreement is made with workers to build in the Temple and its courtyards, the agreement is made for so-and-so many selaim for so-and-so many cubits, considering a cubit as containing 20 thumbbreadths. When a measurement is made of what they built, it is measured and payment determined, considering a cubit as containing 24 thumbbreadths, so that the workers will not take unfair benefit from the Temple treasury, because they are not exact in measurement.

6 It is a stipulation of the court that the priests may benefit from consecrated salt and wood while partaking of the sacrifices granted to them as their portion. They may not, however, use the salt of the Temple on their ordinary food.

7 The prohibition against me'ilah applies to salt that is on a limb from a sacrifice to be offered on the altar. It does not, however, apply to salt on the ramp and the top of the altar.

8 It is appropriate for a person to meditate on the judgments of the holy Torah and know their ultimate purpose according to his capacity. If he cannot find a reason or a motivating rationale for a practice, he should not regard it lightly. Nor should he break through to ascend to God, lest God burst forth against him. One's thoughts concerning them should not be like his thoughts concerning other ordinary matters.

See how severe the Torah rules concerning misappropriating sacred property. Now if wood, stones, earth, and ash become holy because the name of the Lord of the world was called upon them through speech alone and anyone who treats them as ordinary articles violates the prohibition against me'ilah and even if he acted unknowingly, he is required to secure atonement, how much more so with regard to the mitzvot which God ordained for us should a person not treat them derisively, because he does not understand their rationale. He should not conjure up matters that are not true concerning God, nor should he think about them with his mind as he would ordinary matters. For Leviticus 19:37 states: "And you shall guard all My decrees and all My judgments and perform them." Our Sages commented:This adjures us to guard and perform both the decrees and the judgments. The meaning of "performing" is well known, i.e,. that one should observe the decrees. "Guarding" means to treat them with caution and not think that they are any less than the judgments.

The judgments are those mitzvot whose motivating rationale is openly revealed and the benefit of their observance in this world is known, e.g., the prohibitions against robbery and bloodshed and honoring one's father and mother. The decrees are the mitzvot whose motivating rationales are not known. Our Sages said: "I ordained decrees and you have no license to question them." A person's natural inclination confronts him concerning them and the nations of the world challenge them, e.g., the prohibition of the meat of a pig, milk and meat, the calf whose neck is broken, the red heifer, and the goat sent to Azazel. To what degree did King David suffer because of the heretics and the idolaters who would issue challenges concerning the decrees! As long as they would pursue him with false retorts that they would arrange according to man's limited knowledge, he would increase his clinging to the Torah, as Psalms 119:69 states: "Willful transgressors have stacked falsehoods against me, but I guard Your precepts with a full heart." And ibid.:86 states concerning this matter: "All of Your mitzvot are faithful; they pursue me with falsehood; help me."

All of the sacrifices are in the category of decrees. Our Sages said: "The world exists for the sake of the service of the sacrifices." For through the performance of the decrees and the judgments the righteous merit the life of the world to come. And between the two of them, the Torah gave precedence to the command for the decrees, as Leviticus 18:5 states: "And you shall heed My decrees and judgments which a person will perform and live through them."

Mishneh Torah, Paschal Offering

Trans. by Eliyahu Touger, Moznaim Publishing

Chapter 1

1 It is a positive commandment to offer the Paschal sacrifice on the fourteenth day of the month of Nisan after midday. This offering is brought only from lambs or goats, a male in its first year. Both men and women are obligated in this mitzvah.

2 One who willfully nullifies this mitzvah and allows the fourteenth of Nisan to pass without him offering the Paschal sacrifice despite the fact that he is not impure or not on a distant journey, he is liable for karet. If he neglected the offering of this sacrifice inadvertently, he is exempt.

3 The Paschal sacrifice may be slaughtered only in the Temple Courtyard like other sacrifices. Even when sacrificing in high places was permitted, the Paschal sacrifice would not be offered on an individual altar. Anyone who offers the Paschal sacrifice on an individual altar is liable for lashes as if he offered it in the market place, as Deuteronomy 16:5 states" "You may not sacrifice the Paschal sacrifice in one of your gates." According to the Oral Tradition, it was taught that this is warning not to slaughter a Paschal sacrifice on an individual altar even during the time when sacrificing on the high places was permitted.

4 The slaughter of the Paschal sacrifice takes place after midday. It should not be slaughtered until the afternoon daily offering is slaughtered. After the afternoon incense offering is brought and the lamps of the Menorah are kindled, they begin slaughtering the Paschal sacrifices and continue until the end of the day.

If one slaughtered the Paschal sacrifice after midday, but before the afternoon daily sacrifice was offered, it is acceptable, but one should stir the blood of the Paschal sacrifice until the blood of the daily offering is cast on the altar. Afterwards, the blood of the Paschal sacrifice should be cast after it. If, however, the blood of the Paschal sacrifice is cast before the blood of the daily offering, it is acceptable.

5 A person who slaughters the Paschal sacrifice at the appropriate time while possessing an olive-sized portion of chametz is liable for lashes, as Exodus 23:18 states: "Do not slaughter sacrificial blood over chametz, i.e., that one should not offer the Paschal sacrifice while chametz continues to exist in his possession.

Whether one slaughters, casts the blood on the altar, or offers the organs and fats, if one of these individuals or one of the members of the company partaking of this Paschal sacrifice possessed chametz in his domain at the time it is offered, he is liable for lashes. The sacrifice is, however, acceptable.

6 The blood of the Paschal sacrifice should be poured out on the base of the altar. After the blood was poured, its belly should be opened up, the fats and organs to be offered on the altar removed. The fats of each Paschal sacrifice should be offered on the pyre individually. The owner of the sacrifice should take his Paschal sacrifice with its hide to his home in Jerusalem.There he roasts it and eats it in the evening.

7 When one leaves these fats and organs and does not offer them until they remain overnight and thus become disqualified because they remained overnight, he violates a negative commandment, as Exodus 23:18 states: "Do not leave over the festive fats until the morning." Even though he transgresses, he is not liable for lashes, for the prohibition does not involve a deed.

8 The fats of the Paschal sacrifice may be offered on the altar's pyre until dawn.

When does the above apply? When the fourteenth of Nisan falls on the Sabbath, for fats of sacrifices offered on the Sabbath may be offered on a festival. If, however, the fourteenth fell on a weekday, this leniency is not taken, because we do not offer the fats of sacrifices offered on a weekday on a festival.

9 The Paschal sacrifice should be offered in three groups, as implied by Exodus 12:6 "And all of the congregation of the community of Israel shall slaughter it." Three collective terms are used "congregation," community," and "Israel." There should be no less than 30 people in each group.

10 If there were only 50 people who came to slaughter the Paschal sacrifice, thirty enter the Temple Courtyard and slaughter their sacrificial animals. Ten depart and another ten enter. Then ten more depart and another ten enter.

11 If there are less than 50 people who seek to offer Paschal sacrifices, the initial preference is not to offer that sacrifice. If, however, it was offered, it is acceptable. If all the Jewish people slaughtered their Paschal sacrifices at one time, it is acceptable.

How is the Paschal sacrifice slaughtered? The first group enters the Temple Courtyard until it is full. Its gates are locked and they begin slaughtering their Paschal sacrifices. As long as they are slaughtering and offering the blood, the Levites recite the Hallel. If they completed its recitation before the group completed its sacrifice, the Hallel is repeated. If they completed its repetition before the group completed its sacrifice, the Hallel is recited a third time. There was never a situation where the Hallel was completed a third time.

12 For every time the Hallel is read, three blasts are sounded with the trumpets, a tekiah, teruah, and tekiah. Since these sacrifices are not accompanied by libations for the trumpets to be sounded when they are offered, they are sounded when the sacrifices are slaughtered.

13 The priests stand in lines, holding silver and gold vessels in their hands. One line would all hold silver ones and another, all gold, without them mixing together so that it would be attractive.

The vessels did not have flat bottoms so that they would not be placed down and the blood allowed to coagulate.

14 A slaughterer slaughters the sacrificial animal and a priest receives its blood, gives it to his colleague, who gives it to his colleague - so that many will be involved in the mitzvah - until the blood reaches the priest near the altar. He should pour it in a single action towards the altar's base. He receives a full vessel and returns the empty one.

Afterwards, the sacrificial animal is hung and skinned entirely. Its belly is ripped open and its innards are pressed until the filth and waste are removed from them. The organs and fats to be offered are removed, placed in a vessel, salted, and offered by a priest on the altar.

How is the sacrificial animal hung and skinned? There were iron pegs affixed in the walls and the pillars of the Temple Courtyard. The sacrificial animals were hung and skinned on them. For those who did not find a place to hang his animal, there were thin, smooth rods. One would place the rod on his shoulder and on his friend's shoulder and hang the sacrificial animal on it and skin it.

15 After the sacrifice was completed, the gates of the Temple Courtyard are opened. The first group departs and the second group enters. Then the second group departs and the third group enters. The manner in which it was offered the first time was repeated the second time and the third time. When the third group completed its sacrificial service and departed, the Temple Courtyard is washed.

16 If the fourteenth of Nisan fell on the Sabbath, it was offered on the Sabbath in the same way as it was offered during the week. The floor of the Temple Courtyard would be washed, for prohibitions of the category of shvut are not observed in the Temple, even when the matter is not necessary for the Temple service. For the prohibitions of shvut are released entirely in the Temple.

17 No one would bring their Paschal sacrifices to their homes on the Sabbath. Instead, the first group would depart with their Paschal sacrifices and sit on the Temple Mount. The second group would depart with their Paschal sacrifices and sit on the surrounding rampart. And the third group would stand in their place in the Temple Courtyard. They would all wait until the conclusion of the Sabbath and then everyone would bring their Paschal sacrifice to his home.

18 The slaughter of the Paschal sacrifice, pouring its blood on the altar, pressing out its innards, and offering its fats supersede the Sabbath prohibitions. For it is impossible to perform these before the Sabbath, because the sacrifice has a fixed time, as implied by Numbers 9:2 which states that the sacrifice must be brought "at its appointed time." Nevertheless, carrying it through the city, bringing it from outside the Sabbath limits, cutting off its wart with a utensil do not supersede the Sabbath prohibitions, because these activities could be performed before the Sabbath. If, however, he could cut it off by hand on the Sabbath, he may. If it was dried up, he may cut it off, even with a utensil, for the prohibitions defined as shvut do not apply in the Temple at all.
Similarly, roasting it and washing out its innards do not supersede the Sabbath prohibitions, because these activities can be performed after the Sabbath.

19 If one forgot and did not bring a knife, he should not bring it on the Sabbath. Instead, he should place it between the horns of the lamb or in its wool and spur it on until it brings it to the Temple. There he should consecrate it. Although he is having an animal carry a burden for him on the Sabbath, since he is doing this in an abnormal manner and because of the mitzvah, it was permitted.

When does this apply? When he has not consecrated his Paschal sacrifice as of yet or said: "This is a Paschal sacrifice." If, however, he consecrated it, he should not have a knife carried upon it, because he is having work performed by a consecrated animal.

Why was a person permitted to consecrate his Paschal sacrifice on the Sabbath? Since the sacrifice has a fixed time, it is permitted to consecrate it on the Sabbath. Similarly, a person may consecrate his festive offering on a festival without any concern.

20 When a person slaughters his Paschal sacrifice and it is discovered to have a disqualifying physical blemish or it is treifah. he may slaughter another one whether on the weekday or on the Sabbath. He may proceed and slaughter one hundred one after the other until one is acceptable or until night falls and his offering of the sacrifice is postponed until the Second Pesach, because he was prevented by forces beyond his control.

Chapter 2

1 The Paschal sacrifice should be slaughtered only for the sake of those who were enumerated for partaking of it, as Exodus 13:4 states: "Everyone... should be enumerated on the lamb." The implication is that one should be enumerated on it while it is alive. Those enumerated on a Paschal sacrifice are referred to as "the members of the company."

2 When one individual sacrifices a Paschal sacrifice for himself alone, it is acceptable, provided he is capable of partaking of it in its entirety. As an initial preference, an endeavor is made not to sacrifice the Paschal sacrifice for the sake of one individual alone, for Numbers 9:12 states: "They shall offer it."

3 The Paschal sacrifice should be slaughtered only for those who are fit to partake of it. If one of the members of the company was a minor, an elder person, or infirm, he may be counted among those for whom the Paschal sacrifice is slaughtered if he is capable of eating an olive-sized portion. If not, he may not be counted among them, as implied by Exodus 12:4: "A person according to his capacity to eat," indicating that he must be fit to partake of it. Even if the company includes 100, if any one of them is not capable of eating an olive-sized portion, he may not be counted among those for whom it is slaughtered.

4 A company should not be composed of solely women and servants or minors and servants so that frivolity will not be found among them. A company may, however, be made entirely of women even for the second Paschal sacrifice or entirely of servants. Minors may be counted among the company for whom the Paschal sacrifice is slaughtered, but a company may not be comprised solely of minors, for they are not intellectually mature.

Similarly, a company should not be made up solely of the infirm, the elderly, or those in an acute state of mourning. Even though they are capable of eating, since they will eat only a meager amount, it is possible that they will leave over from the Paschal sacrifice and cause it to become unacceptable. If they transgressed and had a Paschal sacrifice slaughtered for such a company, it is acceptable. Similarly, a company should not be made up solely of converts, lest they not be precise concerning it and cause it to be disqualified. If a Paschal sacrifice was slaughtered for such a company, it is acceptable.

5 If a Paschal sacrifice was slaughtered for people who were not enumerated upon it or for individuals whom none could eat an olive-sized portion or it was slaughtered for the uncircumcised or those impure, it is unacceptable. If it was slaughtered for one who could partake of it and one who could not partake of an olive-sized portion, for those enumerated on it and for others not enumerated on it, for circumcised and uncircumcised, for the pure and the impure, it is acceptable. Those who are fit to partake of it eat according to law; it is as if he did not have the others in mind.

6 If the Paschal sacrifice was slaughtered for the sake of the circumcised, but its blood was cast on the altar for the sake of the circumcised and the uncircumcised, it is unacceptable. The rationale is that casting the blood is more severe, because it is the fundamental dimension of the sacrifice.
If he slaughtered it for the circumcised so that the uncircumcised will derive atonement through it, it is unacceptable, because he had the uncircumcised in mind when casting the blood. If he slaughtered it for the sake of those who would partake of it so that its blood would be cast for those who would not partake of it, the Paschal sacrifice is acceptable, but no one fulfills their obligation with it, because the ones who will partake of it were not in mind when the blood was cast.

7 When one was healthy at the time the sacrificial animal was slaughtered, but sick at the time its blood was cast or sick at the time of slaughter, but healthy at the time the blood was cast, the sacrificial animal should not be slaughtered, nor its blood cast for him unless he is healthy from the time it was slaughtered until its blood was cast.

8 A person may have a sacrificial animal slaughtered for the sake of his son or daughter who are below majority and for his Canaanite servants and maidservants, whether with their consent or without their consent. He may not, however, slaughter for the sake of his son or daughter who are above majority or for the sake of his Hebrew servants and maidservants or for the sake of his wife without their consent. If they were silent and did not protest, they are considered to have consented.

9 If one slaughtered a sacrificial animal for the sake of his son or daughter who are below majority and/or for his Canaanite servants and maidservants and they went and had one slaughtered for themselves, they fulfill their obligation by partaking of their master's sacrifice.

10 If one slaughtered a sacrificial animal for the sake of his wife, his son or daughter who are above majority and/or for his Hebrew servants and maidservants and they went and had one slaughtered for themselves, there is no greater protest than this. They fulfill their obligation by partaking of their own sacrifice.

11 When a woman is living in her husband's home and her father slaughters for her and her husband slaughters for her, she should partake of her husband's. If she was hurrying to go to her father's home on the first festival after her wedding as is the pattern of all women and both her father and her husband slaughtered for her, she should partake of her father's. From this point onward, she should eat at the place she desires, provided it is clear where she desires to eat at the time of slaughter.
Similarly, if two guardians sacrifice on behalf of an orphan, the orphan should eat where he desires. When does the above apply? To an orphan below majority. If, however, he is above majority, it is as if he was enumerated on two Paschal sacrifices. And when one enumerates himself on two Paschal sacrifices, he may partake only of the one slaughtered first.

12 With regard to a Canaanite servant of two partners, if they are untrusting of each other, suspecting that the other will steal the servant, he should not partake of either of their Paschal sacrifice. If they are not untrusting, he may eat where he desires.

13 A person who is half a servant and half free, he should not partake of his masters, nor of his own until he attains his freedom.

14 To what extent can people be enumerated on a Paschal sacrifice? Until there is an olive-sized portion for each one.

One may be enumerated upon it and remove himself from it until it is slaughtered. Once it is slaughtered, he may not remove himself from it, for it was already slaughtered on his behalf.

The following rules apply when some people were enumerated on a sacrificial animal and others came and enumerated themselves on the same animal. If there is an olive-sized portion for the first, they may partake of it and are exempt from bringing a second Paschal sacrifice. The later ones who were added until there was not an olive-sized portion for each person should not partake of it and are obligated to offer a second Paschal sacrifice.

15 When a person enumerates others on his portion of the Paschal sacrifice without the other members of his company knowing, the members of the company are entitled to give him his portion after it was roasted at the time when the sacrifice is eaten. The members of the company partake of their portion and he eats together with the others whom he enumerated in a second company.

Similarly, if one of the members of a company is a glutton, the members of the company are permitted to remove him and give him his portion which he will eat in his own company. If he is not a glutton, they may not divide.

Chapter 3

1 The following rules apply when a person tells his servant: "Go and sacrifice a Paschal sacrifice for me." Even though his master usually slaughters a lamb every year and the servant slaughtered a goat - or his master would usually slaughter a goat and he went and slaughtered a lamb, the master may partake of it, since he did not explicitly say: "Slaughter this particular type."

If the servant went and slaughtered both a kid and a lamb, the master may not partake of either of them. Instead, they should be taken to the place where sacrifices are burnt, because one may not be enumerated on two Paschal sacrifices. If, however, it was a king or queen who told his servant to sacrifice an animal for him and the servant slaughtered a kid and a lamb, the king or queen may partake of the one slaughtered first. This leniency was granted to placate the king.

2 When one tells his agent: "Go out and slaughter a Paschal sacrifice for me" and establishes that he wants either a kid or a lamb slaughtered, but the agent forgot what the principal told him, the agent should slaughter both a kid and a lamb and say: "If the principal told me to slaughter a kid, the kid should be his and the lamb, mine. If he told me to slaughter a lamb, the lamb should be his and the kid, mine."

In such a situation, if the principal also forgot what he told the agent, both animals should be taken to the place where sacrifices are burnt. If the principal forgot before the blood was cast on the altar, they are obligated to bring a second Paschal sacrifice. If he forgot after the blood was cast on the altar, he is exempt from bring a second Paschal sacrifice.

The same also applies if one tells a Canaanite servant: "Go and slaughter a Paschal sacrifice for me," and he established the type of sacrifice he desired and the servant forgot what his master told him, provided the shepherd of his master gives him a kid and a lamb and tells him: "Slaughter both of them so that you will have slaughtered one according to the instructions of your master. And one shall be yours on the condition that your master has no portion in it." If the shepherd does this, it will be possible for the servant to make the stipulation described above.

3 The following rules apply if the members of a company tell a person: "Go and slaughter a Paschal sacrifice for us," and he tells them: "And you should slaughter for me." If they slaughtered an animal and he slaughtered an animal, they should eat from the animal slaughtered first and the one slaughtered last should be taken to the place where sacrifices are burnt.

4 The following laws apply when the animal designated as a Paschal sacrifice of a company is lost and they tell one of the members of the company: "Go, search for it, and slaughter it for us." He went, found the Paschal sacrifice that was lost, and slaughtered it and they took another animal for a Paschal sacrifice and slaughtered it. If his was slaughtered first, he partakes of his sacrifice and they partake of it with him and the second one should be burnt. If theirs was slaughtered first, they should partake of their sacrifice and he should partake of his own. If it is not known which was slaughtered first or they were both slaughtered at the same time, he should partake of his own, but they should not eat with him. Their sacrifice should be taken to the place where sacrifices are burnt, but they are exempt from bringing a second Paschal sacrifice.

5 The following laws apply when the agent told the members of the company who sent him to search for the Paschal sacrifice that was lost and to slaughter it: "If I come late, slaughter a Paschal sacrifice for me," and then he went and found the lost animal and slaughtered it, but they also took another animal for a Paschal sacrifice and slaughtered it. If theirs is slaughtered first, they should partake of their own and he should eat with them. The second one should be burnt. If his is slaughtered first, he should partake of his own and they should partake of their own. If it is not known which was slaughtered first or they were both slaughtered at the same time, they should partake of theirs, but he does not partake of it with them. His sacrifice should be taken to the place where sacrifices are burnt, but he is exempt from bringing a second Paschal sacrifice.

6 The following laws apply if the Paschal sacrifice of a company was lost and the Paschal sacrifice of an individual was lost. He told them: "Go, search for it, and slaughter for me" and they told him: "Go, search for it, and slaughter for us." If he went, found the lost animal, and slaughtered it and they went, found the lost animal, and slaughtered it, they should all eat from the first one slaughtered and the second should be burnt. If it is not known which was slaughtered first or they were both slaughtered at the same time, they should both be burnt and they are all exempt from bringing a second Paschal sacrifice.

If he went to search for the lost animal and they went to search for the lost animal, but they did not tell each other anything, neither one has any responsibility to the other. Since they said nothing explicitly and did not tell each other anything, this applies even if, in their hearts, they had the intent that each one would slaughter for the other and there were gestures and other matters from which it could be assessed that they all agreed that whoever finds the lost animal should slaughter for the sake of the other.

7 The following rules apply when the Paschal sacrifices of two companies become intermingled before they are slaughtered. One company takes one lamb from the mixture and the other takes the second. One of the members of one company should go to the other and one of the members of the second company should go the first. Each of the companies say to the person who came to join them: "If this Paschal sacrifice is ours, you are removed from your Paschal sacrifice and enumerated on ours. If, however, this Paschal sacrifice is yours, we are removed from our Paschal sacrifice and enumerated on yours."
Similarly, if there were five groups with at least five persons in each or ten groups of at least ten, a member of every company is taken to each other company and such stipulations are made. Afterwards, they slaughter the sacrificial animals.

8 When the Paschal sacrifices of two individuals become intermingled, one should take one of the Paschal sacrifices that are intermingled and the other should take the other. One should add another outsider to his Paschal sacrifice and the other should add an outsider, so that there be two companies. Afterwards, one of the two will go to the others and one of the others will go to the one and each one will stipulate with the person who came to him from the other company. Each should say: "If this Paschal sacrifice is mine, you are removed from your Paschal sacrifice and enumerated on mine. If, however, this Paschal sacrifice is yours, I am removed from our Paschal sacrifice and enumerated on yours." Thus no one has lost anything.

9 When the hides of the Paschal sacrifices of five companies become intermingled and a disqualifying growth was discovered on the hide of one of them, all the sacrifices must be taken to the place where sacrifices are burnt. If they were intermingled before the blood was cast on the altar, they are all obligated to bring the second Paschal sacrifice.

If, however, the sacrificial animals became intermingled after the blood was cast, they are exempt from bringing the second Paschal sacrifice. For if they would offer a second Paschal sacrifice, the ones who offered an acceptable sacrifice on the first Pesach will be bringing non-sacrificial animals to the Temple Courtyard. If they would all be enumerated on one Paschal sacrifice, it would be slaughtered for those who are not obligated. That is equivalent to having it sacrificed for the sake of those who were not enumerated upon it. If each one of them brought a sacrifice for the second Paschal sacrifice and made a stipulation saying: "If it is not a Paschal sacrifice, it should be considered as a peace-offering," that is undesirable. For the blood of the Paschal sacrifice is poured on the altar, while the blood of a peace-offering is dashed and, as an initial preference, blood that should be dashed should not be poured. Hence they are exempt from a second Paschal sacrifice.

Chapter 4

1 We already explained in Hilchot Pesulei HaMukdashim that a Paschal sacrifice is slaughtered only for the sake of a Paschal sacrifice and only for the sake of its owners. If it was slaughtered for the sake of another type of sacrifice, it is unacceptable.

When a person slaughters a Paschal sacrifice for the members of a company and, at a later time, told them: "That Paschal sacrifice that I slaughtered for you was not slaughtered with the proper intent," they should rely on his words if they consider him trustworthy. If not, according to the letter, his word is not accepted. If one desires to be stringent with himself and bring a second Paschal sacrifice, he is praiseworthy.

2 When the meat of the Paschal sacrifice becomes impure and one becomes aware of this before the blood is poured on the altar, it should not be poured on the altar even though the fats and organs are pure. The rationale is that the Paschal sacrifice is offered only with the intent that it be eaten. If the blood is poured on the altar, it is not acceptable.

If one does not become aware until the blood was poured, it is acceptable. For the High Priest's forehead plate generates appeasement for blood offered unintentionally when meat became impure, but it does not generate appeasement for intentional violation.

If a portion of the limbs of the Paschal sacrifice become impure, he should burn those which became impure and partake of those which are pure. If the fats and organs become impure while the meat is intact, the blood should be poured and the meat eaten in the evening.

If the owners become impure after the Paschal sacrifice was slaughtered, the blood should not be poured. If it is poured, it is not acceptable.

Therefore they are obligated to bring a second Paschal sacrifice. For the High Priest's forehead plate does not generate appeasement for bodily impurity unless the person became impure due to "impurity likened to the depths," as we explained in Hilchot Bi'at HaMikdash.

3 When a Paschal sacrifice was taken out of Jerusalem or it became impure on the fourteenth of Nisan, it should be burnt immediately. When the owners became impure, died, or remove themselves - even if they became impure or died before the blood was poured on the altar - it should be left overnight and burnt afterwards.

This is the general principle: Whenever there is a disqualifying factor involving the actual body of the sacrifice, it should be burnt immediately. If the disqualifying factor involves the blood or the owners, it should be left overnight and then burnt. Therefore if it was slaughtered after it was known that the owners removed themselves from the sacrifice, died, or became impure and thus their obligation was postponed until the second Pesach, their first Paschal sacrifice should be burnt immediately.

When does the statement that the Paschal sacrifice should be burnt if the owners become impure apply? When all of the members of the company become impure. If, however, only some of them become impure, those who remain pure acquire the portions of those who became impure. Even if those who became impure incurred their impurity after they began eating, those who were pure who did not begin eating as of yet, acquire their portion.

If, however, all of them began eating and some of them became impure, those who remain pure do not acquire the portions of those who became impure. Instead, those who remain pure should partake of their portions and the portions of those who became impure should be burnt. This also applies if a portion of the owners died.

If the Paschal sacrifice became impure after those impure began eating, those who remained pure acquire their portions. If, however, they all had begun to eat and some of them became impure, those who remained pure do not acquire the portions of those who became impure. Instead, those who remained pure should eat their own portion and the portions of those who became impure should be burnt. These same laws apply if some of those enumerated on the sacrifice died.

If the entire Paschal sacrifice or its majority becomes impure, it should be burnt in front of the Temple in the presence of everyone to embarrass its owners, so that in the future they will show greater care. It should be burnt with wood designated for the altar so that suspicion about them will not be aroused and it be said: "They stole wood designated for the altar." Therefore if they burn it with straw and reeds and desire to burn it with their own straw, they may.

If less than half of it became impure, and similarly, any meat left over from the Paschal sacrifice, should be burnt in their own courtyards from their own wood. Wood designated for the altar should not be used, so that it will not remain in their possession and they misappropriate it.

4 If one set aside a female animal for his Paschal sacrifice or a male animal in its second or third year of life, it should be allowed to pasture until it contracts a disqualifying blemish. Then it should be sold and a Paschal sacrifice brought with the proceeds of the sale. If it did not contract a blemish until after he offered his Paschal sacrifice, he should bring a peace-offering with the proceeds of the sale.

5 When a person sets aside a Paschal sacrifice and dies, his son should not bring it afterwards as a Paschal sacrifice, but as a peace-offering. If the son was enumerated on the Paschal sacrifice together with his father, he may bring it as a Paschal sacrifice.

When does the above apply? When his father dies after midday on the fourteenth of Nisan. If, however, he died before midday on the fourteenth, the son is deferred to the second Pesach, because he is in the acute state of onain mourning, as will be explained. He should bring this animal as a Paschal sacrifice on the second Pesach.

6 The following laws apply if a person's Paschal sacrifice was lost and then he found it after he set aside another Paschal sacrifice and they are both standing before him. He should sacrifice whichever one he desires for the sake of a Paschal sacrifice and the other should be offered as a peace-offering.

If he finds it after he slaughtered another animal as a Paschal sacrifice, the one that he found should be offered as a peace-offering. Similarly, if he transferred the holiness of the animal he found after the slaughter of its replacement, the animal unto which the holiness was transferred should be sacrificed as a peace-offering. If, however, he found it before the other he set aside was slaughtered, different rules apply. Since the animal that was found is fit to be offered as a Paschal sacrifice and it is fit to be offered as a peace-offering, as explained above, if he transferred the holiness of the animal that was found whether before the slaughter of the one designated in its place or afterwards, the animal to which its holiness is transferred is not sacrificed. Instead, it is left to pasture until it contracts a blemish. Then a peace-offering is brought with the proceeds of its sale.

7 An animal designated as a Paschal sacrifice that becomes more than a year old or a peace-offering brought from an animal that was originally designated as Paschal sacrifice is considered as a peace-offering in all contexts. It requires semichah, accompanying offerings, and the waving of the breast and thigh. These requirements do not apply with regard to the Paschal sacrifice.

8 When an animal designated as a Paschal sacrifice becomes intermingled with animals designated as peace-offerings, they should all be brought as peace-offerings. If it became intermingled with an animal designated as another type of offering, the two should be allowed to pasture until they contract disqualifying physical blemishes. An animal equivalent to the value of the more expensive of the two should be brought for each type of sacrifice and the owner should forfeit the remainder from his resources, as explained in Hilchot Pesulei HaMukdashim.

If a Paschal sacrifice becomes intermingled with firstborn animals, they should be allowed to pasture until they contract disqualifying physical blemishes and then they should be eaten according to the laws pertaining to a blemished firstborn animal. And he should bring an animal equivalent to the most valuable one in the mixture and say: "Wherever the Paschal sacrifice is, its holiness should be transferred to this animal." That animal should be brought as a peace-offering if his Paschal sacrifice was already offered.

9 When one sets aside an animal for a Paschal sacrifice before he converts and then converts or a Canaanite servant sets one aside before he is freed and then he is freed, or a child sets one aside before he manifests signs of physical maturity and then he manifests them, he may offer it for the sake of a Paschal sacrifice. The rationale is that living animals are not deemed unacceptable forever, as explained in Hilchot Pesulei HaMukdashim.

10 If one set aside money for his Paschal sacrifice and there was some left over, he should use the remainder for a peace-offering. If someone enumerates others on his Paschal sacrifice and festive offering, the money he takes from them for their portion is considered as ordinary funds. Even though this one set aside a lamb for his Paschal sacrifice and this one set aside money, and then one took that money and enumerated the other on his Paschal sacrifice, the money is considered as ordinary funds. For the Jews consecrated their Paschal sacrifices and festive offerings and the money for their Paschal sacrifices and festive offerings with this stipulation.

11 The wood used for roasting the Paschal sacrifice is equivalent to the Paschal sacrifice. Similarly, the matzah and bitter herbs, since they are necessary elements for the Paschal sacrifice, are equivalent to the Paschal sacrifice. If one took money from the money for the Paschal sacrifice from someone who was enumerated with him to enumerate him on the matzah and the bitter herbs or so that he will own a portion of the wood used to roast it, the money is considered as ordinary funds.

1 When someone was impure at the time of the slaughter of the Paschal sacrifice and the Paschal sacrifice could not be slaughtered for him, was "on a distant way," he was prevented because of other reasons, or inadvertently failed to offer the first Paschal sacrifice, he should bring a Paschal sacrifice on the fourteenth of the second month in the afternoon. Slaughtering this Paschal sacrifice is an independent positive commandment and supersedes the Sabbath prohibitions. For the second Pesach is not compensation for the first, but an independent festival. Therefore one is liable for karet for failing to bring the sacrifice.

2 What is implied? If a person inadvertently or because of forces beyond his control failed to offer the first Paschal sacrifice, if he intentionally refrained from offering the second, he is liable for karet. If he inadvertently did not offer the second Paschal sacrifice or was held back due to forces beyond his control, he is exempt from karet. If he intentionally did not offer the first Paschal sacrifice, he may offer the second. If he did not offer the second Paschal sacrifice, even if his lapse was unintentional, he is liable for karet. The rationale is that he did not offer God's sacrifice at the appointed time and was willful in his omission. If, however, he was impure or "on a distant way" and did not offer the first Paschal sacrifice, he is not liable for karet even though he willfully did not bring the second. The rationale is that on the first Pesach, he was already exempt from karet.

3 When someone was "on a distant way" on the fourteenth of Nisan, but the Paschal sacrifice was nevertheless sacrificed on his behalf and the blood was poured on the altar for him, it is not accepted and he is obligated to offer a second Paschal sacrifice even though he came in the evening.

4 When a person is impure, but could purify himself to partake of the first Paschal sacrifice, and yet refrains from immersing himself and instead, remains in a state of impurity until the time for offering the sacrifices passes, he is considered as having intentionally failed to sacrifice the first Paschal sacrifice. This ruling also applies to an uncircumcised person who does not circumcise himself until the time for the sacrifice passes. Therefore if these individuals do not offer the second Paschal sacrifice - even if their failure to do so is inadvertent - they are liable for karet.

5 Just as the failure to circumcise oneself holds a person back from offering the Paschal sacrifice, so too, the failure to circumcise one's children below the age of majority and the failure to circumcise all of one's Canaanite servants, whether above majority or below majority, holds him back, as Exodus 12:48 states: "He shall circumcise all males, then he will draw close to offer it." If one offered the Paschal sacrifice before circumcising the above individuals, the Paschal sacrifice is invalidated.
Similarly, the immersion of one's Canaanite maidservants in a mikveh for the sake of servitude holds one back from offering the Paschal sacrifice.

This matter is part of the received tradition: immersion for maidservants is equivalent to circumcision for servants.

6 The circumcision of his servants and the immersion of his maidservants does not prevent a minor from being enumerated on a Paschal sacrifice, as indicated by ibid.:44: "Any servant of a man." This excludes a minor.

7 A convert who converts between the first Pesach and the second Pesach and similarly, a child who comes of age between these two holidays are obligated to offer the second Paschal sacrifice. If one slaughtered the first Paschal sacrifice for the sake of the minor, the minor is exempt from bringing the second sacrifice.

8 When the obligation of women is postponed until the second Pesach, whether because of forces beyond their control, inadvertent omission, impurity, or because they were "on a distant way," offering the second Paschal sacrifice is optional for them. If they desire, they may have the offering slaughtered; if they do not desire, they don't. Therefore one should not slaughter a Paschal sacrifice only for women when the second Pesach falls on the Sabbath. If, however, a woman is part of the company offering a second Paschal sacrifice, it is permitted.
What is meant by the term "on a distant way" which exempts a person from bringing a Paschal sacrifice? Fifteen mil outside the walls of Jerusalem.

9 If one was fifteen mil or more outside of Jerusalem at the appearance of the sun on the fourteenth of Nisan, he is considered to be "on a distant way." If he was closer than this, he is not considered to be "on a distant way," because he could reach Jerusalem after midday while walking comfortably by foot.

If he journeyed and did not reach Jerusalem in time, because he was held back by a press of animals or he was in Jerusalem, but was infirm in his legs and did not reach the Temple Courtyard until the time for the offering of the sacrifice passed, he is considered as having been held back by forces beyond his control, but not "on a distant way."

If someone was imprisoned outside the walls of Jerusalem and was promised to be released in the evening, the offering may be slaughtered on his behalf and when he is released in the evening, he may partake of it.

When does the above apply? When he was imprisoned by Jews. If, by contrast, he was imprisoned by gentiles, the Paschal sacrifice should not be slaughtered on his behalf until he is released. If, however, it was slaughtered on his behalf and he was released, he may partake of it. If he was not released, he is exempt from bringing a second Paschal sacrifice, since the sacrifice was slaughtered on his behalf.

Similar laws apply when a Paschal sacrifice was slaughtered for a person in the acute state of onain mourning, for an invalid, or for an elderly person who could have partaken of the sacrifice who became impure after the blood was poured on the altar and thus they are no longer able to partake of it. They are exempt from offering the second Paschal sacrifice.

1 Which impure individuals are prevented from offering until the second

Pesach? Anyone who cannot partake of the Paschal sacrifice on the fifteenth of Nisan because of his impurity, e.g., zavim, zavot, niddot, women impure because of childbirth, and those who were intimate with a women in the niddah state. By contrast, those who are impure because they touched an animal corpse, a dead crawling animal, and the like on the day of the fourteenth of Nisan, should immerse themselves and the Paschal sacrifice should be sacrificed on their behalf after they immerse themselves. In the evening, when the day of their impurity is concluded, they may partake of the Paschal sacrifice.

2 When the seventh day of the purification process of one who is impure because of contact with a human corpse falls on the fourteenth of Nisan - even though he has immersed himself and had the ashes of the red heifer sprinkled upon him and thus he is fit to partake of sacrificial foods in the evening - the Paschal sacrifice should not be slaughtered for him. His offering is postponed until the second Pesach. This is derived from Numbers 9:6 "And the men who were impure because of a human corpse and were not able to offer the Paschal sacrifice on that day." According to the Oral Tradition, it was taught that this occurred on the seventh day of their purification process. This is what they were asking: Should the Paschal sacrifice be slaughtered for them and they would partake of it in the evening? Moses explained to them that it should not be slaughtered for them.

When does the above apply? When one became impure because of one of the types of impurity for which a Nazirite would be required to shave. If, however, one became impure because of other types of impurity resulting from contact with a corpse for which a Nazirite is not required to shave, the Paschal sacrifice may be slaughtered for him on the seventh day of his purification process after he immersed himself and had the ashes of the red heifer sprinkled upon him. In the evening, when the day of his impurity is concluded, he may partake of the Paschal sacrifice.

3 When a zav experiences two discharges and then counts seven clean days and immerses on the seventh day, the Paschal sacrifice may be sacrificed on his behalf and he may partake of it in the evening. If he experienced a zav discharge after the blood was cast on the altar, he is exempt from bringing the second Paschal sacrifice.

Similarly, a woman who is watching a day because of a discharge on the previous day may immerse on the day she is watching, as explained in the laws of forbidden relations. The Paschal sacrifice may be slaughtered on her behalf and she may partake of it in the evening. If she experiences uterine bleeding after the blood of the Paschal sacrifice was cast on the altar, she is exempt from bringing the second Paschal sacrifice.

A Paschal sacrifice is not slaughtered on behalf of a woman who is impure because of menstrual bleeding on her seventh day of impurity. For she may not immerse herself until the night of the eighth day and she is not fit to partake of sacrificial meat until the night of the ninth day.

4 When the day when one of those requiring atonement may bring his sacrifice falls on the fourteenth of Nisan, one may slaughter the Paschal sacrifice on their behalf. Their sacrifices may be offered on the fourteenth of Nisan, whether before the Paschal sacrifice is slaughtered or afterwards.

They may partake of their Paschal sacrifices in the evening.

We do not slaughter the Paschal sacrifice on their behalf until they entrust their sacrifices required to regain purity to the court, lest they be negligent and fail to offer them.

5 When the eighth day of the purification process of a person suffering from tzara'at falls on the fourteenth of Nissan, but he experiences a seminal emission that day, he may immerse himself, enter the Women's Courtyard, and bring his sacrifices. Although a person who immersed on a particular day is forbidden from entering the Temple Courtyard that day, as was explained in Hilchot Bi'at HaMikdash, since this is the day that the Paschal sacrifice is to be offered at its appointed time, a positive commandment whose omission is punishable by karet comes and supersedes a Rabbinic commandment.

6 When the seventh day of the purification process of one who became impure due to contact with a human corpse falls on the Sabbath, the ashes of the Red Heifer are not sprinkled upon him until the following day. Even if his seventh day falls on the thirteenth of Nisan which is a Sabbath, the sprinkling of the ashes should be postponed until the fourteenth. The ashes should be sprinkled upon him, but the Paschal sacrifice should not be slaughtered on his behalf, as we explained. Instead, his offering is postponed and he brings the second Paschal sacrifice.

One might argue: The prohibition against sprinkling the ashes on the Sabbath was instituted as a shvut and the failure to bring the Paschal sacrifice is punishable by karet. How then could the Sages uphold their prohibition in the face of a prohibition punishable by karet? In resolution, it can be explained that the day on which he is forbidden to have the ashes sprinkled upon him is not the time when the sacrifice punishable by karet is obligated to be brought. Therefore they upheld their words as instituted, even though this matter will lead to it having to stand in a place punishable by karet.

7 When an uncircumcised Jew circumcises himself on the day before Pesach, the Paschal sacrifice may be slaughtered on his behalf after his circumcision. The Paschal sacrifice should not, by contrast, be slaughtered on behalf of a convert who converted on the fourteenth of Nisan and circumcised himself and immersed in a mikveh, for he may not partake of the sacrifice in the evening. He is like one who departs from a grave who requires seven days of purification and then can he become pure. This is a decree lest this convert become impure due to contact with a corpse in the following year on the fourteenth of Nisan and immerse himself and seek to partake of the Paschal sacrifice in the evening, saying: "Last year, the Jews did this for me, when I circumcised myself and immersed, and partook of the Paschal sacrifice in the evening."

Behold, this decree is of Rabbinic origin and the failure to bring the Paschal sacrifice is punishable by karet. How then could the Sages uphold their prohibition in the face of a prohibition punishable by karet on the day of the sacrifice which is the fourteenth of Nisan? The rationale is that the convert is not obligated in the observance of mitzvot until he circumcises himself and immerses himself in a mikveh. He should not immerse himself until he becomes healed from the circumcision, as we explained with regard to the concept of conversion. Therefore they upheld their words in this instance, because this person who circumcised himself should not have immersed until he was healed. Thus he would not have incurred an obligation to bring the Paschal sacrifice at all.

8 If a person came through a beit hapras, he should proceed and sift, proceed and sift. If he did not find a bone and did not contract impurity, he should slaughter and partake of his Paschal sacrifice, even though he walked in a beit hapras. The rationale is that the impurity of a beit hapras is a Rabbinic institution, as will be explained in Hilchot Tum'at Meit, and the Sages did not uphold their decree in the face of an obligation punishable by karet, as we explained. Similarly, a beit hapras that was trod upon is pure with regard to bringing a Paschal sacrifice.

9 A person in the acute state of onein mourning is fit to partake of the Paschal sacrifice in the evening. The rationale is that the restrictions of aninut at night are Rabbinic in origin and our Sages did not uphold their decree in the face of an obligation punishable by karet. Instead, the Paschal sacrifice should be slaughtered on his behalf. He must immerse and afterwards partake of it. The immersion is necessary so that he makes a distinction from the state of aninut and does not divert his attention.

When does the above apply? When the deceased for whom he must mourn passes away after midday on the fourteenth of Nisan and thus he was already obligated to bring the Paschal sacrifice. If, however, the deceased passed away before midday, the Paschal sacrifice should not be slaughtered on his behalf. Instead, his offering is postponed until the second Pesach. If, however, the Paschal sacrifice was slaughtered on his behalf and the blood poured on the altar, he should immerse himself and partake of it in the evening.

If the deceased relative passed away on the thirteenth of Nisan and was buried on the fourteenth, on the day of the burial, he must observe aninut according to Rabbinic decree and that decree does not encompass the night following the fourteenth. Therefore one may slaughter the Paschal sacrifice on his behalf. He should immerse and partake of it and other sacrifices in the evening. The day when one hears of a close relative's death and the day when one gathers the bones of one's dead is equivalent to the day of burial. Therefore if one had the bones of his dead gathered on the fourteenth of Nisan or heard that a close relative died, the Paschal sacrifice may be slaughtered on his behalf. He immerses himself and may partake of sacrificial food in the evening.

10 When a person is digging in a mound from an avalanche in search of the body of a deceased person, the Paschal sacrifice should not be slaughtered on his behalf, lest he find a corpse in the mound and he be impure at the time of slaughter. If the Paschal sacrifice was slaughtered on his behalf and a corpse was not found, he may partake of the sacrifice in the evening.

The following rules apply if the corpse was discovered after the blood was poured on the altar. If it became known to him that he was certainly impure at the time the blood was poured, e.g., the mound was round, he is obligated in the second Paschal sacrifice. If the matter is in doubt, i.e., maybe he was not standing over the impurity at the time the blood was poured and did not become impure until afterwards, he is exempt from the second Paschal sacrifice.

11 The following rules apply when a person journeyed on a road and later a corpse was discovered lying across the width of the road. If the corpse could be deemed as the impurity likened to the depths, even though the person is considered as impure with regard to terumah, he is considered as pure with regard to the Paschal sacrifice. He may slaughter and partake of the Paschal sacrifice even though it is possible that he touched the corpse. Since the impurity is likened to the depths, he is pure with regard to the Paschal sacrifice. Even though the corpse is intact and extends from one end of the path to the other, he may offer his Paschal sacrifice unless he knows with certainty that he became impure because of it.

When does the above apply? When he was walking on foot, for it is possible that he did not touch it. If, however, he was riding on a beast or carrying a burden, he is impure even though it is impurity likened to the depths, for it is impossible that he will not have touched, moved, or stood over the corpse. We have already explained impurity likened to the depths in Hilchot Nizirut.

12 When a person offered the Paschal sacrifice under the presumption that he was pure and afterwards, it was discovered that he was impure due to impurity likened to the depths, he is not obligated in the second Paschal sacrifice. This is a law conveyed by the Oral Tradition. If, however, it becomes known to him that he was impure due to impurity that was known, he is obligated in the second Paschal sacrifice.

13 When a person contracted impurity from a human corpse and had the ashes of the red heifer sprinkled upon him on the third and seventh day [as required], but on his seventh day he unknowingly became impure because of a grave "likened to the depths" and brought a Paschal sacrifice under the presumption that he was pure and afterwards, he discovered that he had contracted the impurity "likened to the depths," he is not obligated in the second Paschal sacrifice, for once he immersed himself on the seventh day, his initial impurity ceased. If, however, he had contracted the impurity "likened to the depths" on the sixth day of his impurity and without knowing, he brought a Paschal sacrifice, he is obligated in the second Paschal sacrifice. The rationale is that a person who is impure must operate under the presumption that he is impure until he has definitely become pure, because there is a basis for the presumption of his impurity.

Chapter 7

1 The following rules apply when there were many individuals who were ritually impure due to contact with a human corpse on the first Pesach. If they were the lesser portion of the Jewish people, their offering is postponed to the second Pesach like other impure individuals. If, however, the majority of the Jewish people were impure due to contact with a human corpse or the priests or the sacred utensils were impure due to contact with a human corpse, their offering is not postponed. Instead, they should all offer the Paschal sacrifice in a state of ritual impurity, those ritually impure together with those who are pure.

This is derived from Numbers 9:6 which states: "And the men who were impure because of contact with the corpse of a human soul." Implied is that the offerings of individuals are postponed until the second Pesach, but those of the community are not postponed. This concept applies only with regard to the ritual impurity associated with a human corpse, as explained in Hilchot Bi'at HaMikdash.

2 If the Jewish people were half ritually pure and half impure, they should all offer the sacrifice on the first Pesach. Those who are pure offer the sacrifice by themselves in a state of ritual purity and those who are impure offer it by themselves in a state of impurity and partake of it in impurity. If the impure outnumbered the pure even by one, they should all offer it in impurity.

3 If the men were half impure due to contact with a human corpse and half pure and when you count the women together with the men, the majority will be pure, those who are pure should offer the first Paschal sacrifice. Those who are impure do not bring neither the first Paschal sacrifice or the second. They do not bring the first, because they are the lesser portion of the people. And they do not bring the second, because the women's offering of the second Paschal sacrifice is a matter of choice. Thus the impure persons are merely half the people and half the people do not bring the second Paschal sacrifice.

4 If the majority of the Jewish people were zavim, afflicted by tzara'at, or had relationships with niddot and the lesser portion were impure due to contact with a human corpse, those impure because of contact with a corpse should not offer the first Paschal sacrifice, because they are the lesser portion of the people. Nor do they offer the second, because individuals do not bring the second except at the time the majority of the people offered the first Paschal sacrifice. In this instance, since the majority of the Jewish people did not offer the first Paschal sacrifice, the lesser portion who are impure because of contact with a corpse should not bring the second Paschal sacrifice.

5 If the majority of the Jewish people were impure because of contact with a human corpse and a lesser portion were zavim and the like, those who are impure because of contact with a corpse offer the first Paschal sacrifice, and those who are zavim and the like do not offer either the first Paschal sacrifice or the second. They do not offer the first, because the restrictions against offering in a state of impurity were suspended with regard to communal offerings only for those impure due to contact with a human corpse. Nor do they bring the second, because a second Paschal sacrifice is brought only when the first was brought in a state of ritual purity. If the first was brought in a state of impurity, there is no second offering.

6 The following laws apply when a third of the Jewish people were pure, a third were zavim and the like, and a third were impure because of contact with a human corpse. Those who were impure because of contact with a corpse should not offer the first Paschal sacrifice, nor the second. They do not offer the first, because they are the lesser portion when compared to the aggregate of those who are pure and the zavvim. They should not offer the second, because the lesser portion of the people offered the first, as we explained.

How do we calculate whether the majority of the people are impure or pure? We do not make a calculation of all those who seek to partake of it, because it is possible that 20 people will be enumerated on one Paschal sacrifice and they will send it with one person to slaughter it on their behalf. Instead, we calculate all of those who seek to enter the Temple Courtyard while they are outside. Before the first group enters the Temple Courtyard, the calculation is made.

7 When an individual becomes impure because of a questionable situation regarding ritual impurity in a private domain, as will be explained in the appropriate place, his offering is postponed until the second Pesach. When the majority of the Jewish people become impure because of a questionable situation in a private domain, they should all offer it in a state of impurity.

8 When the Paschal sacrifice was offered in a state of impurity, it should also be eaten in a state of impurity, for from the outset, it was brought only to be eaten. It may not be eaten by all those who are impure, only by those impure because of contact with a human corpse. For them, this impurity is suspended. This also applies to those impure because of contact with other sources of impurity.

Those who are impure because of an impurity that results from a physical condition, e.g., zavvim, zavot, niddot, women after childbirth, those afflicted by tzara'at, should not partake of it. If, however, they do partake of it, they are exempt. According to the Oral Tradition, we learned that when a sacrifice is eaten by those who are pure, those who are impure are liable for partaking of it in impurity. When it is eaten by those who are impure, there is no liability for partaking of it in impurity. Even if those who are impure because of contact with a human corpse partook of the fats and organs to be offered on the altar, they are exempt.

When does the statement that a Paschal sacrifice may be eaten while ritually impure apply? When the people became impure before the blood was poured on the altar. If, however, they became impure after the blood was poured, it should not be eaten.

9 If the Paschal sacrifice was slaughtered in a state of ritual purity and the majority of the Jewish people became impure before its blood was poured on the altar, the blood should be poured on the altar, but the Paschal sacrifice should not be eaten. This is a Rabbinical decree lest the majority of the people become impure after the blood was poured in a following year and it be eaten in a state of impurity.

The following rules apply if the sacred utensils were impure because of [contact with a dead crawling animal or the like. Although the sacred utensils do not cause the persons to become impure, as will be explained in the appropriate place, since they cause the meat to become impure, the Paschal sacrifice should only be brought by those who are pure and it should be eaten, even though it is impure. It is preferable that it be eaten when the meat is impure thus superseding only an ordinary negative prohibition than it be eaten by individuals whose bodies are impure. That would be a prohibition punishable by karet, as explained in Hilchot Pesulei HaMukdashim.

1 Partaking of the meat of the Paschal sacrifice on the night of the fifteenth of Nisan is a positive commandment, as Exodus 12:8 states: "And you shall eat the meat on this night, roasted on the fire. With matzot and bitter herbs shall you eat it."

2 Matzah and bitter herbs are not indispensable elements of the mitzvah. If one did not find matzah or bitter herbs, he fulfills his obligation by eating the meat of the Paschal sacrifice alone. There is no mitzvah to partake of bitter herbs without the Paschal sacrifice, as implied by Numbers 9:11: "Eat it with matzot and bitter herbs."

3 The optimum manner of performing the mitzvah is to partake of the Paschal sacrifice in a manner leading to satiation. Therefore if one sacrificed festive peace-offerings on the fourteenth of Nisan, one should partake of them first and then partake of the meat of the Paschal sacrifice to be satiated from the festive offering. Even if one does not eat more than an olive-size portion, he fulfills his obligation.
Similarly, partaking of the second Paschal sacrifice on the fifteenth of the month of Iyar is a positive commandment, as stated: "Eat it with matzot and bitter herbs."

4 Both of them are eaten only roasted with fire. One who partakes of an olive-sized portion from their meat lightly-roasted or cooked in liquid on the nights of Pesach is liable for lashes, as Exodus 12:9 states: "Do not partake of it lightly-roasted or cooked in water." If one partook of a Paschal sacrifice that was both lightly-roasted and cooked, he is liable for only one set of lashes, because both these forbidden activities are included in one prohibition.

If, before nightfall, one partakes of a Paschal sacrifice that was lightly-roasted or cooked, he is not liable for lashes, as can be inferred ffrom the continuation of the above verse: "except roasted in fire." Implied is that at the time it is a mitzvah to partake of the sacrifice roasted, one is liable for partaking of it lightly-roasted or cooked. If one partook of a sacrifice prepared in this manner while it was still day, he is exempt.

5 If one partook of an olive-sized portion of a roasted Paschal sacrifice while it is still day, he violates a positive commandment, as Exodus 12:8 states: "And they shall eat the meat on that night," i.e., at night and not during the day. A prohibition resulting from a positive commandment is considered as a positive commandment.

6 The term na which the Torah mentioned in its prohibition refers to meat which began to be subjected to fire. It became roasted slightly, but was not yet fit for human consumption. If, however, one partakes of the meat of the Paschal sacrifice while raw, he is not liable for lashes, but he did nullify a positive commandment, for it is written: "roasted with fire." Implied is that if it is not roasted, it is prohibited.

If one roasted it to the full extent until it became charred, he is exempt.

7 The term "cooked" which the Torah mentioned in its prohibition refers to cooking the meat in water, other liquids, or fruit juice. The use of the phrase bashail mevushal by Exodus 12:9 includes all types of cooking.

8 If one roasted it and afterwards cooked it, cooked it and afterwards, roasted it, or pot-roasted it, and partook of it, he is liable. It is, however, permitted to baste it with wine, oil, honey, all other liquids, and fruit juice — except water. After it is roasted, it is permitted to dip the meat in liquids and in fruit juice.

9 One may not roast the Paschal sacrifice on a stoneware utensil or a metal utensil, for it is written: "roasted with fire," i.e., and not roasted by anything else. Therefore if the utensil was perforated so that the fire could affect the meat, one may roast with it. One may not roast it with a metal spit, because the entire spit will be hot and will roast the meat where it touches it.

10 When one kindles an oven, removes all the fire, and then hangs the Paschal sacrifice in the oven and roasts it, it is forbidden to partake of it, because this is not "roasted with fire." If the sacrificial animal was cut up and hung over coals, it is considered "roasted with fire." If he roasted it over lime, clay, or the hot springs of Tiberias, it is forbidden, because this is not "roasted with fire."

How is the animal offered as a Paschal sacrifice roasted? One pierces it from its mouth until its anus with a wooden spit and hangs it in an oven with the fire beneath it.. One hangs its legs and its intestines in the oven, outside of it. One should not place them inside of its body cavity, for this is comparable to cooking. They would choose a pomegranate spit to roast it so that it will not cast its sap into the meat and cook it.

11 If the meat touches the earthenware sides or floor of the oven, one should skin off that place, because it is roasted because of the earthenware.

12 If its juices drip on the earthenware and then return to it, that place should be cut off. For any juice and liquid which it emits while being roasted is forbidden, for it is not roasted meat.

13 If its juices drip on flour, he should take a handful from the place the juice fell and discard it.

14 The following laws apply if one applied oil that is terumah to the Paschal sacrifice. If the company was made up of priests, they should partake of it. If the company was made up of Israelites and the meat is still raw, it should be washed and dried and then it may be roasted. If it has been roasted, the outer portion should be skinned off.

If oil from the second tithe was applied to it, one should not charge the other members of the company for its value, for the second tithe should not be redeemed in Jerusalem, as explained in the appropriate place.

We do not roast two Paschal sacrifices together lest they become intermingled. This applies even to a goat and a lamb.

15 We already stated in several places that the Paschal sacrifice should be eaten only until midnight to distance a person from transgression. According to Scriptural Law, one may partake of it throughout the entire night until dawn.

We already explained in Hilchot Chametz UMatzah that the Paschal sacrifice requires the recitation of Hallel during the time that it is being eaten and that the members of the company do not partake of the meat after they fell asleep, even if they did so at the beginning of the night.

Chapter 9

1 Anyone who partakes of a Paschal sacrifice may partake of it only in one company. It may not be removed from the company to partake of it. If one removes an olive-sized portion of meat from a Paschal sacrifice from one company to another company on the night of the fifteenth of Nisan, he is liable for lashes, as Exodus 12:46 states: "Do not remove the meat from the house to the outside, "for that prooftext uses a form of the word hotza'ah which is used with regard to the Sabbath. Therefore it is necessary that one remove the article from its initial place and place it down outside, as is true with regard to the prohibition against transferring an article from one domain to another on the Sabbath.

With regard to the Paschal sacrifice, one is not liable for removing meat from a company after it has already been removed once. Instead, since it was removed by the first person, it is disqualified.

From the doorframe of a house inward is considered as part of the house. From the doorframe outward, is considered as outside the house. The doorframe, i.e., the width of the entrance, is considered as outside. The windows and the width of the walls are considered as inside. The roofs and the lofts are not considered as part of the house.

2 When the meat of a Paschal sacrifice has been removed from its company - whether intentionally or inadvertently - it becomes forbidden to be eaten. It is comparable to the meat of sacrifices of the most sacred order that were taken outside the Temple Courtyard or sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity that were taken outside the walls of Jerusalem, in which instance, everything is considered like an animal that is treifah. One is liable for lashes for partaking of it, as stated in Hilchot Ma'aseh HaKorbanot.

When part of a limb of a sacrificial animal is removed from its designated area, one should cut through the meat, descending until he reaches the bone and then scrape off the meat. Whatever is within the designated area should be eaten. Whatever is outside should be burnt. When he reaches the bone, he should cut off the bone with a butcher's knife, if other sacrifices are involved. If it is a Paschal sacrifice - in which instance it is forbidden to break its bones, one should scrape off the meat until the joint, separate the limb whose portion was removed from the joint, and cast it outside.

3 When two companies are partaking of their Paschal sacrifices in one house, each company must delineate its borders with a partition. From the words "from the meat... outside," the Oral Tradition taught that the place outside the place where it is being eaten must be designated. Thus one company must turn their faces to one side and eat and the other must turn their faces to the other side and eat, so they will not appear as intermingled.

4 If the water with which they would mix their wines was in the center of the house, between the two companies, when the attendant rises to pour water, he should shut his mouth closed and then turn his face away from his company, keeping it closed until he returns to them. Only afterwards may he swallow what is in his mouth, for it is forbidden to partake of the Paschal sacrifice in two companies.

A bride is permitted to turn her face away from the company and partake of the Paschal sacrifice, because she is embarrassed to eat in their presence.

5 When the divider between two companies has been undone, they should not partake of their Paschal sacrifices. Similarly, if one company was partaking of a Paschal sacrifice and a divider was made separating some from the others, they should not partake of it until the divider is removed. The rationale is that a Paschal sacrifice may not be eaten in two companies and one should not move from one company to another.

6 The following rules apply when three or more members of a company come to partake of their Paschal sacrifice, but the other members of the company do not come. If they entered at the time most people partake of their Paschal sacrifices and the attendant called for the others and they did not come, they may enter and eat until satiation without waiting for the others. Even if those who came late come and see that the three consumed the entire sacrifice, they need not reimburse them for their portion. If, however, only two enter on time, they should wait.

When does this apply? When they enter to eat. When, however, they depart, no one has to wait for his colleague. Even if only one person finished eating, he may depart. He need not wait for the others.

7 One who gives an olive-sized portion of a Paschal sacrifice - whether the first Paschal sacrifice or the second - to an apostate who worships false deities, to a resident alien, or a gentile worker, violates a negative commandment, but is not liable for lashes. He is, however, liable for stripes for rebellious conduct.

The term "foreigner" mentioned in the Torah refers to one who worships alien deities. One may not give a portion of the Paschal sacrifice to a gentile, even a resident alien or a worker, as Exodus 12:45 states: "Neither a resident, nor an alien should partake of it."

8 An uncircumcised person who ate an olive-sized portion of the Paschal sacrifice is liable for lashes, as ibid.:48 states: "No uncircumcised person shall partake of it." That verse can also be interpreted as meaning: He may not partake "of it"; he may, however, partake of matzah and bitter herbs. Similarly, it is permitted to feed matzah and bitter herbs to a resident alien, or a gentile worker.

9 Just as the circumcision of one's sons and servants holds one back from slaughtering the Paschal sacrifice, so too, it holds him back from partaking of it, as ibid.:44 states: "He shall circumcise him, then he shall partake of it."

What is implied? One purchased a servant after the slaughter of the Paschal sacrifice or one had a son whose time for circumcision did not arrive until after the slaughter of the Paschal sacrifice. Such a person is forbidden to partake of the Paschal sacrifice until he circumcises them.

How is it possible for the son to be fit to be circumcised after the slaughter of the Paschal sacrifice, but not to be fit to be circumcised before its slaughtered? For example, he had a fever and seven full days are needed from the time at which he became healed, his eye hurt severely and he was healed after the slaughter of the Paschal sacrifice, or he was a tumtum and he was operated on after the slaughter of the Paschal sacrifice and it was discovered that he was male.

Chapter 10

1 A person who breaks a bone in a pure Paschal sacrifice is liable for lashes, as Exodus 12:46 states: "You shall not break a bone in it." And with regard to the second Paschal sacrifice, Numbers 9:12 states: "He shall not break a bone in it."
When, however, the Paschal sacrifice is brought in a state of impurity, one is not liable for lashes. According to the Oral Tradition, it was taught: "You shall not break in it," i.e., in a pure sacrifice, not an impure one.
Whether one breaks a bone of the Paschal sacrifice on the night of the fifteenth of Nisan, while it is still day on the fourteenth, or even after several days, he is liable for lashes.

2 For this reason, the bones of the Paschal sacrifice are burnt with the remainder of its meat so that they will not cause misfortune.

3 One is liable only for breaking a bone upon which there was an olive-sized portion of meat or which contains marrow. If, by contrast, a bone does not contain marrow and there is not an olive-sized portion of meat upon it, one is not liable for breaking it. If there was an olive-sized portion of meat on a bone, but one broke it in a place where there is no meat, he is liable, even though there is no meat where he broke the bone.

4 When one breaks a bone that is already broken, he is liable for lashes.

5 When one burns the bones of a Paschal sacrifice or cuts its sinews, he is not liable for breaking a bone.

6 When a Paschal sacrifice was lightly roasted or cooked and one broke a bone, he is liable for lashes. Even if it was disqualified because it contracted impurity, it was taken out of the home where it is being eaten, or the like, the prohibition against breaking its bones applies.

When does the above apply? When there was a time the Paschal sacrifice was acceptable and it was disqualified. If, however, there was never a time when it was acceptable, e.g., it became piggul or was brought with a disqualifying intent concerning time or with a disqualifying intent concerning the type of sacrifice, the prohibition against breaking a bone does not apply.

7 If one breaks the bone of the fat-tail, he is not liable, because it is not fit to be eaten.

8 Cartilage which is like soft bones are permitted to be eaten.

9 If the Paschal sacrifice was a small and tender kid goat whose bones are soft, they may not be eaten, because that is considered as breaking a bone. If one partakes of them he is liable for lashes, for the liability applies equally whether one breaks a firm bone or a soft bone,

This is the general principle: Whatever could be eaten in a large ox after it has been cooked may be eaten in a tender kid after it has been roasted, e.g., the cartilage around the joints and similar types of body tissue.

10 Soft sinews that will ultimately become firm, even though they are fit to be eaten at the time and may be eaten from the Paschal sacrifice, they are not considered when enumerating people on the sacrifice. Persons may be enumerated because of the brain in the head, because it is possible to remove it without breaking a bone. One may not be enumerated on the marrow in the hip bone - it is bone closed on both sides - because it is impossible to remove the marrow without breaking a bone.

11 When a person partakes of the Paschal sacrifice, he should cut off the meat and partake of it. He may cut off the bones at the joints and separate them if he desires.

When he reaches the sciatic nerve, he should remove it and place it with the remainder of sinews, bones, and membranes which are removed at the time of eating. It is not removed previously, as is done with regard to other meat.

The Paschal sacrifice should not be cut into pieces before it is roasted. Instead, it is roasted whole. If it was cut into pieces, it is acceptable, provided it is not lacking a limb.

A person should endeavor that none of the meat of the Paschal sacrifice remain until the morning, as Exodus 12:10 states: "Do not leave over any of it until the morning." Similarly, with regard to the second Paschal sacrifice, Exodus 12:10 states: "What remains from it, you shall burn in fire."

12 When the first Paschal sacrifice is offered, a peace-offering is sacrificed with it on the fourteenth of Nissan from cattle or from sheep, whether a large animal or a small one, like all other peace-offerings. It is called the festive-offering of the fourteenth. This is the intent of the Torah's statement Deuteronomy 16:2: "And you bring a Paschal offering to God your Lord from sheep and from cattle."

When is this festive-offering brought? When the Paschal sacrifice is offered during the week, in a state of ritual purity, and when there is a lack of Paschal sacrifices. If, however, the fourteenth of Nisan falls on the Sabbath, it is offered in a state of ritual impurity, or there are ample offerings, the festive-offering is not brought with it. Instead, only the Paschal sacrifices are brought.

13 The festive-offering brought on the fourteenth is a voluntary matter; it is not an obligation. It may be eaten for two days and one night like all other peace-offerings. It is forbidden to leave over the meat of the festive-offering of the fourteenth until the third day, as Deuteronomy 16:4 states: "Do not leave any of the meat that you will sacrifice in the evening for the first day until the morning." According to the Oral Tradition, it was taught that this is a warning for a person who leaves over the meat of the festive-offering of the fourteenth until the sixteenth. The term "until the morning" means until the morning of the second day. One who leaves over the meat is not liable for lashes. Instead, he should burn the left over meat in the same manner as meat left over from other sacrifices is burnt.

14 The meat of the festive-offering that was served on the table with the Paschal sacrifice and similarly, the other cooked dishes served with it should be burnt with it. They may only be eaten until midnight like the Paschal sacrifice itself. This is a decree lest a mixture occur.

15 What are the differences between the first Paschal sacrifice and the second Paschal sacrifice? At the time of the first, chametz is forbidden to be seen or possessed in one's domain. It may not be slaughtered while one is in possession of chametz. Its meat may not be removed from the company in which it was designated to be eaten. The Hallel must be recited when it is eaten. A festive-offering is brought with it. It may be brought in a state of impurity if the majority of the people are impure because of contact with a human corpse, as we explained.

With regard to the second Paschal sacrifice, by contrast, both chametz and matzah may be possessed by the person at home. Hallel is not recited while partaking of it. It may be taken out of the company in which it was designated to be eaten. A festive-offering is not brought with it and it may not be brought in a state of impurity.

Both are alike in that offering them supersedes the Sabbath prohibitions. Hallel is recited when they are offered. They are eaten roasted in one house together with matzah and bitter herbs. In neither instance may their meat be left over until the next morning, nor may their bones be broken.

Why does the second Paschal sacrifice not resemble the first in all matters, as might be expected since Numbers 9:12 states with regard to the second Paschal sacrifice: "It shall be offered according to all the statutes of the Paschal sacrifice"? Because some of the statutes of the Paschal sacrifice are explicitly mentioned with regard to it. This teaches that it is analogous to the first only in those matters which are stated explicitly regarding it. They are the mitzvot that concern the body of the sacrifice. They are "the statutes of the Paschal sacrifice" included in the general category.

The statements regarding the offering of the Paschal sacrifice in Egypt: that it should be set aside on the tenth of the month, that its blood should be applied to the lintel and the two doorposts with a bunch of hyssop, and that it should be eaten with haste, are not practices that are followed in future generations. They were observed only with regard to the Paschal sacrifice offered in Egypt.

Mishneh Torah, Festival Offering

Trans. by Eliyahu Touger, Moznaim Publishing

Chapter 1

1 The Jewish people have been commanded to observe three positive commandments on each of the three pilgrimage festivals. They are:

a) to appear before the Divine presence, as Exodus 23:17 states: "All of your males shall appear";

b) bringing a festive offering, as Deuteronomy 16:15 states: "You shall bring a festive offering to God your Lord"; and

c) celebration, as ibid.:14 states: "And you shall rejoice in festivals."

The Torah's charge to appear before God mandates that one should appear in the Temple Courtyard on the first day of a festival and bring with him a burnt-offering, whether from fowl or from domesticated animals. One who comes to the Temple Courtyard on the first day of a festival without bringing a burnt-offering has not only failed to perform a positive commandment, but has violated a negative commandment, as Exodus 23:15 states: "You shall not appear in My presence empty-handed." One is not liable for lashes for the violation of this prohibition, because he did not perform a deed.

The Torah's charge to bring a festive offering mandates that one offer a peace-offering on the first day of the festival when one comes to appear before the Divine presence. It is a known matter that peace-offerings are brought only from domesticated animals. Women are not obligated in these two mitzvot of appearing before the Divine presence and bringing a festive sacrifice.

The Torah's charge to celebrate on festivals mandates that one offer peace-offerings in addition to the festive peace-offerings. These are called the festive celebratory peace-offerings, as Deuteronomy 27:7 states: "You shall rejoice before God, your Lord." Women are obligated in this mitzvah.

2 According to Scriptural Law, there are no fixed measures with regard to the sacrifices brought when appearing before God or the festive offerings, as Deuteronomy 16:17 states: "Each person according to what he gives." According to Rabbinic Law, however, limits were established. One should not bring a burnt-offering to mark one's appearance worth less that a silver me'ah, nor should one bring a festive peace-offering worth less than two silver me'ah. It is a mitzvah to bring these sacrifices proportionate to one's wealth, as implied by the phrase: "according to what one gives...."

3 Our Sages did not establish a minimum measure for the celebratory peace-offerings. When a person will ascend to Jerusalem for the festival, if he is in possession of the sacrifices required when presenting oneself, he should bring them or he should bring sufficient silver to purchase a sacrificial animal. If he does not possess silver, he should not bring articles of value equivalent to silver. Even if he is in possession of articles worth several gold pieces, it is forbidden for him to ascend to Jerusalem empty-handed without silver or a sacrificial animal.

Why was one forbidden to ascend while bringing articles worth money? Perhaps he will not be able to sell them or perhaps he will find impurities in the money he receives.

4 One who did not offer the burnt-offering marking his appearance and his festive peace-offering on the first day of the festival should offer them on the remaining days of the festival, as implied by Deuteronomy 16:15: "For seven days you shall celebrate unto God your Lord." This teaches that all of these days are fit for offering festive sacrifices. They are all compensation for the first day.

5 It is a mitzvah to be early and to offer these sacrifices on the first day. If, either inadvertently or intentionally, one did not offer them on the first day, they should be offered on the second day. Whoever delays is deserving of reproach. Concerning such a person is applied the words of censure, Tzefaniah 3:18: "I will gather in and break those who delay the festive prayers and offerings."

6 If the festival passed without one bringing these festive offerings, he is not obligated to bring them afterwards. Concerning such a situation and the like is applied the verse Ecclesiastes 1:15: "A wrong that cannot be righted."

7 When one did not bring the festive sacrifices on the first day of the Sukkos holiday, he may bring them throughout the entire festival and on the final holiday, which is the eighth day. For even the eighth day can serve as compensation for the first.

Similarly, one who did not bring the festive offerings on the holiday of Shavuot may bring them for seven days, i.e., he may compensate during the six days that following the festival of Shavuot. This concept - that the festival of Shavuot is similar to the festival of Pesach with regard to compensation - was communicated through the Oral Tradition.

8 The burnt-offerings brought when appearing before God and the festive peace-offerings do not supersede either the Sabbath prohibitions or the restrictions against ritual impurity, because there is no fixed time when they are required to be brought like the communal offerings. For if one does not bring his festive offerings on one day, he may bring them on the next, as we explained.

They do, however, supersede the prohibitions of the holidays. Although sacrifices which one has vowed or pledged to bring are not offered on holidays, the burnt-offerings brought when appearing before God, the festive peace-offerings, and the celebratory peace-offerings are offered. The rationale is that these are not vows or pledges, but rather obligations.

9 When one brings the burnt-offerings brought when appearing before God, the festive peace-offerings, and the celebratory peace-offerings on a festival, he should lean on them with all his power as he does when bringing offerings on other days. Even though leaning on the animals is not an indispensable element of their sacrifice, as we explained in Hilchot Ma'aseh HaKorbanot, the Sages did not institute a decree forbidding this as a shvut.

10 When a person sets aside a burnt-offering brought when appearing before God and dies, his heirs are obligated to offer it.

It is permitted to offer sacrifices which one has vowed or pledged during the intermediate days of a holiday, as Numbers 29:39 states: "You will offer these to God on your festivals aside from your vowed and pledged offerings." It can be understood from this that those offerings are brought during the festivals.

That verse continues "for your burnt-offerings, your meal-offerings, and your peace-offerings." "For your burnt-offerings" includes a burnt-offering brought by a person afflicted by tzara'at and a woman after childbirth." "Your meal-offerings" include the meal offering brought by a sinner and the meal-offering brought by a woman whose husband accused her of adultery. "Your peace-offerings" includes the peace-offering brought by a nazirite. All of these are offered on the intermediate days of a festival, but are not offered on the sacred days.

11 When a person who ascended to Jerusalem for a pilgrimage festival had many members of his household to partake of the offerings, but limited means, he should bring many festive peace-offerings, and few burnt-offerings brought when appearing before God. If he has few members of his household to partake of the offerings, but ample means, he should bring many burnt-offerings brought when appearing before God, and few festive peace-offerings. If he has few of both, concerning that our Sages said: "One should not bring less than a meah for a burnt-offering and two silver meah for a peace-offering." If he was blessed amply with both, concerning this, our Sages applied the verse Deuteronomy 16:17: "According to the blessing of God your Lord which He granted you."

1 Women and servants are exempt from the obligation to appear before God on festivals. All men are obligated to appear with the exception of a deaf person, a mute, one who is emotionally or intellectually incapable of controlling himself, a minor, a blind person, one who is limp, one who is impure, one who is uncircumcised, and similarly, one who is old, sick, very dainty and spoiled to the extent they cannot ascend by foot. All of these eleven persons are exempt. All other men are obligated to appear before God.

To explain these categories in greater detail: A deaf person is exempt even if he can speak. Even if he is deaf in only one ear, he is exempt from appearing. Similarly, one who is blind in one eye or limp in one leg, is exempt. A mute even though he hears is exempt. A tumtum and an androgynus are exempt, because there is a doubt whether they are female. A person who is half-servant and half-free is exempt, because of the side of him that is a servant.

What is the source that all the above are exempt from appearing before God? Exodus 23:17 states: "All of your males shall appear"; this excludes women. And any positive commandment for which women are not obligated, servants are not obligated. Moreover, Deuteronomy 31:11 "When all Israel come to appear"; this excludes servants.

The phrase "When all Israel come to appear" implies that just as they come to appear before God, so too, they come to see the glory of His holiness and the house where His presence rests. Thus it excludes a blind person who cannot see; he is exempt even if only one eye is blinded, because his sight is not perfect.

That passage continues: "So that they will hear." This excludes one whose hearing is not perfect. And it states: "So that they will learn." This excludes one who does not speak, because everyone who is obligated to learn is also obligated to teach.

Exodus 34:24 states: "When you ascend to appear before the presence of God." The command is directed to one who can ascend by foot and thus excludes one who is limp, old, sick, or very dainty. And we have already explained in Hilchot Bi'at HaMikdash that a person who is impure is not fit to enter the Temple. And one is uncircumcised is loathsome like one who is impure.

2 A scraper, i.e., one whose task is to gather the excrement of dogs and the like to use for the processing of hides or for medicinal purposes, one who quarries copper in its mine, and a leatherworker, even though they are loathsome because of their profession, should purify their bodies and their garments and ascend to Jerusalem together with the Jewish people as a whole to appear before God.

3 Whenever a child can hold his father's hand and ascend from Jerusalem to the Temple Mount, his father is obligated to have him ascend and appear before God to train him in the observance of the mitzvot, as implied by the phrase: "All your males shall appear."

If the minor was limp, blind, or deaf, even in one of his organs, his father is not obligated to train him, even if his infirmity could be healed. The rationale is that if he was in this state when he was past majority, he would be exempt, as we explained.

4 Everyone who is obligated to appear before God is obligated to bring a festive offering. Everyone who is exempt from appearing is exempt from bringing a festive offering. They are all obligated in the celebratory peace-sacrifices with the exception of a deafmute, a mentally or emotionally incapable individual, a minor, an uncircumcised person, and one who is impure.

A deafmute, a mentally or emotionally incapable individual, and a minor are exempt, because they are not fit to be given any responsibility and they are exempt from all the mitzvot stated in the Torah. An uncircumcised person and one who is impure are exempt, because they may not partake of sacred foods and are not fit to enter the Temple, as explained in Hilchot Biat HaMikdash and Hilchot Ma'aseh HaKorbanot.

5 If one was limp or blind on the first day of a festival and was healed on the second day, he is exempt from appearing before God and bringing the festive offering, because all of the remaining days of the festival are compensation for the first day, as we explained. Similarly, if he became impure on the night of the first day of a festival, he is exempt, even though he purifies himself on the following day. If, however, he became impure on the first day of the festival, he is obligated to bring his festive offering and the burnt-offering brought when appearing before God during the remaining days of the festival when he regains ritual purity.

6 One who enters the Temple Courtyard during the days of a festival is not obligated to bring a burnt-offering whenever he enters, for the charge, "You shall not appear in My presence empty-handed," applies only on the fundamental celebration of the festival, the first day or the day which compensates for the first day. If he brings such a sacrifice at any time, we accept it, and offer it as a burnt-offering brought when appearing before God, for there is no limit to these offerings.

7 When a person set aside ten animals for his festive offering, sacrificed some of them on the first day, and made an interruption, he should not offer the others, for he left them over. If he did not make an interruption, but instead, the day was pressing and he was not able to offer them all that day, he should offer the remainder on the following day.

8 The burnt-offering brought when appearing before God may be brought only from ordinary funds like other sacrifices for which a person is obligated.The festive peace-offerings, by contrast, may be brought from funds from the second tithe that are intermingled with ordinary funds. He may purchase an animal with the intermingled funds and offer it as a festive peace-offering, provided that the minimum measure which one must eat first could be purchased with the ordinary funds. The rationale is that the festive peace-offerings are an obligation and any obligation must be satisfied with ordinary funds.

9 A person may fulfill his obligation for festive peace-offering with animals designated as tithe-offerings. He should not, however, bring such an offering on the holiday. This is a decree, lest he tithe on the holiday.

10 An Israelite fulfills his obligation for celebratory peace-offerings with vowed and pledged offerings and with tithe-offerings. Priests may also do so with their portions from the sin-offerings and the guilt-offerings, a firstborn offering, and the breast and fore-leg from a peace-offering. For this mitzvah involves rejoicing by eating sacrificial meat in God's presence and he has done that. Priests cannot fulfill their obligation by partaking of sin-offerings of fowl or of meal-offerings. For they are not meat that brings joy.

We already explained in the laws of the Paschal sacrifice, that the festive offering brought on the fourteenth of Nisan is a matter of choice. Therefore he does not fulfill his obligation for the festive offering with it. He does, however, fulfill his obligation for the celebratory peace-offering.

11 When a person who had peace-offerings which he vowed or pledged to bring, slaughtered them on the day before a festival, even though he partakes of them on the festival, he does not fulfill his obligation for the festive offering, because it may only be brought from ordinary animals. He may, however, fulfill his obligation for celebratory peace-offerings with them.

12 Even though he slaughtered them before the festival, since he partakes of them on the festival, he may fulfill his obligation with them, for he does not need to slaughter the celebratory peace-offerings at the time of celebration.

13 A person should not bring a thanksgiving offering on the day of the fourteenth of Nisan, because of the leaven it includes, for we do not cause sacred foods to be disqualified. If one brought such an offering, he may fulfill his obligation for celebratory peace-offerings through it, as explained.

14 If one says: "I vow to bring a thanksgiving through which I can fulfill my obligation to bring a festive offering," he is obligated to bring a thanksgiving offering, but he does not fulfill his obligation for the festive offering. For a festive offering must be brought from ordinary funds.

When a person sacrifices festive and celebratory peace-offerings, he should not eat while secluded, together with his children and his wife and think he is performing a perfect mitzvah. Instead, he is obligated to bring joy to the poor and unfortunate. Thus Deuteronomy 16:14 mentions: "the Levite, the stranger, the orphan, and the widow." One should grant them food and drink according to his wealth. If one partook of his sacrifices and did not bring joy to these together with him, to him are applied the words of censure, Hoshea 9:4: "Their sacrifices will be like the bread of those aggrieved for them, of which all who partake of it become impure. Instead, let their bread be for themselves."

The mitzvah is to give the Levite takes precedence over all the others, because he is not granted a portion and an ancestral heritage, nor is he given portions of the sacrificial meat. Therefore one must invite Levites to one's table and have them celebrate or give them presents of meat together with the tithes that are given to them, so that all their needs are met. Whoever forsakes a Levite, refrains from bringing him joy, and delays giving him the tithes during the festivals violates a negative commandment, as Deuteronomy 12:19 states: "Beware lest you abandon the Levite."

1 It is a positive commandment to gather together the entire Jewish people - men, women, and children - after every Sabbatical year when they ascend for the pilgrimage holiday and to read so that they hear passages from the Torah that encourage them to perfom mitzvot and strengthem them in the true faith, as Deuteronomy 31:10-12 states: "At the end of a seven-year period, at the time of the Sabbatial year on the Sukkot holiday when all Israel come to appear... gather the nation, the men, the women, the children, and your stranger in your gates...."

2 All of those who are exempt from the mitzvah of appearing before God are exempt from the mitzvah of hakhel with the exception of women, children, and those uncircumcised. One who is ritually impure is, by contrast, exempt from the mitzvah of Hakhel, as implied by the phrase "When all Israel come...," for such a person is not fit to come to the Temple. It is clear that a tumtum and an androgynus are obligated, for women are obligated.

3 When would they read? On the day following the first day of the holiday of Sukkot which is the first day of Chol HaMoed of the eighth year. The kingwould read so the people would hear. The reading was held in the Women's Courtyard. He would read while seated. If he read while standing, it is praiseworthy.

From which passages in the Torah should he read? He starts from the beginning of the chumash: "These are the words..." until the end of the passage Shema. He then skips to the passage Vehayah Im Shamoa,and then skips to the passage asair te'asair. He then reads from that passage in order until the end of the blessing and curses, i.e., until the phrase: "besides the covenant He established with them in Choreb where he concludes.

4 How is the reading conducted? Trumpets are sounded throughout Jerusalem to gather the people. A large wooden platform is brought and set up in the center of the Women's Courtyard. The king ascends and sits on it so that they will be able to hear his reading. All of the Jewish people who made the festive pilgrimage gather around him. The attendant of the synagogue would take the Torah scroll and give it to the head of the synagogue. He would give it to the segen, who would give it to the High Priest, who would give it to the king. The transfer involved many people as an expression of respect.

The king accepts the scroll while standing. If he desires, he may sit when reading. He opens it, looks at it, and recites the blessings like anyone who is reading the Torah in a synagogue. He reads the passages mentioned in the previous halachah until he completes them. He rolls the scroll closed and recites the blessing afterwards as it is done in synagogues. He adds seven blessings which are:

"Grant favor, God, our Lord, to Your people Israel...."

"We thankfully acknowledge You...."

"You chose us from all the nations..." until "Who sanctifies Israel and the festive seasons," as one recites in prayer. Thus there are three blessings with set texts.

For the fourth blessing, he prays for the Temple, that it should remain standing and concludes: "Blessed are You, God, Who dwells in Zion."

For the fifth, he prays for the Jewish people, that their kingdom prevail, and concludes: "...Who chooses Israel."
For the sixth, he prays for the priests, that God should desire their service and concludes: "Blessed are You, God, Who sanctifies the priests."
For the seventh, he offers supplication and prays according to his ability and concludes: "God, deliver Your nation Israel, for Your nation Israel is in need of salvation. Blessed are You, God, Who heeds prayer."

5 The reading and the blessings are in the Holy Tongue, as implied by Deuteronomy 31:11: "Read this Torah," i.e., in its wording. This applies even though foreigners are present.

6 Converts who do not understand are obligated to concentrate their attention and direct their hearing, listening with reverence and awe, rejoicing while trembling as on the day the Torah was given at Sinai. Even great Sages who know the entire Torah are obligated to listen with exceedingly great concentration. One who is unable to hear should focus his attention on this reading, for Scripture established it solely to strengthen the true faith. He should see himself as if he was just now commanded regarding the Torah and heard it from the Almighty. For the king is an agent to make known the word of God.

7 If the day of Hakhel falls on the Sabbath, the gathering is delayed until after the Sabbath, because of the sounding of the trumpets and the supplications which do not supersede the Sabbath restrictions.

Mishneh Torah, Firstlings

Trans. by Eliyahu Touger, Moznaim Publishing

Chapter 1

1 It is a positive commandment to set aside all the male first issues of the womb, whether among humans, kosher animals, and donkeys. This applies whether the animals are healthy or treifot. Thus Exodus 13:2 states: "Consecrate unto Me all firstborn, the first issue of the womb among the children of Israel, in humans and in animals." All of the above are given to the priests."

2 Firstborn humans and firstborn donkeys are redeemed and the redemption is given to the priests. A firstborn kosher animal should be slaughtered in the Temple like other sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity. Its blood is cast on the altar and its fats and organs are burnt on the altar's pyre, as explained in Hilchot Ma'aseh HaKorbanot.

The remainder of the meat is eaten by the priests, as Numbers 18:15-18 states: "You shall surely redeem firstborn humans and you shall redeem firstborn non-kosher animals, but firstborn oxen... you shall not redeem. They are holy.... Their flesh will be for you."

3 When a firstborn kosher animal is blemished - whether it was born blemished or contracted a blemish after being born unblemished - it should be given to a priest. If he desires, he may eat it anywhere, or sell it or feed to whoever he desires, even a gentile, because it is ordinary property, as Deuteronomy 15:21-22 states: "If it has a blemish - lameness or blindness... the pure and the impure shall partake of it, like a deer or a hart." It is the priest's private property.

4 It is a mitzvah to sanctify a firstborn kosher animal and say: "Behold, this is holy," as Deuteronomy 15:19 states: "Every firstborn shall you sanctify unto God your Lord." Even if the owner did not sanctify it, it is sanctified as a matter of course. It is sanctified upon its emergence from the womb.

5 The mitzvah of the firstborn kosher animal is observed in Eretz Yisrael and in the Diaspora. Firstborn animals from the Diaspora should not be brought to Eretz Yisrael. This is derived from ibid. 14:23: "And you shall eat before God your Lord... the tithes of your grain, your wine, your oil, the firstborn of your herds and your sheep." Implied is that from the place where you bring "the tithes of your grain," you should bring firstborn cattle and sheep. From where you do not bring "the tithes of your grain," you should not bring firstborn cattle and sheep. Instead, those firstborn animals are like ordinary property and should be eaten after they become blemished. If one brings firstborn animals from the Diaspora to Jerusalem, they should not be accepted, nor should they be sacrificed. Instead, they should be eaten after they become blemished.

6 This mitzvah is observed whether the Temple is standing or not, like the tithes of grain. It does not apply to the offspring of consecrated animals - whether consecrated to be offered on the altar or consecrated for the Temple treasury - while they remain consecrated before they are redeemed.

7 Everyone is obligated in the mitzvah of setting aside a firstborn issue of a kosher animal: priests, Levites, and Israelites. Even though a firstborn issue is given to a priest, if a firstborn issue is born to a priest, he must offer its blood and fats and organs, as stated. And he must eat the remainder of the meat according to the laws pertaining to a firstborn, as Deuteronomy 15:19 states: "Every firstborn that is born in your herds and your cattle, you shall sanctify." The priests and the Levites are, however, exempt with regard to the mitzvot applying to the firstborn of humans and the firstborn of non-kosher animals, as we explained in Hilchot Matanot Kehunah.

8 A firstborn animal should be eaten within the first year of its life, whether it is unblemished or blemished, as ibid.:20-22 states: "Eat it before God your Lord, year after year.... If it has a blemish,... eat it in your gates."
From when is the year calculated? If it is unblemished, it should be calculated from the eighth day of its life, for then it is fit to be offered as a sacrifice. If it was born blemished, the year should be calculated from the day of its birth, because it could be eaten on that day, provided it was born after a full-term pregnancy. If, however, it is not known whether it was born after a full-term pregnancy, the year should be calculated from the eighth day.

9 If a firstborn animal contracts a blemish in the midst of its year, it is permitted to keep it for twelve months. If it contracts a blemish at the end of its year, it is permitted to keep it for thirty days from the day it contracted the blemish, even though this delays eating it after its year.

What is implied? For example, it contracted a blemish on the fifteenth day before the end of its year, it is granted another fifteen days after its year. If it contracted a blemish after its year, he may not keep it more than 30 days. Afterwards, it must be eaten.

10 In the present age, a firstborn animal should be left until it contracts a blemish and then eaten.

11 If a blemish did not appear so that it could be shown to a sage, one may keep the animal for two or three years. Should a blemish appear so that it could be shown to a sage, if the blemish is contracted within a year, it is permitted to be kept for an entire twelve month period. If it contracts a blemish after its first year, one may maintain it for thirty days.

12 The year of a firstborn animal is a full lunar year, twelve months from day to day. If it was a leap year, it benefits from the addition and it is granted thirteen months.

If two lambs were born to a person, one on the fifteenth of the first Adar and one on the first day of the second Adar, when the first day of Adar in the following year arrives, the second lamb is considered to have its year completed. The one born in the middle of the first Adar, by contrast, is not considered to have its year completed until the middle of the Adar in the following year. Since it was born in the extra month, it is counted for it.

13 If a person transgressed and kept a firstborn animal for more than a year, although he violates a negative commandment, it is not disqualified from being brought as an offering if it is unblemished. If it is blemished, it may be slaughtered anywhere as evident from the prooftext that states: "the tithes of your grain, your wine, your oil, the firstborn of your herds and your sheep." An association is made between the firstborn animal and the tithes. Just as the tithes are not disqualified from one year to the next, so too, a firstborn animal is not disqualified from one year to the next.

14 A firstborn animal should not be given to a priest directly after it was born, for this is not respectful to the priest. Instead, the owner of the animal should care for it until it matures slightly. Then he should give it to the priest.

For how long is an Israelite obligated to care for a firstborn animal? For a small animal, for 30 days. For a large animal, 50 days.

If a priest tells him: "Give it to me in the midst of this time and I will tend to it myself," he is not allowed to give it to him, for this is like a priest helping in order to receive his presents. We already explained in *Hilchot Terumot*that priests who assist in the granaries, the butcher shops, and among the shepherds should not be given their presents as wages.

15 If the firstborn animal was blemished and a priest told the owner in the interval mentioned above: "Give it to me so that I can partake of it now," or if it was unblemished and he told him: "Give it to me in this interval so that I can offer it now," he may give it to him.

It appears to me that a person may give a firstborn animal to any priest that he desires.

16 When a priest eats an olive-sized portion of an unblemished firstborn animal outside of Jerusalem, he is liable for lashes according to Scriptural Law, as Deuteronomy 12:17 states: "You may not eat the tithes of your grain, your wine, your oil, the firstborn of your herds and your sheep... in your gates."

Similarly, a non-priest who partakes of an olive-sized portion of a firstborn animal whether before its blood was poured on the altar or afterwards is liable for lashes. According to the Oral Tradition, it was taught that this admonition applies also to a non-priest who partakes of a firstborn, whether before its blood was poured on the altar or afterwards.

17 A firstborn kosher animal should not be redeemed, as Numbers 18:17 states: "But the firstborn of an ox, the firstborn of a sheep, or the firstborn of a goat should not be redeemed. Similarly, it should not be sold if it is unblemished. The rationale is that since the animal is intended as a sacrifice, the priest does not have the right to sell it.

In the present age, when there is no Temple, since the firstborn is intended to be eaten, it is permitted to sell it, even though it is presently unblemished. It may be sold either to a priest or to an Israelite.

18 A priest may sell a blemished firstborn animal, in every age, whether the Temple is standing, whether it is not standing, whether it is alive, whether it has been slaughtered.

When one sells a blemished firstborn, he should sell it at home, but not in the market-place, as we explained in Hilchot Issurei Mizbeiach. The meat of an unblemished firstborn animal, by contrast, should not be sold, because it is consecrated meat. Priests who are partners in the ownership of a firstborn animal are permitted to weigh one portion against another.

19 When a person skins a blemished firstborn animal, he is permitted to skin it in any manner he desires. If he desires to employ the technique called riggul, he may. The same applies to other consecrated animals that were disqualified. If he desired to skin it from the foot up, he may skin it in that manner.

Chapter 2

1 If any of the permanent blemishes which disqualify consecrated animals and require them to be redeemed is contracted by a firstborn animal, it may be slaughtered for this reason in any place. We have already explained those blemishes in Hilchot Issurei Mizbeiach. Those that are appropriate to apply to a male animal number 67.

2 All of the conditions mentioned there which cause a sacrifice to be considered as less than desirable and hence, due to them, a consecrated animal is not offered, but also is not redeemed cause a firstborn not to be slaughtered due to them, nor offered. Instead, the animal remains until it contracts a permanent blemish. Similarly, if a firstborn contracts a temporary blemish, it should not be slaughtered in any place, nor should it be offered. Instead, it should pasture until it contracts a permanent blemish and is slaughtered because of it.

3 Similarly, if a transgression was performed with it or it killed a human according to the testimony of only one witness or the owner, it was set aside to be worshiped as a false deity or it was worshiped, it should be left to pasture until it contracts a disqualifying blemish, as explained in Hilchot Issurei Mizbeiach.

4 Neither an animal born through Cesarean section, nor one born afterwards are considered as firstborn animals. The first is not, because it is not the first issue of the womb. And the second is not, because the first preceded it. Even if a female was born through Cesarean section and a male later emerged from the womb, it is not a firstborn.

5 When a firstborn animal is an androgynus, it does not have any sacred quality associated with it. It is like a female, concerning which the priest has no claim at all. One may perform labor with it and shear it like other ordinary animals.

When an animal is born as a tumtum, it is considered as a firstborn of doubtful status. It may be eaten by its owner after it contracts a blemish. This applies whether it urinates from a place that appears to indicate that it is male or it urinates from a place that appears to indicate that it is female.

6 When a sheep gives birth to an offspring that appears like a goat or a goat gives birth to an offspring that appears like a lamb, it is exempt from the mitzvah of a firstborn, as indicated by Numbers 18:17 which speaks of "the firstborn of an ox." Implied is that it must be an ox and the firstborn must be an ox.

If it has some of the distinguishing characteristics of its mother, it is considered as a firstborn and it is considered as having a permanent blemish, for there is no blemish greater than a deviation from the norms of creation, as explained in Hilchot Issurei Mizbeiach.

Even if a cow gives birth to an offspring that resembles a donkey, but it has some of the signs of a cow, it is a firstborn that must be given to a priest. The rationale is that, with regard to the species of donkeys, there is a concept of a firstborn. If, however, it gave birth to an offspring resembling a horse or a camel, even if it has some of the signs of a cow, it is merely a firstborn of doubtful status. Therefore it may be eaten by its owners. If, however, a priest takes possession of it, it is not expropriated from his possession.

7 When a person imparts a blemish to a firstborn animal, since he performed a transgression, he is penalized. License is not granted to slaughter the firstborn because of this blemish until it contracts another blemish on its own accord. If, however, this transgressor dies, his son may slaughter the animal because of the blemish inflicted by his father, for his son was not penalized after him.

8 If one indirectly caused a firstborn to contract a physical blemish, e.g., one placed a fig on its ear, leaving it there until a dog came and took it and cut off its ear, he caused it to pass through jagged iron and pieces of glass so that its forefoot would be cut off and it was cut off, or he told a gentile to blemish it, the animal should not be slaughtered because of this blemish.

This is the general principle: Whenever a blemish was brought about with a person's knowledge, it is forbidden for him to slaughter it because of this blemish. If it was brought about without his knowledge, it is permitted for him to slaughter it because of this blemish.

9 If one said: "If this firstborn animal would contract a blemish, I would slaughter it" and a gentile heard and caused it to become blemished, he may slaughter it, because it was not brought about with his knowledge.

10 If we saw a person perform a deed that would indirectly cause a firstborn to contract a blemish, it contracted a blemish, but we do not know whether he intended that this blemish be caused, he should not slaughter the firstborn, because of it.

What is implied? He placed barley in a narrow place where the walls were studded with thorns, when the firstborn ate the barley, its lip became split. Even if the owner was a Torah sage, he should not slaughter the firstborn because of it. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

11 If a firstborn animal was pursuing a person and he kicked it to divert it, or even if he kicked it because it pursued once before, should he have caused a blemish when he kicked it, he may slaughter the firstborn because of it.

12 When children caused a firstborn to become blemished through sport and similarly, if a gentile caused a blemish intentionally, the firstborn may be slaughtered because of it. If they did so in order to cause it to be permitted, it may not be slaughtered because of it.

13 When the blood of a firstborn ceased flowing freely, its blood may be let, provided one does not intentionally cause a blemish. If a blemish was caused through the bloodletting, the animal may be slaughtered because of it.

14 It is permitted to cause a firstborn animal to become blemished before it emerges into the world and the firstborn may be slaughtered as a consequence.
When does this apply? When the Temple is not standing. Then leniency is granted, because ultimately the animal will be eaten after it becomes blemished. When, however, the Temple is standing, this is forbidden.

15 When one witness testifies in the name of another witness that a blemish was not brought about knowingly, his word is accepted. Even a woman's word is accepted if she says: "This blemish was caused on its own accord in my presence," and the animal may be slaughtered.

16 A shepherd's word is accepted when he states that any blemish that could have been caused by human activity came about on its own accord. The animal may be slaughtered because of such blemishes.
When does the above apply? When the shepherd was an Israelite and the firstborn animal is in the possession of a priest. If, however, the shepherd was a priest and the firstborn was still in the possession of its Israelite owner, the shepherd's word is not accepted and we suspect that perhaps he caused it to become blemished so that it would be given to him.

17 The word of a priest who testifies on behalf of another priest that a firstborn became blemished on its own accord is accepted. We do not suspect that they are acting in collusion with each other.

The rationale is that all of the priests are suspect to cause a blemish to a firstborn so that they can partake of it outside the Temple Courtyard. Therefore their own word is not accepted with regard to their own concerns. A colleague may, however, testify on his behalf, because a person will not transgress on behalf of another. Even a priest's children and the members of his household may testify with regard to a firstborn on his behalf. His wife may not, however, because she is considered as his own person.

18 Leniency is, however, shown in the following instance. A firstborn animal was in the possession of a priest and it became blemished. One witness testified that the blemish came as a matter of course, but we do not know whether the blemish is of the type that enables a firstborn to be slaughtered or not. If the priest who is in possession of the firstborn states that he showed this blemish to an expert and he permitted the firstborn to be slaughtered because of it, his word is accepted. We do not suspect that he did not show the animal to the expert and that the firstborn is considered as unblemished. For the priests were not suspected of slaughtering consecrated animals outside the Temple Courtyard, because this is a sin punishable by karet, as we explained.

19 Similarly, a priest's word is accepted if he states concerning a blemished firstborn animal: "An Israelite gave me this firstborn animal after it was blemished. It did not become blemished in my domain." As a result, we do not suspect that he caused the blemish. The rationale is that the matter will inevitably become revealed and the priest will be scared to lie, lest the Israelite owner be asked and state: "It was unblemished at the time it was given to him."

Chapter 3

1 A firstborn animal may not be slaughtered because of its blemish unless a ruling to that effect was delivered by an expert who was authorized to do so by the nasi and told by him: "Give license for slaughter of firstborn animals because of their blemishes." Even if a blemish was large and obvious to everyone, license to slaughter it should not be granted by anyone other than an expert who was granted authority.
Such an expert may inspect all firstborn animals except his own.

2 If there is no expert in a locale and the blemish was one of the blemishes that are obvious and distinct, e.g., the animal's eye was blinded, its forefoot was cut off, or its hindfoot was broken, it may be slaughtered with license of three members of the synagogue. Similarly, if a firstborn animal was taken to the Diaspora and contracted a distinct blemish, license for its slaughter can be granted by three members of the synagogue.

3 An expert should not inspect a firstborn animal in Eretz Yisrael unless he is accompanied by a priest, lest the expert tell the owner: "It is a blemish and it is permitted to slaughter the animal because of it," and he slaughter it for himself without giving it to the priest. For although he is not suspect to slaughter sanctified animalsoutside the Temple Courtyard, he is suspect to steal the presents given to the priests.

Therefore if the owner was a wise man who is known to be careful in his observance, an animal may be inspected for him without a priest. If the blemish was something obvious to all, e.g., the firstborn's foreleg or hindleg was cut off, since he brought to a sage expert for inspection, we assume that he is careful in his observance. Hence the experts inspects the animal for him even though he is not accompanied by a priest.

4 When a person slaughters a firstborn animal and afterwards shows its blemish to an expert - even if the blemish is overtly recognizable and will not be affected by ritual slaughter, e.g., its foreleg or hindleg were cut off - since it was not slaughtered with license granted by an expert - it is forbidden to benefit from it and it should be buried like a firstborn animal that died.

5 When a firstborn had only one testicle, but two sacs, it was sat on its rear, and its genital area kneaded without finding the second testicle, an expert granted permission for its slaughter and it was slaughtered, it is permitted to be eaten even though the second testicle was found clinging to the flanks. Since its genital area was kneaded, the original ruling is not rescinded. If, however, its genital area was not kneaded, even though permission to slaughter it was granted by an expert, it must be buried.

6 When a person who is not an expert inspects a firstborn and has it slaughtered, it should be buried and he must make restitution from his personal resources.

How much should he pay? A fourth of the worth of a small animal and half the worth of a large animal. Why does he not pay its entire worth? Because the owner of the animal was penalized so that he not delay offering the firstborn and so that he not raise a small animal in Eretz Yisrael.

7 When a person receives a wage for inspecting a firstborn animal for a blemish, the animal may not be slaughtered on the basis of his rulings unless he was a great expert and the sages knew that there were none like him and they allotted a fee to him for the visit and inspection whether a blemish was found or not.He should not take a fee for any given animal more than once and should continue to inspect it as long as it is brought to him, so that no suspicions will be aroused.

8 When a person is suspect to sell firstborn animals as ordinary animals, one may not purchase even the meat of deer from him, because it resembles the meat of a calf. One may not purchase from him hides that have not been processed, even the hides of a female animal, lest he cut off the place of the male organ and say: "This is the hide of a female animal."

One may not purchase wool from him, even wool that has been whitened. Needless to say, this refers to wool that is still soiled. We may, however, purchase from him spun wool, rolls of wool and processed hides. The rationale is that one will not process the hide from an unblemished firstborn animal, because he fears to leave it in his domain, lest the judges hear and penalize him according to his wickedness.

9 When one slaughtered a firstborn and sold its meat and afterwards, it became known that he did not show it to an expert, what was eaten was eaten. The owner should, however, return the money paid by the purchasers. What was not eaten should be burned and the money returned. This law also applies when one feeds meat from an animal that is treifah, as will be explained in Hilchot Mikach UMemcar.

10 The following rules apply when it is discovered that a firstborn was treifah. If it was unblemished and it was discovered to be treifah after it was skinned, the hide should be burnt, as explained in Hilchot Pesulei HaMukdashim, and the meat should be buried. If it was slaughtered because of a blemish, the meat should be buried and the priests should be allowed to benefit from its hide, provided it was slaughtered on the basis of the ruling of an expert.

11 When the meat of a firstborn animal, whether unblemished or blemished, has been eaten according to law, just as it is permitted to benefit from its hide, so too, is it permitted to benefit from its shearings. Nevertheless, it is forbidden to benefit from any wool which is cut off from it while it is alive - and even from wool that it shed, and even to wool that was shed after the animal contracted a blemish. Even after it was slaughtered, and, needless to say, after it died, the wool remains forbidden. For the same wool that was shed from the animal during its lifetime remains forbidden even after these events take place. These same laws apply with regard to the tithes of animals.

We have already explained in Hilchot Me'ilah that this decree was instituted only with regard to the firstborn and tithe sacrifices, because they do not come to secure atonement. Hence with regard to these sacrifices, there is room to suspect that the owner will leave them in his domain to take all the wool that sheds from them. This is undesirable, because as we have already explained, it is a mitzvah to eat the firstborn in the first year of its life, whether it is unblemished or blemished.

12 The following rules apply when a firstborn has loose-hanging wooland it was slaughtered because of its blemish. It is permitted to benefit from the loose-hanging wool that resembles the animal's other wool. It is, however, forbidden to benefit from the loose-hanging wool that does not resemble the animal's other wool, i.e., its roots are turned in the opposite direction and face its tips, for this is considered as if it were shed while the animal was alive.

13 When the shearings of the wool from a firstborn animal, even one that was blemished, become intermingled with the shearings of ordinary animals - even one with several thousand - they are all forbidden. The rationale is that the shearings are a significant entity and even the slightest amount causes the entire mixture to be considered as consecrated.
When one weaves a full length of a sit of wool from a firstborn animal in a garment, it should be destroyed by burning. If wool from consecrated animals was used, even the slightest amount causes the entire garment to be consecrated.

1 There is an obligation to apply the laws of a firstborn to an animal owned by partners. The terms "your cattle and your sheep" was used only to exclude an animal owned in partnership with a gentile. For if a gentile was a partner in the ownership of a cow or of the fetus it is carrying - even if the gentile owns only a thousandth share of the mother or the offspring, it is exempt from the requirements pertaining to the firstborn.
If the gentile owned one specific limb of one of them, e.g., a forefoot or a hindfoot, any limb which if cut off that limb would render the animal as blemished, exempts it. If the limb owned by the gentile could be cut off without disqualifying the animal as a firstborn, it is obligated in the laws of the firstborn.

2 When a person purchases a fetus being carried by a cow owned by a gentile or he sells a fetus being carried by his cow to a gentile, even though he is not permitted to do so, the fetus is exempt from the requirements of the firstborn. He is not penalized because of this matter.

3 When a person receives an animal from a gentile to care for it and the offspring would be shared or a gentile receives an animal from a Jew under such an arrangement, the offspring are exempt from the requirements of firstborn animals.This is implied by Exodus 13:2: "All the first issue of the womb among the children of Israel," i.e., everything must belong to a Jew.

4 The following laws apply when a Jew receives sheep from a gentile at a fixed price and agreed that the profit will be split between them, but if the worth of the animal is reduced, the loss is born by the Jew alone. Even though the sheep are in the domain of the Jew and are his property, since if the gentile will not find any other resources to collect his debt for the lost sheep from him, he will take these sheep and their offspring, it is considered as if he has a lien on them and their offspring. Thus the gentile is considered as having a share of them and they and their offspring are exempt from the requirements of the firstborn. The offspring of their offspring, however, are liable for they belong to the Jew and the gentile has no authority over them.

5 When a Jews pays money to a gentile and thus acquires an animal from a gentile according to their law, even though he did not perform meshichah,he acquires the animal and the requirements of the firstborn apply to its offspring. Similarly, if a gentile acquired an animal from a Jew according to their laws and paid money, he acquires it even though he did not perform meshichah and its offspring are exempt from the requirements of the firstborn.

6 When a gentile converts and it is not known whether his cow gave birth before he converted or afterwards, it is considered a firstborn because of the doubt.

7 When a person purchases an animal from a gentile and does not know whether it gave birth already or not, if it gives birth in his possession, the offspring is considered a firstborn because of the doubt. It should be eaten by its masters after it becomes blemished, but is not given to a priest. The rationale is that when a person desires to expropriate property from a colleague, the burden of proof is on the plaintiff.

8 When a person purchases an animal that is giving suck from a gentile, he need not suspect that it is giving suck to the offspring of another animal. Instead, we operate under the assumption that it has already given birth. Even if the animal to which it is giving suck is like another species, even if it is like a pig, it is exempt from the requirements of the firstborn.
Similarly, the offspring of an animal that is providing milk is exempt from the requirements of the firstborn. The rationale is that we rely on the assumption that most animals do not provide milk unless they have given birth previously.

9 When a person purchases an animal from a fellow Jew, we operate under the assumption that it already gave birth unless the seller states that it did not give birth yet. The rationale is that we assume a Jew will not remain silent and cause a fellow Jew to partake of a consecrated animal outside the Temple Courtyard. Hence we conclude that it certainly gave birth previously. Therefore the owner sold the mother without any qualification.

10 The following laws apply when a small animal miscarries and discharges a fetus whose form has not become very distinct and evident to all. It is called a tinuf. If the shepherds say: "It was a fetus, but its form has become marred," the future offspring of this animal is exempt from the requirements of the firstborn. It must, however, be shown to a shepherd who is knowledgeable.

Therefore if one purchases an animal from a gentile, even if it was small and gave birth within its first year of life, the offspring is considered as a firstborn of doubtful status, because it is possible that it discharged a tinuf while owned by the gentile.

Similarly, when a large animal discharges a placenta, it is a sign that it carried a fetus, for a placenta is never formed without a fetus and the offspring is exempt from the requirements of the firstborn. It is permitted to throw that fetus to the dogs for the following reasons. Only a male is sanctified as a firstborn. We assume that offspring are half male and half female. We have already explained that a male that does not have some of the distinguishing signs of its mother is not consecrated as a firstborn. Thus the lesser portion of animals' first offspring is consecrated as a firstborn. Hence since the probability is less than half, it is not considered. When, by contrast, a consecrated animal discharges a placenta, it must be buried. For the female offspring are bound by the same laws as the male.

11 When a large animal discharges a flow of blood, the future offspring of this animal is exempt from the requirements of the firstborn, for we assume that there was an offspring in it, but there was much more blood and it lost its form and its existence was nullified. We must bury the flow of blood like a stillborn firstborn animal, even though this flow of blood has no consecrated quality. Why is it buried? In order to publicize the matter that the offspring of this animal was exempted from the requirements of the firstborn.

12 We already explained with regard to the concept of a woman in the niddah state that the form of a human fetus is completed on the fortieth day after conception. Thus when a woman miscarries after less than 40 days, she is not considered to have miscarried a fetus. Our Sages did not, however, conclusively determine the amount of days in which the form of an animal fetus is completed. They did, however, say that an animal which discharges a tinuf does not become pregnant, nor does it carry another fetus until after 30 days.

13 When an animal left pregnant and returned empty, her next offspring is considered as a firstborn because of the doubt involved. Perhaps what she discharged was not an entity that exempts her offspring from the requirements of the firstborn. A fetus that was miscarried is not considered to have "opened its mother's womb" unless its head was the size of top of the needle of the woof.

14 When an animal that is having difficulty giving birth to its firstborn, the offspring may be cut up limb by limb and the limbs extracted and thrown to the dogs immediately. The offspring that follows is a firstborn.

If the greater portion of a fetus emerges at one time, it must be buried and the future offspring of the mother is exempted from the requirements of the firstborn.

If one cut off a limb, extracted it, put it aside, cut off another limb, until the greater portion of the fetus is completed, all of the limbs are required to be buried and the future offspring of the mother is exempted from the requirements of the firstborn. [The rationale is that] since the greater part of the animal was taken out - whether whole or cut in pieces - and it is present before us, it becomes consecrated retroactively.

15 When a third of the fetus emerged and it was sold to a gentile and then a second third emerged, it is consecrated retroactively and the future offspring of the mother is exempted from the requirements of the firstborn.

If a third of the offspring was removed by Caesarian section and, afterwards, two thirds emerged through the womb, it is not consecrated. The rationale is that the first larger portion did not emerge from the womb and the consecration would have been brought about retroactively.

16 The following laws apply when the lesser portion of one limb emerges from the womb together with the greater portion of the animal. Since the portion that emerges constitutes the greater portion of the fetus, the future offspring of the mother is exempted from the requirements of the firstborn and the portion that emerged should be buried..

If only half of the fetus emerges from the womb together with the greater portion of one limb, there is an unresolved doubt whether the future offspring of the mother is exempted from the requirements of the firstborn or not. Therefore the next offspring is a firstborn of doubtful status.

17 When a firstborn was wrapped in a fiber and removed from the womb without touching the womb or it was wrapped with a placenta of another animal or it was wounded up together with its sister and emerged, since it did not touch the womb, it is considered as a firstborn of doubtful status.

18 If one cleaved the wombs of two animals together and a fetus emerged from one and entered the other, there is an unresolved doubt: Is the future offspring of the animal to whose womb the firstborn entered exempted from the requirements of the firstborn, for its womb was "opened?" Or is it not exempted until it "opens its womb" when giving birth to its own offspring?

19 If the walls of the mother's womb opened and the firstborn emerged without touching the walls of the womb, there is an unresolved doubt: Is it consecrated because it touches the walls of the mother's womb? Or is it consecrated because it was in the space of the mother's womb?

20 If the walls of the the mother's womb were uprooted from their place and were suspended around the offspring's neck, there is an unresolved doubt: Do they cause the offspring to be consecrated only when they are in their place? Or do they cause it to be consecrated even if they are not in their place.

21 If the flesh supporting the walls of the womb decomposes, the offspring is not consecrated. If the walls of the womb are partially stripped off, but the portion that remained is greater than the portion that was stripped off and the offspring emerged through the open area or the portion that was stripped off is greater than the portion that remained and the offspring emerged through the portion that remained, the offspring is a firstborn of doubtful status.

1 The following laws apply when a sheep that had not given birth before gives birth to two males. Even if both of their heads emerged at the same time, it is impossible that one did not emerge before the other. Since it is not known which emerged first, the priest should take the weaker one and the second one is a firstborn of doubtful status.

If one of them died, the priest does not receive anything, for the living offspring is of doubtful status and we follow the principle: "When one desires to expropriate property from a colleague, the burden of proof is on him." Similarly, if the mother gave birth to a male and a female, the male is of doubtful status, for perhaps the female emerged first. Therefore the priest does not receive anything, for when one desires to expropriate property from a colleague, the burden of proof is on him.

2 When there are two sheep that have not given birth previously and they give birth to two males, they are both given to the priest. If they gave birth to a male and a female and they become intermingled, the male is given to the priest. If they gave birth to two males and a female, the priest may take the weaker one. If one of them died, the priest does not receive anything. The rationale is that the male that is alive is a firstborn of doubtful status and when one desires to expropriate property from a colleague, the burden of proof is on him.

If the two sheep gave birth to two females and a male or two males and two females the males are firstborn of doubtful status. For it is possible to say that the female was born first and then the male. Hence the priest does not receive anything, because when one desires to expropriate property from a colleague, the burden of proof is on him.

If one of the sheep had given birth beforehand and one had not, should they give birth to two males and they become intermingled, they are both firstborn of doubtful status and the priest may take the weaker one. If one dies, the priest does not receive anything, for the living offspring is of doubtful status. Similarly, if the two sheep give birth to a male and a female and it is not known which gave birth to which, the priest does not receive anything, for the male is of doubtful status.

3 Whenever a firstborn is of doubtful status, the law is that it should be allowed to pasture until it becomes blemished and then it may be eaten by its owner. If a priest takes possession of it, it is not expropriated from him. He must partake of it only after it becomes blemished. He may not offer it as a sacrifice, for only an offspring that is definitely a firstborn is offered as a sacrifice, lest one slaughter an ordinary animal in the Temple Courtyard.

4 When a person had both animals that had given birth before and animals that had not given birth before in his herd and they both gave birth while no one was present. If the owner entered and found those who had given birth previously giving suck to females and those who had not given birth previously giving suck to males, we do not suspect that the offspring of one went to another to suck and the offspring of the other went to the first. Instead, we follow the presumption that every animal is giving suck to its own offspring.

5 When two individuals entrusted male animals - one a firstborn and one an ordinary animal - with a shepherd and one of the animals died, the shepherd may leave the second animal between them and depart. This animal is considered a firstborn of doubtful status and should be divided between the two owners, because neither can identify his animal.

6 When a person entrusts a firstborn animal to another person who placed it together with his own ordinary animal and then one of them died, but they do not know which one, we follow the principle: When one desires to expropriate property from a colleague, the burden of proof is on him. The animal is considered a firstborn of doubtful status.

Even if a priest who is a shepherd leaves his firstborn animal in a person's courtyard together with that person's ordinary animal, should one of them die, we follow the principle: When one desires to expropriate property from a colleague, the burden of proof is on him. We may not expropriate property from a person's courtyard unless there is substantial proof, for it is with the consent of the owner of the firstborn that it was placed together with the ordinary animal belonging to the other person.

7 Israelites are not suspect to cause blemishes to firstborn animals. Therefore the word of an Israelite is accepted if he states: "This is a firstborn of doubtful status." We inspect the blemish and permit him to partake of the animal if it is blemished.

8 Whenever a consecrated animal received a permanent blemish before it was consecrated and was later redeemed, its offspring are governed by the requirements of the firstborn. If they received a temporary blemish before they were consecrated or they were consecrated while unblemished and received a permanent blemish and were then redeemed, their offspring are exempt from the requirements of the firstborn. The rationale is that they did not become ordinary animals in all respects, as indicated by the fact that they are forbidden to be shorn and work is forbidden to be performed with them, as we explained in Hilchot Me'ilah.

9 When a person purchases an animal with money from the second tithes in Jerusalem, its offspring is obligated in the requirements of the firstborn. If, however, a person purchases an animal with the produce of the Sabbatical year, their offspring are exempt from the requirements of the firstborn. The rationale is that one is not allowed to perform commercial activity with the produce of the Sabbatical year, for concerning that, Leviticus 25:6 states: "to partake of it." Implied is that license is granted "to partake of it" and not to perform commercial activity with it. And if its offspring were obligated in the requirements of the firstborn, it is considered as if he would be performing commercial activity with a firstborn, because it is released from the category of the produce of the Sabbatical year.

We already explained in Hilchot Ma'achalot Assurot that it is forbidden to perform commercial activity with substances that are forbidden to be eaten. And we already explained in Hilchot Terumot that it is forbidden to perform commercial activity with terumot. Similarly, it is forbidden to perform commercial activity with the firstborn even though it is permitted to sell them in the manner explained above.

10 If a person purchased a firstborn for a wedding feast for his son or for a festival and he did not need it, it is permitted to sell it.

11 We do not evaluate unblemished firstborn animals for Israelites, but we do evaluate blemished firstborn. We evaluate unblemished firstborn animals for priests in the present age, because ultimately, they will be eaten after they are blemished. Needless to say, we evaluate blemished animals for them.

1 It is a positive commandment to separate one out of every ten kosher animals, which are born to a person each year. This mitzvah applies only to cattle and sheep, as Leviticus 27:32 states: "All the tithes of your cattle and sheep...."

2 The tithing of animals applies with regard to ordinary animals, but not to consecrated ones. It applies in Eretz Yisrael and in the Diaspora, in the era that the Temple was standing and in the era when the Temple is not standing. Nevertheless, our Sages forbade tithing animals in the present era and ordained that they should be tithed only when the Temple is standing. This is a decree, lest the consecrated animal be eaten when it is unblemished and thus one will be violating a transgression punishable by karet: slaughtering consecrated animals outside the Temple Courtyard. If one transgressed and tithed in the present era, the animal is designated as a tithe offering and should be eaten after it contracts a disqualifying blemish.

3 All are obligated in the tithing of their animals: priests, Levites, and Israelites.

4 The laws applying to a tithe offering of an animal are that it should be slaughtered in the Temple Courtyard and its blood cast in one heave towards the Altar's base. Its organs and fats are offered on the altar's pyre and the remainder of the meat is eaten by the owner in Jerusalem like other sacrifices of a lesser degree of sanctity. The priests do not receive any portion of it. Instead, it is given to its owner in its entirety, like the Paschal sacrifice.

If it was blemished, whether it became blemished after it was designated or it was blemished when it was set aside, it may be eaten in any place.

5 It is forbidden to sell an animal designated as a tithe offering when it is unblemished, for Leviticus 27:33 states with regard to it: "It shall not be redeemed." According to the Oral Tradition, the phrase "It shall not be redeemed" also implies a prohibition against selling it; it is neither redeemed, nor sold at all.

It appears to me that when one sells an animal designated as a tithe offering, the sale is of no consequence and the animal is not acquired by the purchaser. For this reason, the seller is not liable for lashes like one who sells property designated as a dedication offering to the priests, in which instance, the purchaser does not acquire it, or like one who sells a female captive, as will be explained in its place.

6 According to Rabbinic Law, it is forbidden to sell an animal designated as a tithe offering when it is blemished and even when it is slaughtered. This is a decree, lest one sell such an animal when it is alive. For this reason, we may not weigh one portion against another, as is done when weighing portions of a firstborn animal, because it appears as if he is selling it.

7 An animal designated as a tithe offering that belongs to orphans is permitted to be sold in an ordinary manner after being slaughtered when blemished. To prevent the orphans from suffering a loss, our Sages did not uphold their decree in this instance.

8 When an animal designated as a tithe offering is slaughtered when blemished, it is permitted to sell its fats, sinews, hide, and bones. Only the sale of its meat was prohibited. If one included the price for its meat together with the price for its hide, fats, and sinews and sold everything in a collective price, the sale is permitted. If the price of the bones was high and he included the price of the meat in the price of the bones, it is permitted.

9 Anyone's word is accepted with regard to the blemishes of animals designated as tithe offerings if he says: "This blemish came about on its own accord; it was not brought about intentionally." Even the statements of those individuals whose word is not accepted with regard to the blemishes of a firstborn animal are accepted with regard to an animal designated as a tithe offering. Moreover, a person may inspect the blemishes of his animals designated as tithe offerings and permit their slaughter if he is an expert. The rationale for these leniencies is that if a person desired, he could have blemished every animal in his flock and then tithed them. Thus from the outset, the tithed animal would be blemished.

10 When a person purchases lambs that were born this year or they were given to him as a present, he is not obligated to tithe them. The obligation applies only when the animals are born in his domain. Accordingly, if partners enter into a partnership with regard to animals: one brings 100 and the other brings 100 and they have them intermingle and own them jointly, these 200 are exempt from the requirement to tithe. The rationale is that each of the lambs is considered as having been sold. Similarly, if brothers inherit lambs in their first year of life from their father, they are exempt from the requirement to tithe.

The offspring born to the partners or the brothers after the partnership was established, by contrast, from their jointly owned animals are obligated to be tithed. Similarly, if a partnership was established with money or brothers purchased animals from the funds of the estate, the offspring born afterwards are obligated to be tithed, for they were born in their domain and they are considered as one person.

If the brothers and the partners divided their property after animals were born to them in their joint domain and then reestablished their partnership, the animals born previously are exempt from the requirement to tithe. The rationale is that when the assets of the partnership or the estate were divided, everything is considered as having been sold and animals that are sold are exempt. And when the partnership was reestablished, no new offspring was born to them afterwards. Even though they divided kids for kids and lambs for lambs, and even if they divided them by tens, they are all exempt from the tithes and considered as having been purchased.

11 When brothers and partners divided the financial assets of the partnership, but did not divide the animals, the animals are obligated to be tithed, for they are not considered as having been purchased yet. If, however, the animals of the partnership were divided even though the financial assets were not, the offspring are exempt.

12 When a person purchases ten unborn fetuses in their mother's womb,they all enter the corral for tithing, for they were born in his domain.

13 When a priest received ten newborn animals because of the return of property stolen from a convert, they are exempt from the tithes. The rationale is that the priestly presents are comparable to ordinary presents. And we already explainedthat when one gives a present, it is exempt from the tithes.

14 All the animals in one's herd are brought into the corral for tithing, whether they are unblemished or blemished, even those which are forbidden to be offered on the altar with the exception of hybrids, animals that are tereifah, born through Caesarian section, or "lacking in age." For all of these are exempt from the tithes.

Similarly, an animal whose mother died or was slaughtered when it was born should not be tithed. These concepts are part of the Oral Tradition.

15 A purchaser is not exempt from the obligation to tithe unless he purchased the animals after they were fit to be tithed. Therefore one who purchases lambs in the seven days after their birth, is obligated to tithe them when the time comes.Since an animal that is "lacking in age" is not fit to be tithed, it is as if he purchased a fetus and it was born in his domain.

16 Whenever there is a doubt whether an animal is obligated to be tithed or exempt from being tithed, it is exempt from being tithed. Therefore when an orphaned lamb, a purchased one, or the like becomes intermingled with other lambs, they are all exempt from the tithes, because the status of each one of them is in doubt.

Chapter 7

1 When a person possesses ten lambs and he separates one as the tithes or he possesses 100 and he separates ten as the tithes, these are not tithes. What, instead, should he do? He should gather all of the lambs or all of the calves born that year in a corral. He then makes a small entrance so that two cannot emerge at the same time. He positions their mothers outside the corral and they bleat so that the lambs will hear their voices and leave the corral to meet them. This is necessary, as implied by Leviticus 27:32 which states: "all that passes beneath the staff," i.e., they must pass on their own initiative; one should not remove them by hand.

As they leave the corral one by one, the owner begins to count them with a staff: one, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine. The tenth animal that departs, whether male or female, whether unblemished or blemished, should be painted with red paint, and the owner should say: "This is the tithe."

If he did not paint the animals designated as the tithes with red paint, did not count them with a staff, or counted them while they are lying down or standing, the tithing takes effect. Since he counted them ten by ten and consecrated the tenth, it is considered a tithe.

2 It is not necessary to collect every animal born in a person's domain to one corral. Instead, the reckoning is made for every herd alone. If a person owned five lambs in Jerusalem and five in Acre, they are not combined into a single herd. Instead, they are all exempt from the tithes.

What is the distance required to be between two herds for them to be combined? Sixteen mil.

3 If there are three herds and there are sixteen mil between each one, the three are combined. What is implied? There were nine on one side, nine on the other side, and one in the center, all three herds are brought into the corral together to be tithed.

4 Tithes are not taken from sheep for cattle, nor from cattle for sheep. One must, however, tithe sheep for goats and goats for sheep. This is derived from Leviticus 27:32: "All the tithes of your cattle and tzon." Implied is that all light, domesticated animals are included as one category, for they are both referred to with the term seh and they are like one species.

5 We do not tithe animals born in one year with animals born in another year just as we do not tithe the crops from the new year for the crops from the past year nor the crops from the past year for the crops of the new year, as Deuteronomy 14:22: "Which are produced by the field year for year."

It appears to me that if one tithed animals from one year for animals of another year, the tithing is binding because of the severity of consecrated animals. For the Torah did not explicitly emphasize that the tithing of animals must be from the same year.

6 All of the offspring born from the first of Tishrei until the twenty-ninth of Elul are combined and are tithed for each other. If five lambs are born on the twenty-ninth of Elul and five on the first of Tishrei of the following year, they are not combined. If an animal gave birth to offspring in its first year of life, it and its daughter should be brought into the corral together to be tithed.

7 The lambs which are born are not like tevel from which one may not eat until one tithes as explained in its place. Instead, one may sell or slaughter all the offspring one desires until one tithes. Then animal designated as the tithe offering will be consecrated and must be eaten according to law, as explained above.

8 Our Sages established three fixed times for the tithing of one's animals.When one of these dates arrives, it is forbidden for a person to sell or slaughter the offspring of his animals until he tithes. If he slaughters, the meat is permitted.

These are the three dates: the fifteenth day before the Paschal sacrifice, the fifteenth day before Shavuot, and the fifteenth day before Sukkot. Each of these times is called a "threshing floor" for the tithing of animals. Thus the "threshing floor" for the tithing of animals is on the last day of the month of Adar, on the thirty-fifth day of the Counting of the Omer, and on the last day of the month of Elul.

Why were the "threshing floors" established on these dates? So that the animals would be available to the festive pilgrims. For even though it is permitted to sell animal offspring before they were tithed, as we explained, the people would refrain from selling them until they would tithe them and perform the mitzvah.

9 When a person brought all his sheep or cattle into a corral and began to sanctify the tenth animal that departs until there remained less than ten in the corral, those should be left for the next "threshing floor" and they are joined together with those born and tithed and all are collected in one "threshing floor." Even though one knows that some will remain in the corral, he is obligated to bring them all into the corral and the remainder will be left over.

1 The following laws apply when a person brought sheep into a corral, they began to depart one by one with him counting them as we explained, and he erred in numbering them, and called the eighth lamb or a lesser number, the tenth. In such a situation and, similarly, if he called the twelfth or a greater number, the tenth, those animals are not consecrated. If, however, he called the ninth or the eleventh, the tenth, they become consecrated.

This matter is a halachah, [communicated by the Oral Tradition: that an error when tithing causes one greater than the tenth or one lesser than the tenth to be consecrated, but not those greater or lesser than they.

Even if one called the ninth, the tenth, the tenth, the ninth, and the eleventh, the tenth, whether in error or intentionally, all three are consecrated.

2 What are the laws that apply to them? The ninth is not sacrificed. Instead, it should be eaten after it becomes blemished. The tenth is the tithe offering and the eleventh should be offered as a peace offering. Accompanying offerings are required to be brought with it. Its holiness may not be transferred to another animal, because it is considered as an animal to which holiness has been transferred itself.

When does the above apply? When the person counting was the owner of the animals. When, however, a person appoints an agent to tithe for him and the agent errs with regard to the ninth or the eleventh, only the true tenth one is consecrated, for he was not appointed as an agent to err and to cause him a loss, only to consecrate the animals in the appropriate manner.

3 The statement that if one called the eleventh animal "the tenth," it becomes consecrated applies when one called the tenth, "the ninth." If, however, he called the tenth "the tenth," and called the eleventh, "the tenth," the eleventh is not consecrated. The rationale is that the name "tenth" was not removed from the true tenth animal.

Moreover, even if the owner was silent when the tenth animal departed and did not call it "the tenth" or "the eleventh" and when the eleventh departed, he called it "the tenth," it is not consecrated. The rationale is that the tenth is consecrated as a matter of course, even though it was not explicitly called "the tenth." Hence, since the name "tenth" was not removed from the appropriate animal, the eleventh is not consecrated.

4 The following rules apply when the ninth and the tenth depart together. Whether the owner called both of them "the ninth" or both of them "the tenth," they are both consecrated. They both, however, should be eaten after they contract blemishes and neither should be sacrificed.

Similarly, if the tenth and the eleventh departed together, if he called them "the tenth," the tenth and the eleventh are considered as intermingled. It is as if a tithe offering becomes intermingled with a peace-offering, in which instance, the law is that they should be eaten after they contract blemishes, as we explained in Hilchot Pesulei HaMukdashim. If he called them "the eleventh," it is considered as if the tenth animal and an ordinary animal are intermingled and they should be eaten after they contract blemishes.

5 If, when the owner began counting, two animals, the first and the second, departed together, he should count all the animals in pairs and consecrate the tenth pair. Similarly, if he counted them all in sets of three or in sets of five, the tenth set becomes consecrated.

6 If, at the outset, two departed and he counted them as one, and then he called the third that departed after them, "the second," and continued counting one by one in the ordinary manner, the ninth and the tenth are both consecrated and should be eaten after they contract blemishes. The rationale is that the ninth is the true tenth, because two animals departed at the outset. And the one that he called "the tenth" is really, the eleventh and when the eleventh is called "the tenth," it is consecrated, as we explained.

7 If one counted backwards, i.e., when the first one departed, he counted it "ten;" when the second departed, he counted "nine;" until the tenth departed and he counted "one," it is consecrated, because the tenth is consecrated on its own accord.

8 If one mistakenly called the ninth, "the tenth" and the tenth remained in the corral, the ninth should be eaten after becoming blemished and the one that remained in the corral is the tithe. This applies even though it did not depart, nor was it designated as the tenth, because the tenth is consecrated on its own accord.

If the tenth died in the corral, the ninth should be eaten after becoming blemished and the eight which departed after being counted are exempt even though the tenth among them was not consecrated to be offered, but instead, died before departing, because once animals have been counted in a manner that was fitting for them to be tithed, they are exempt.

9 When one brought ten lambs into a corral and proceeded to count, if one of those counted died, he should continue counting and complete the reckoning in its ordinary manner, consecrating the tenth, even though there are only nine that are alive at the time.

10 If after a person began counting, one of the animals in the corral died, those which were counted are exempt, because once animals have been counted in a manner that was fitting for them to be tithed even though one was not separated for them, they are exempt, as stated. Those that remained in the corral should be left for a later "threshing floor" until others are added to them.

Similar concepts apply when one had fourteen lambs and brought all of them into a corral and four departed through one opening and were counted, then six departed through another opening and were counted and four remained in the corral. If the four depart through the opening that the six departed, one should be taken as the tithe and all the others are exempt. The four that departed at first through the first opening are exempt, because once animals have been counted in a manner that was fitting for them to be tithed, they are exempt.

If the remaining four departed from the opening through which the first four departed, the four that departed at the outset and the six that departed afterwards through the second opening are exempt, because each one of them was counted in a manner that was fitting for them to be tithed. For at the time each of the groups departed, others remained in the corral to complete the counting and the tithing. The four that remained, however, although they departed through the first opening and were counted, were not counted in a manner appropriate for tithing. Therefore they must be included in another "threshing floor."

The following laws apply if four departed through one opening, four departed through another opening, and six remained. If all six departed from the same one of the two openings, one should be taken as a tithe and all the lambs are exempt from being tithed again. If, however, the six departed from both openings, some from one and some from the other, the six are included in another "threshing floor." The eight that departed from the two openings at the outset, however, are exempt, for each set of four was counted in a manner appropriate for ten to be counted and the tithe taken, for there were six remaining in the corral.

11 If there were nineteen lambs in the corral and nine departed from one opening and nine departed from the other opening, the last one should be taken as the tithes and all the previous are exempt, for both sets of nine were counted in a manner appropriate for tithing.

12 If one was counting and a lamb stuck out its head and the majority of its body from the corral and then returned, it is considered as having been counted in all contexts.

13 If a person was counting and interrupted the reckoning because his colleague spoke to him or because night fell beginning the Sabbath, he should continue and complete his counting afterwards.

14 When one was counting those that departed one by one and one consecrated the tenth and one of those which had been counted jumped back into the corral, becoming intermingled with those which had not been counted as of yet and which were not tithed, all of those in the corral are exempt. The rationale is that there is a doubt concerning every lamb in the corral: Is the one that was counted and jumped back in or is it another one? And we have already stated, that all those which were counted are exempt.

15 If one of the animals selected as the tithes jumped back into the corral and became intermingled with the remaining animals, they should all be left to pasture until they contract a disqualifying blemish. Then they should be eaten after acquiring the blemish.

Mishneh Torah, Offerings for Unintentional Transgressions

Trans. by Eliyahu Touger, Moznaim Publishing

Chapter 1

1 Whenever a person inadvertently violates one of the negative commandments that involve a deed and for which one is liable for karet, he is obligated to bring a sin-offering. It is a positive commandment for him to offer a sin-offering for his inadvertent transgression.

2 All transgressions for which one is liable for karet for their willful violation, one is liable to bring a sin-offering for their inadvertent violation except for three transgressions: blasphemy, negating circumcision, and negating the Paschal sacrifice. Negating circumcision and the Paschal sacrifice does not require such an offering, because they are positive commandments and a sin-offering is brought only for the inadvertent violation of a negative commandment, as Leviticus 4:27 states that the offering should be brought for violating: "one of the commandments of God that forbids an act to be performed." And blasphemy does not involve a deed. Thus a sacrifice is not necessary, because Leviticus 4:27 states: "Acting in violation of one."

3 With regard to all the transgressions punishable by karet in the Torah except for the three which were mentioned, if a private individual violated one of these prohibitions inadvertently, he must bring a fixed sin-offering with the exception of an impure person who partook of sacrificial meat and an impure person who entered the Temple. These two do not bring a fixed sin-offering, but rather an adjustable guilt-offering, as will be explained.

4 Only an animal is brought as a fixed sin-offering. In contrast, an adjustable guilt-offering is a sacrifice whose object is not fixed. If one is rich, he must bring an animal as a sin-offering. If he is poor, he brings a fowl or a tenth of an ephah as a meal-offering, as will be explained. Thus all the sins for which a private person brings a fixed sin-offering are 43. They include:

a) one who is intimate with his mother,

b) one who is intimate with his wife's mother,

c) one who is intimate with his maternal grandmother,

d) one who is intimate with his paternal grandmother,

e) one who is intimate with his daughter,

f) one who is intimate with his daughter's daughter,

g) one who is intimate with his son's daughter,

h) one who is intimate with his wife's daughter,

i) one who is intimate with the daughter of his wife's daughter,

j) one who is intimate with the daughter of his wife's son,

k) one who is intimate with his sister,

l) one who is intimate with his sister who is the daughter of his father's wife,

m) one who is intimate with his father's sister,

n) m) one who is intimate with his mother's sister,

o) one who is intimate with his wife's sister,

p) one who is intimate with his father's wife,

q) one who is intimate with the wife of his father's brother,
r) one who is intimate with his son's wife,
s) one who is intimate with his brother's wife,
t) one who is intimate with another man's wife,
u) one who is intimate with a woman in the niddah state,
v) one who is intimate with a male,
w) one who is intimate with his father,
x) one who is intimate with his father's brother,
y) one who is intimate with an animal,
z) a woman who has an animal engage in relations with her. Thus all the prohibitions involving forbidden relations punishable by karet are 26.
Among other sins, there are seventeen. They are: a) one who serves a false deity by performing a deed,
b) one who gives his descendants to Molech,
c) one who divines through an ov,
d) one who performs a deed while divining with a yidoni,
e) one who desecrates the Sabbath,
f) one who performs forbidden labor on Yom Kippur,
g) one who eats or drinks on Yom Kippur,
h) one who eats chametz on Pesach,
i) one who partakes of fat,
j) one who partakes of blood,
k) one who partakes of sacrificial meat after the time for eating it passes,
l) one who partakes of sacrificial meat that was disqualified, because of an undesirable intent concerning time,
m) one who slaughters a sacrificial animal outside the Temple Courtyard,

n) one who offers a sacrifice outside the Temple Courtyard,
o) one who prepares anointing oil like that used in the Temple,
p) one who prepares incense like that used in the Temple,and
q) one who anoints himself with the anointing oil of the Temple. These are the 43 transgressions for which one brings a fixed sin-offering for their inadvertent violation.

What is the sacrifice that a person who inadvertently violates one of these transgressions should bring? If he inadvertently violated the prohibition against worshiping a false deity, he must bring a female goat in the first year of its life. This is the sacrifice mentioned in the portion Shelach Lecha. This applies whether the transgressor is an ordinary person, a king, a High Priest, or the priest anointed to lead the people in war. Every one is equal with regard to the inadvertent transgression of the worship of false divinities.

If, however, one inadvertently violated one of the other 42 transgressions mentioned above, different rules apply. If the transgressor was an ordinary person, he should bring a she-goat or a ewe. This is the sin offering of one of the common people mentioned in the portion Vayikra. If the king inadvertently violated one of these trangressions, he should bring a male goat as a sin-offering. If the transgressor is an anointed priest, he should bring a bull, the offspring of an ox as a sin-offering. It is burnt, as described there.

5 The same laws apply whether one person inadvertently violates one of these transgressions or many do, as implied by Numbers 15:29: "There will be one law for those who transgress inadvertently."

What is implied? If the people of a city inadvertently transgressed and thought the day was an ordinary day, but it was Yom Kippur. As a result, they all ate and performed work, each one of the transgressors should bring two sin-offerings, ewes or she-goats. Similarly, if they all inadvertently transgressed and offered incense to a false deity, each one of the transgressors must bring a goat in its first year of life as a sin-offering.

Chapter 2

1 A person is not liable for a sin-offering for an inadvertent transgression unless he acts inadvertently from the beginning to the end. If, however, he acted inadvertently at the beginning, but acted willfully at the end or began acting willfully, but acted inadvertently at the end, he is exempt from the obligation to bring a sin-offering.

What is implied? A person transferred an article from one domain to another on the Sabbath. If one lifted up the article willfully, but placed it down inadvertently or lifted it up inadvertently, but placed it down willfully, he is exempt. To be liable for a sin-offering, he must lift it up inadvertently and place it down inadvertently. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

2 If a person violated a transgression knowing that involved violation of a negative commandment, but he did not know that he is liable for karet for its violation, he is considered to have transgressed inadvertently and he must bring a sin-offering. If, however, he did know that it was punishable by karet, but was unaware of the obligation for a sacrifice, i.e., he did not know whether or not he was liable for a sacrifice for the transgression, he is considered to have acted willfully. For the lack of knowledge concerning a sacrifice is not considered as a lack of knowledge concerning these transgressions for which one is liable for karet.

3 When a person does not know the nature of the transgression that he violated, even though he definitely knows that he violated a negative commandment punishable by karet, he is exempt from bringing a sin-offering, as implied by Leviticus 4:23: "that he transgressed with regard to it," implying that he must know the transgression that he violated.
What is implied? There was a piece of forbidden fat and meat from a sacrifice left beyond its permitted time before him and he partook of one of them, but did not know which he ate; his wife who was in the niddah state and his sister were at home, he inadvertently was intimate with one of them, but did not know with whom he had relations; the Sabbath and Yom Kippur passed, he performed a forbidden labor on one of them, but did not know on which, he is exempt from the obligation to bring a sin-offering.

4 If a person transgressed, became aware of the transgression, and then forgot which transgression he violated, he should bring a sin-offering for whichever transgression he violated. This offering should be eaten, like the other sin-offerings that are eaten.

5 If one inadvertently committed one transgression, but there are two persons involved and he is unaware of the one with whom he committed the transgression, he is liable.

What is implied? There were two women in the niddah state. Inadvertently, he was intimate with one of them, but he did not know with whom. He had two sisters. Inadvertently, he was intimate with one of them, but he did not know with whom. In these instances, he is liable for a sin-offering. To what can this be compared? To two lamps that are burning and one extinguished one of them on the Sabbath without knowing which one he extinguished or two pots of forbidden fat from which he ate one and yet, he did not know the identity of the one from which he ate.In these instances, he is liable. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

6 In all situations when a person is obligated to bring a fixed sin-offering for his inadvertent transgression and he transgressed inadvertently and he becomes aware of the transgression after violating it, he is liable for a sin-offering, even though initially, he was not aware that this act is a a transgression.

What is implied? A child was captured by gentiles and raised by them without knowing who are the Jewish people or what their faith is. He performed labor on the Sabbath, ate forbidden fat, blood, and the like. When he discovers that he is Jewish and commanded to eschew all of the above, he is obligated to bring a sin-offering for every particular sin. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

7 When a person transgresses unintentionally by engaging in forbidden sexual relations or partaking of forbidden foods, he is liable for a sin-offering. If he does so with regard to the Sabbath, he is exempt from the obligation of a sin-offering.

What is implied? If he was acting casually with a woman and engaged in relations with her without intending to engage in relations and she is forbidden to him as an ervah, he is liable for a sin-offering. This ruling also applies if he thought that what was in his mouth was spittle and he swallowed it without the intent of eating at all and then he discovered that it was forbidden fat. If, by contrast, his intent was to lift up produce that was already cut and instead, he cut off a plant that was growing without intending to cut it off, he is exempt from a sin-offering, for the Torah forbade only the performance of purposeful labor, as explained in the appropriate place.

8 Whenever one performs one of the mitzvot and while he was performing it, a transgression punishable by karet was violated inadvertently, he is not liable for a sin-offering, because the person was acting with license.

What is implied? A man engaged in intimacy with his yevamah. She was in the niddah state, but he was unaware. He is exempt from a sin-offering, for he acted with license. If, by contrast, one was intimate with his wife when she was in the niddah state, he is liable, because he did not ask her before engaging in relations. With regard to his yevamah, however, he is not familiar with her, so that he might ask her.

Similarly, if a person had two infants to circumcise, one, on the Sabbath, and one on Friday or on Sunday, should he have forgotten and circumcised them both on the Sabbath, he is exempt from bringing a sin-offering. For he was licensed to circumcise one of them on the Sabbath, the Sabbath laws are suspended in his regard, and he performed a mitzvah. Even though two bodies are involved, since it is a pressing time, he is not precise. If, however, neither of the children was scheduled to be circumcised on the Sabbath and on the Sabbath, he circumcised a person who was not fit to be circumcised on the Sabbath, he is liable for a sin-offering.

9 The following rules apply when a proficient expert comes to circumcise a child before sunset on the Sabbath and he is told: "There is not enough time in the day left to perform the circumcision. If you begin circumcising, you will not be able to complete the act before the Sabbath departs. Thus you will have made a wound on the Sabbath without performing a mitzvah." If he says: "I am familiar with the task and deft and I will circumcise him speedily," should he not complete the circumcision until after the conclusion of the Sabbath, he is liable for a sin-offering, for they warned him.

10 When a person takes a lulav out to the public domain on the first day of Sukkot which falls on the Sabbath in order to fulfill his obligation or carries it four cubits in the public domain inadvertently, he is exempt from a sin-offering, because he acted with license.

Similarly, if one slaughters an animal for a Paschal sacrifice on the fourteenth of Nisan which fell on the Sabbath and afterwards, he discovered that the owners removed their connection from it, they died or became impure before it was slaughtered, or it became tereifah in a hidden place, e.g., its intestines or lungs were perforated, he is exempt, because he slaughtered it with license. If, however, it was discovered to be blemished or there was a readily apparent factor that caused it to be deemed tereifah, he is liable for a sin-offering, since he should have checked it before slaughtering. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

11 If one slaughtered a Paschal sacrifice on the Sabbath for the sake of another sacrifice in error, he is exempt, because the sacrifice is acceptable. For supplanting the designation of a sacrifice in error is not considered of consequence, as explained in Hilchot Pesulei HaMukdashim.

12 The following rules apply if, on the Sabbath, one slaughtered animals designated for other sacrifices for the sake of a Paschal sacrifice in error. If they are fit to serve as a Paschal sacrifice, he is free from the obligation of bringing a sin-offering, because he slaughtered with license. If they are not fit to serve as a Paschal sacrifice, e.g., the animal was female or in its second year of life, he is liable for a sin-offering, because they are not fitting for this sacrifice.

Similarly, one is liable for a sin-offering if he slaughtered an animal as a Paschal sacrifice on the Sabbath for the sake of individuals who cannot partake of it, for those who were not enumerated on it, for the uncircumcised, or for the ritually impure. If, however, he slaughtered it on the Sabbath for the sake of individuals who can partake of it and for those who cannot partake of it, for those enumerated on it and for those who were not enumerated on it, for the circumcised and for the uncircumcised, or for the pure and for the impure, he is exempt from bringing a sin-offering, because the Paschal sacrifice is acceptable. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

13 When a person slaughters an animal designated for a communal sacrifice on the Sabbath for an intent other than that for which it was designated, he is obligated to bring a sin-offering. Nevertheless, the fats and the organs from the sacrificial animal should be offered on the altar's pyre on Saturday evening. Similarly, if on the Sabbath one slaughtered other animals besides those required as the day's obligations, he is liable for a sin-offering for the additional animal.

14 A person who slaughters animals for individual sacrifices whose offering does not supersede the Sabbath prohibitions on the Sabbath inadvertently is liable for a sin-offering. One is, however, permitted to benefit from the meat of those sacrifices and the blood should not be cast on the altar. If he transgressed and cast the blood on the altar for the intent of those sacrifices whether without knowing it is a transgression or knowingly, the owner is considered to have fulfilled his obligation, the organs and fats may be offered on the altar's pyre, and the meat should be eaten. The one who slaughtered the animal should bring a sin-offering for his inadvertent violation.

15 The following laws apply when, on the Sabbath, there were two animals designated for communal offerings before a priest, one lean, and one stocky, and the sacrificial obligation of the day required - as either a sin-offeringor a burnt-offering - the offering of only one of them and he inadvertently slaughtered them both. If he slaughtered the lean one first and afterwards, slaughtered the stocky one, he is exempt from the obligation to bring a sin-offering. Indeed, he is told: "Bring the stocky animal and slaughter it as an initial preference." If, however, he slaughtered the stocky animal initially and then the lean one, he is liable for a sin-offering for the additional slaughter.

Nevertheless, in the latter instance, there is room for leniency if the stocky animal was slaughtered first and discovered to be tereifah because of a disqualifying factor in its intestines. Even though he did not know that the stocky one was tereifah when he slaughtered the lean one and he did not have that intent, since the last one was slaughtered as required by law, he is exempt from a sin-offering for its slaughter.

A similar law also applies if one spreads out a net to catch fish at sea on the Sabbath unknowingly and lifts up a child with the fish, he is exempt from bringing a sin-offering. Even though his intent was only to catch fish, since he acted unknowingly and lifted up a child with the fish, he is exempt whether he heard that a child had fallen into the sea or not, he is exempt. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

16 When, on the night of Pesach, a person had roasted meat from the Paschal sacrifice and meat that was left over from other sacrifices before him and intended to partake of the roasted meat which is a mitzvah and inadvertently partook of the leftover meat, he is liable for a sin-offering, since he did not perform a mitzvah when eating. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

1 When witnesses testify that a person violated a transgression that is punishable by a fixed sin-offering, but they did not warn him, instead, they told him: "We saw that you performed forbidden labor on the Sabbath" or "...that you partook of forbidden fat" and he replied: "I know that I did not perform that act," he is not liable for a sin-offering. The rationale is that since he would be exempt from bringing the sacrifice if he said: "I acted intentionally," when he says: "I did not eat" or "I did not perform," it is as if he said: "I did not eat inadvertently, but rather intentionally," in which instance, he is exempt from bringing the sacrifice and did not contradict the witnesses.

2 If the alleged transgressor remained silent and did not contradict the witnesses - indeed, even if a woman told him: "You partook of forbidden fat" or "...performed forbidden labor on the Sabbath" and he remained silent - he is liable to bring a sin-offering. If one witness told him: "This is forbidden fat" and he remained silentand then he partook of it inadvertently, he must bring a sin-offering. If he warned him, he is liable for lashes, even though the essence of the testimony depends on one witness.

3 We already explained in Hilchot Pesulei HaMukdashim that a person who set aside a sin-offering for eating forbidden fat should not bring it for the desecration of the Sabbath or for partaking of blood, as implied by Leviticus 4:28 which states: "And he shall bring his sacrifice, a she-goat... for the transgression that he committed." The sacrifice must be for the sake of the particular sin; one should not offer one designated for one sin for another. If he offered it, he disqualifies it.

In addition, our Sages said that if one set aside a sin-offering for forbidden fat that he ate on the previous day, he should not bring it for fat that he eats on the present day. Nevertheless, if he brings it for that purpose, he finds atonement. Needless to say, if a father sets aside a sin-offering and dies and the son was liable for that same transgression, the son should not bring his father's sacrifice for his transgression, as explained there.

4 When a person brings an animal as a sin-offering for two transgressions, it should be left to pasture until it contracts a disqualifying blemish and be sold. Half of the proceeds should be used to bring a sin-offering for one transgression and half for a sin-offering for the second transgression.

Similarly, if two people bring one animal as a sin-offering for two transgressions, it should be left to pasture until it contracts a disqualifying blemish and be sold. One should bring his sin-offering with half of the proceeds and the other should bring his sin-offering with the other half.

5 If one brings two animals as sin-offerings for one transgression, he should sacrifice whichever one he desires. The second should be left to pasture until it contracts a disqualifying blemish and be sold. A freewill offering should be brought with the proceeds.

6 If, however, a person brings two animals for sin-offerings for two transgressions without specifying the transgression for which each sacrifice is being brought, he should make that determination and slaughter one for one transgression and the other for the second.

7 We already explained in Hilchot Ma'aseh HaKorbanot, that no sacrifices at all are accepted from an apostate who worships idols or desecrates the Sabbath in public. When a person is an apostate with regard to a particular sin, we do not accept a sin-offering for him for that sin.

What is implied? If a person was an apostate with regard to partaking of forbidden fat and then he inadvertently partook of fat and brought a sin-offering for this transgression, it is not accepted until he repents.

Even if he was an apostate with regard to partaking of forbidden fat to fulfill his desires and once he accidentally partook of forbidden fat instead of permitted fat and he brought a sacrifice in atonement, it is not accepted from him. Since he partook of the forbidden fat willfully, whether to purposefully anger God or merely to fulfill his desires, he is considered as an apostate with regard to that transgression.

If a person was an apostate with regard to partaking of forbidden fat and then he inadvertently partook of blood, we accept a sin-offering he brings for partaking of blood, as we explained.

8 When a person committed a transgression punishable by karet inadvertently and set aside an animal as a sin-offering, and afterwards, became an apostate and then repented or he lost control of his intellectual or emotional faculties and then regained control, that animal may be brought as a sacrifice even though there was a time when it was not to be offered. The rationale is that living animals are not deemed unacceptable forever, as we explained in Hilchot Pesulei HaMukdashim. Therefore that animal itself should be sacrificed. Just like if it contracted a temporary blemish and was healed, it returns to an acceptable state, so too, if the owners became disqualified and then became acceptable, it should be sacrificed.

9 Those liable for sin-offerings and definitive guilt-offerings remain obligated to bring those offerings even after Yom Kippur passed. Those liable for tentative guilt-offerings, by contrast, are exempt after Yom Kippur passes, as indicated by Leviticus 16:30: "From all of your sins before God will you be purified." According to the Oral Tradition, it was taught: Any sin that only God recognizes will be granted atonement. Therefore if a person enters a situation where he is in doubt of whether he transgressed on Yom Kippur, even at nightfall, he is exempt from the obligation to bring a tentative guilt-offering, for the entire day of Yom Kippur generates atonement.

Thus we learn that a conditional guilt-offering is not brought for a situation concerning which one does not know which occurred on Yom Kippur, unless Yom Kippur will not generate atonement for that person, as will be explained.

10 Yom Kippur, sin-offerings and guilt-offerings do not generate atonement unless one repents and believes in the atonement they grant. If, however, one rebels against them, they do not generate atonement for him.

What is implied? A person was in a state of rebellion, but brought a sin-offering or a guilt-offering, saying or thinking in his heart that these will not generate atonement. Accordingly, even though they were offered as commanded, they do not generate atonement for him. When he repents from his rebellion, he must bring another sin-offering and/or guilt-offering.

Similarly, when one is in a state of rebellion on Yom Kippur, Yom Kippur does not atone for him. Therefore if he was obligated to bring a tentative guilt-offering and Yom Kippur passed while he was in a state of rebellion, Yom Kippur does not generate atonement for him. When he repents after Yom Kippur, he is obligated to bring all the tentative guilt-offerings for which he is liable.

11 All of the guilt-offerings required by the Torah hold back atonement with the exception of the guilt-offering of a nazirite. A person who is in doubt whether he or she is required to bring a nazirite offering or an offering brought by one lacking atonement and a sotah who bring an offering because of doubt must bring their offerings after Yom Kippur.

12 The following laws apply when a person is obligated to bring a sin-offering or a guilt-offering and he is being taken out of the court to be executed. If the animal to be offered had already been slaughtered, we let him tarry until the blood is cast on the altar and then he is executed. If, however, the animal to be offered has not been slaughtered, we do not let him tarry until it is offered on his behalf.

Chapter 4

1 When a person performs many transgressions for which one is required to bring a sin-offering in one lapse of awareness, he is liable for a sin-offering for every individual transgression. Even if he performs all the 43 transgressions that we listed in one lapse of awareness, he is liable for 43 sin-offerings.

Similarly, if a person performed one deed for which he is liable for many transgressions, he is liable for every transgression, provided all of the prohibitions involved take effect at once, the latter prohibition causes the entity to be forbidden to additional people, or the scope of the latter prohibition encompasses other entities together with the entity that was originally prohibited.

What is implied? A person who slaughters consecrated animals outside the Temple, on the Sabbath, for the sake of a false divinity is liable for three sin-offerings, one for slaughtering consecrated animals outside the Temple Courtyard, one for desecrating the Sabbath, and one for serving false divinities, for the three transgressions take effect at the same time.

When does the above apply? When the person serving the false divinity states that he is serving it at the conclusion of the slaughter of the animal. If, however, this was not his intent, as soon as he performed a portion of the slaughter for the sake of a false divinity, it becomes forbidden. Since he is not liable for slaughtering an animal outside the Temple Courtyard until he slits the two organs, necessary to slit for ritual slaughter or the larger portion of these two organs, when he completed the slaughter, he will have slaughtered an animal that is forbidden to be offered as a sacrifice, in which instance, he is not liable for slaughtering it outside the Temple Courtyard, as we explained.

If it was a sin-offering of fowl and half of its windpipe was cut and a person increased the slit even the slightest amount on the Sabbath for the sake of a false divinity, he is liable for three sin-offerings, for the three prohibitions take effect at the same time.

Similarly, a person who performs forbidden labor on Yom Kippur when it occurs on the Sabbath, is liable to bring two sin-offerings, because the two prohibitions take effect at the same time. Also, a person who is intimate with the wife of his brother who is alive while she is in the niddah state, he must bring three sin-offerings: one because he was intimate with a married woman and one, because she was his brother's wife; these are two prohibitions that take effect at the same time; and one, because she was in the niddah state, which is a prohibition that forbids additional entities besides the entity that was originally prohibited. Since this prohibition would apply with regard to her husband, it also applies to her brother-in-law.

In the same vein, one who sodomizes his father is liable for two sin-offerings, one because of the prohibition, Leviticus 18:7: "Do not reveal the nakedness of your father" and one because of the prohibition, ibid.:22: "Do not lie with a man." Similarly, one who sodomizes his father's brother is liable for two sin-offerings, one because it is written ibid.:14: "Do not reveal the nakedness of your father's brother" and one because of the general prohibition against sodomy.

When one sodomizes a male and has a male sodomize him in one lapse of awareness, he is liable for only one sin-offering, even though there are two bodies involved. This is derived from the prohibition: "Do not lie with a man" which makes both positions equally liable. Similarly, when one sodomizes an animal and has an animal sodomize him in one lapse of awareness, he is liable for only one sin-offering. One is deemed equally liable for either position of intimacy when engaging in relations with an animal or a male.

2 It is possible that there be an instance where a person engages in a single act of intimacy and he is liable for eight sin-offerings.

What is implied? Jacob begat a daughter whose name was Timna from his wife Zilpa. Lavan married Timna and begat a daughter named Serach from her. Lavan does not have any daughters other than Rachel. Thus Serach is the daughter of Jacob's daughter, and his wife's sister on her father's side. These are two prohibitions that take effect at the same time. Serach married Reuven. She became forbidden to Jacob's other sons and thus became forbidden to Jacob as well, as his son's wife. If Reuven died or divorced her and Serach married Jacob's maternal brother, since she became forbidden to Jacob's other brothers through this marriage, she becomes forbidden to Jacob on another count, because she is the wife of his brother. If her husband died or divorced her and Serach married Yishmael, since she becomes forbidden to Yishmael's other brothers, a further prohibition takes effect with regard to Jacob, the prohibition against relations with the wife of his father's brother. If Yishmael died and Serach became eligible to undergo yibbum with Isaac and Isaac transgressed and performed yibbum with her even though she is forbidden to him as a secondary relation, since she became forbidden to Jacob's other paternal brothers, she also became forbidden to Jacob because she is his father's wife and because she is a married woman, for these are two prohibitions that take effect at the same time.

Now if Jacob acted inadvertently and was intimate with Serach when she was in the niddah state, during the lifetime of Isaac, her husband, and during the lifetime of Rachel, Jacob's wife, he is liable for eight sin-offerings because of his relations with her. She is his daughter's daughter, his wife's sister, his daughter-in-law, the wife of his brother, the wife of his father's brother, the wife of his father, a married woman, and in the niddah state. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

3 In all situations when a woman who is forbidden as a relative becomes forbidden again due a prohibition that causes the entity to be forbidden to additional people, those additional people must be alive at that time, so that she will be forbidden to them. Then, as a result, since she becomes forbidden to them, a prohibition is also added applying to this individual. If, however, they are not alive, we do not say that since, would this man have had brothers or sons, she would have been forbidden to them, hence she is forbidden to the elder person. For at present, he has neither a son, nor a brother. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

4 The following laws apply when a man is married to three woman and he is intimate with the mother of one of them, and she is the mother of the mother of his second wife and the mother of the father of his third wife. Even though this elderly woman is his mother-in-law, the mother of his mother-in-law, and the mother of his father-in-law, and these are three distinct prohibitions and they all took effect at the same time, he is liable for only one sin-offering. The rationale is that the Torah uses the same phrase, Leviticus 18:17: "They are close relatives; it is a depraved design" with regard to relations with a woman and her daughter, her son's daughter, and her daughter's daughter. Thus the Torah considered the three as one body. Therefore the three prohibitions are considered as one.

5 If, however, one is intimate with his sister who is also the sister of his father and the sister of his mother, he is liable for three sin-offerings, as implied by Leviticus 20:17: "He revealed the nakedness of his sister." One might infer that he is liable for relations with his sister independently even though she is also the sister of his mother and the sister of his father.

How is such a situation possible? A man was intimate with his mother and begat two daughters with her. He was intimate with one of these daughters and begat a son. If this illegitimate child will be intimate with the other daughter, who is the sister of his illegitimate mother, who is his paternal sister, who is also the maternal sister of his father, he will be liable for three sin-offerings. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

Chapter 5

1 When a man is intimate with a woman who is forbidden to him as an ervah many times in a single period of lapse of awareness, it is all considered as one inadvertent violation and he is liable only for one sin-offering. Even though there were many times between each experience of intimacy, since he did not become aware in the interim, and she is only one person, he is only liable once.

If, by contrast, one inadvertently engaged in relations with her, the transgression became known to him afterwards, and then he inadvertently engaged in relations with that same woman, the transgression became known to him afterwards, and then he inadvertently engaged in relations with that same woman again, he is liable for a sin-offering for every time he engaged in relations. For his awareness separates between the inadvertent transgressions.

2 When a man engages in relation with a woman forbidden as an ervah many times in one ongoing state of lapsed awareness, but the woman with whom he engaged in relations became aware of the transgression between each experience of intimacy, thus from her perspective, the relations involved several lapses of awareness, he brings one sin-offering and she brings a sin-offering for every time they engaged in relations.

If he had knowledge of the transgressions in the interim and she act in one ongoing state of lapsed awareness, he brings many sin-offerings and she brings one sin-offering.

3 When a man engages in relations with many women forbidden to him as ariyos in one ongoing state of lapsed awareness, he is liable for a sin-offering for every one of them. This applies even if they are all forbidden because of the same prohibition, because they are separate persons.

What is implied? A man was intimate with five women in the niddah state, he was intimate with five of his sisters or five of his daughters in one ongoing state of lapsed awareness, he is liable for a sin-offering for every person.

From this ruling, we learned the following interpretation of our Sages' statement that a person who sodomized a male and was sodomized by a male in one state of lapsed awareness is liable for only one sin-offering. When does this apply? When the same male was involved. If, however, there were two other males involved, whether he sodomized both or sodomized one and one sodomized him, he is liable for each person. The same laws also apply when one sodomizes an animal and has an animal sodomize him.

4 When a women has many animals engage in relations with her in one period of lapsed awareness, she is liable for a sin-offering for every animal, for there are different bodies involved. It is like engaging in relations with many men in period of lapsed awareness in which instance, she is liable for a sin-offering for every man with whom she was intimate.

5 When a woman's husband went overseas and she heard that he died or witnesses came and testified that he died and she married, whether on her own initiative or according to the counsel of the court, and then she discovered that her first husband is alive, she is liable only for one sin-offering. If she married many men or was promiscuous with many men, she is liable for a sin-offering for every man with whom she was intimate, for they are different persons even though she acted in one state of lapsed awareness.

The following rules applies when a man was intimate with a woman in the niddah state inadvertently, then she became purified from her niddah state, immersed herself, then became a niddah again and they were intimate a second time in the same period of lapsed awareness. He is liable for a sin-offering for every span of time in which she is in the niddah state, even though it is in one state of lapsed awareness and only one person is involved. The rationale is that one span of time in which she is in the niddah state is distinct from another span of time in which she is in the niddah state. It is as if he was intimate with two different women in the niddah state.

6 When a man is intimate with his wife at a time when she is not expected to menstruate and she menstruates in the midst of relations, they are exempt from bringing a sin-offering. This is considered as a situation beyond their control and not an inadvertent transgression. For with regard to an inadvertent transgression, the transgressor carries a certain amount of culpability, for he should have checked and been careful. Had he examined the matter thoroughly and been careful in asking questions, he would not have transgressed. Since he did not take the trouble to examine and research the matter before acting, he requires atonement. In this situation, however, what should the person have done? She was pure and they were intimate at a time when menstruation was not expected. This is considered as a matter beyond their control. Therefore, whether the blood was found on her inspection cloth or his, they are exempt.

If, however, the man transgressed and was intimate with her close to the time when she could have been expected to menstruate, thinking that they could be intimate and separate before she would menstruate, and instead, she menstruated in the midst of relations, they are liable to bring a sin-offering, for this is an inadvertent transgression. Therefore, if blood is found on his inspection cloth, they are both impure and are obligated to bring a sacrifice. Slightly more lenient rules apply if blood was found on her examination cloth. If she cleaned herself immediately after separating from her husband, without waiting, they are both impure and are obligated to bring a sacrifice. If, however, she waited long enough so that she could have stretched her hand under the pillow or under the bolster and take an inspection cloth to examine herself and afterwards, she cleaned herself, they are both are considered to have contracted impurity of doubtful status and are exempt from bringing a sacrifice. If she waited long enough so that she could have descended from the bed and washedand afterwards, she cleaned herself and discovered blood, her husband is pure.

7 When a man transgressed and was intimate with his wife close to the time when she could have been expected to menstruate with the intent that he would complete relations before she began to menstruate and the woman felt that she became impure in the midst of relations and informed her husband of this, he should not withdraw while erect, as we explained in Hilchot Issurei Bi'ah. If he did not know that it is forbidden for him to withdraw immediately and he withdrew while erect, he is liable for two sin-offerings: one for entering, for he was intimate with a niddah, and one, for withdrawing, since withdrawing also afforded him pleasure, as entering did.

When does the above apply? When he knew that it was forbidden to be intimate close to the time when she could have been expected to menstruate, but had the intent that he would complete relations before she began to menstruate and did not know that it is forbidden to withdraw while erect. Thus it is as if he has two lapses of awareness regarding two experiences of intimacy. If, however, he did not know that it was forbidden to be intimate close to the time when she could have been expected to menstruate and did not know that it is forbidden to withdraw from an impure woman immediately, he is liable for only one sin-offering even when he withdrew immediately, while erect. The rationale is that his entry and his withdrawal are considered as two experiences of intimacy performed during one lapse of awareness.

The same principle applies with regard to other forbidden sexual relations. If one inadvertently was intimate with a woman under the conception that she was permitted and, while in the midst of intimacy, he became aware that she was forbidden, he should not withdraw immediately, for withdrawing also affords him pleasure, as entering does. If he does not know that it is forbidden to separate immediately and separates while he is erect, he is only liable for one sin-offering, for the act is considered as one inadvertent transgression.

1 The laws concerning inadvertent consumption of foods are the same as those concerning inadvertent intimate relations. Therefore if one partook of the same type of forbidden food many times in one lapse of awareness, he is only liable for one sin-offering even though there were many days in the interim.

What is implied? One partook of forbidden fat on a given day and did so also on the following day, and the day following that in one state of lapsed awareness, he is liable for only one sin-offering, even if they were cooked in different pots. If, by contrast, one inadvertently partook of an olive-sized portion of forbidden fat, he became aware of the transgression and then again inadvertently partook of an olive-sized portion of forbidden fat and became aware of the transgression, he is liable for each time he ate. For gaining awareness causes each inadvertent transgression to be considered as distinct.

If one partook of half an olive-sized portion of forbidden fat and then partook of another half of an olive-sized portion of forbidden fat in one state of lapsed awareness, they are joined together, even though they were cooked and served in different pots and he made an interruption between partaking of them. For the different pots do not cause the inadvertent transgressions to be considered as distinct. This applies provided he did not take more than the time to eat three eggs between the two times he ate, as explained in Hilchot Ma'achalot Assurot. Just as anything eaten in this time is combined to comprise a minimum measure to make a person who did so willfully liable for lashes, so too, anything eaten in this time is combined to comprise a minimum measure to make a person who did so inadvertently liable to bring a sacrifice.

2 If a person partook of notar from five different sacrifices, an olive-sized portion from each sacrifice, in one lapse of awareness, he is liable for only one sin-offering, even if he partook of them in five different pots. The rationale is that they are all included in one prohibition and the different pots do not cause the inadvertent transgressions to be considered as distinct. Nor do the different bodies of the sacrifices cause the inadvertent transgressions to be considered as distinct. There is no difference whether one partakes of meat that is notar from one sacrifice or from many sacrifices.

Similarly, when one slaughters five sacrificial animals outside the Temple Courtyard in one lapse of awareness, he is only liable for one sin-offering. To what can the matter be compared? To one who bows down to five forbidden images in one lapse of awareness.

3 If one let the blood of his animal and received it in two cups and drank them both in one lapse of awareness, he is liable for only one sin-offering.

4 When a person eats foods that are forbidden because of different prohibitions in one lapse of awareness, he is liable for one sin-offering for every type of prohibition.

What is implied? One partook of an olive-sized portion of each of the following: forbidden fat, blood, notar, and piggul, in one lapse of awareness must bring four sin-offerings. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

Anyone who eats a single olive-sized portion of food that is forbidden because of many different prohibitions in one lapse of awareness must bring a sin-offering for every prohibition, provided the prohibitions either cause the entity to be forbidden to additional people, the scope of the latter prohibition encompasses other entities together with the entity that was originally prohibited, or the two prohibitions take effect at the same time.

For this reason, if a person who is ritually impure partook of an olive-sized portion of forbidden fat that was notar on Yom Kippur, he must bring four sin-offerings and a guilt-offering: one sin-offering, because he was impure and he partook of consecrated food, one, because he partook of forbidden fat, one, because he partook of notar, and one, because he ate on Yom Kippur, provided another food is combined with this olive-sized portion so that it comprises a date-sized portion. And he must bring a guilt-offering for the misappropriation of consecrated property, for he inadvertently derived benefit from consecrated property.

5 When a person eats and drinks on Yom Kippur in one lapse of awareness, he is only liable for one sin-offering. Eating and drinking is considered as a single act.

6 When a person performs a forbidden labor on Yom Kippur that falls on the Sabbath, he is liable for two sin-offerings, because they are two prohibitions that take effect at the same time.

7 When a person eats a half of an olive-sized portion of forbidden fat and half an olive-sized portion of blood in one lapse of awareness, he is not liable for an offering. Just as the prohibitions are not combined to make one liable for lashes, as explained in Hilchot Ma'achalot Assurot, so too, they are not combined to make him liable for a sacrifice.

8 When a person inadvertently partook of half an olive-sized portion of a forbidden substance and then became aware of his transgression, but forgot and partook of another half an olive-sized portion of the same substance in a second lapse of awareness, he is not liable for an offering. The rationale is that he became aware in the interim and awareness causes a distinction to be made even with regard to half the required measure.
Similarly, if one wrote one letter on the Sabbath inadvertently and then became aware of the matter and then forgot and then wrote another letter next to the first in a second lapse of awareness, he is not liable for a sin-offering. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

In a like vein, if a person transferred an article two cubits in the public domain on the Sabbath inadvertently, transferred it another two cubits in conscious violation of the Sabbath laws and then transferred it two cubits inadvertently, he is liable if he transferred it by throwing it. The rationale is not that his gaining awareness after half the measure is not significant, but rather that, after throwing the article, he is unable to bring it back. Therefore the awareness he gained in the interim is of no avail. If he transferred the article by passing it, he is exempt, because gaining awareness after half the required measure has been completed is significant.

9 The following rules apply when a person ate an olive-sized portion of forbidden fat and then a second olive-sized portion of forbidden fat in one lapse of awareness. If he became aware of the first transgression and then became aware of the second, he must bring two sin-offerings, because the difference in his becoming aware of the transgressions creates a distinction even though he did not set a side a sacrificial animal yet. If, however, he became aware of both of them at the same time, he should bring only one sin-offering. Similarly, it appears to me that the law is the same with regard to forbidden sexual relations.

10 If one ate an olive-sized portion and a half of forbidden fat in a single lapse of awareness, then became aware that he partook of the olive-sized portion and then, partook of another half of an olive-sized portion while he is unaware of partaking of the other half, he is only liable for one sin-offering. The rationale is that the second half of an olive-sized portion is not combined with the first half, even though it was eaten during its lapse of awareness, because he had become aware of part of the transgression performed in the initial lapse of awareness.

11 A person partook of two olive-sized portions of forbidden fat and then became aware of eating one of them. He then partook of another olive-sized portion while he was unaware of the second transgression and then brought a sin-offering to atone for the first transgression. The first and the second transgressions are atoned for by this sacrifice, but not the third. Instead, when he becomes aware of it, he should bring another sin-offering.

If he brought a sin-offering for the third transgression, it secures atonement for the second and the third, because they both were committed during a single lapse of awareness, but atonement for the first is not secured by this sacrifice.

If he brought a sin-offering for the middle transgression, atonement is secured for all three. The rationale is that both the first and the third were performed during the same lapse of awareness that involved the second. Hence when he becomes aware of the first and the third transgressions, he does not have to bring an additional sin-offering.

12 A person ate one of two pieces of fat, one kosher and one forbidden, and he was unsure whether he had eaten the permitted fat or the forbidden fat and then he ate another piece in a similar mixture and again he was unsure whether he had eaten the permitted fat or the forbidden fat. If, afterwards, he gained definitive knowledge that he ate forbidden fat on both occasions, he is only liable for one sin-offering. Although the lack of certainty concerning whether or not he transgressed is sufficient to create a distinction with regard to a tentative guilt-offering, it is not considered as gaining awareness to require a distinction between the sin-offerings brought for atonement.

Chapter 7

1 When a person prostrates himself to a false deity, poured a libation to it, offers a burnt-offering to it, and slaughters an animal as a sacrifice to it in one lapse of awareness, he is liable for four sin-offerings. Similarly, if he defecated to Peor or threw a rock to Mercury in one lapse of awareness, he is liable for two sin-offerings. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations. The person will be liable for every act of service performed.

When does the above apply? When he consciously desired to serve a false deity, but was unaware that these acts constituted service. If, however, he willfully performed these acts, but inadvertently served a false deity, he is liable for only one sin-offering.

What is implied? He knew that a particular image was a false deity and that it is forbidden to serve it, but did not know that bowing down to it or pouring a libation constituted a transgression and bowed down and poured a libation, he is liable for two sin-offerings. If, however, he knew that these were ways in which false deities were served and that it is forbidden to perform these acts in service of a false deity, but did not know that a particular image was considered a false deity, because it was not made of gold or silver and he was under the mistaken impression that only images of gold and silver were considered as false deities and hence, performed all these acts of service to it, he is liable for only one sin-offering.

2 A great general principle was stated with regard to the violation of the Sabbath prohibitions: Anyone who forgets the fundamental principle of the Sabbath, failing to recall that the Jews were commanded to observe the Sabbath or was captured and taken among gentiles while a child or converted in his childhood and remained living among gentiles, he is liable for only one sin-offering even though he performed many forbidden labors on many different Sabbaths, for it is all one lapse of awareness.
Similarly, he is liable for one sin-offering for all the forbidden fat that he ate, one sin-offering for all the blood that he ate. Similar laws apply to all analogous situations regarding these sins. Whenever one knows the fundamental principle of the Sabbath, but forgot that a given day was the Sabbath and thought it was an ordinary day, he is liable for only one sin-offering for the entire day, even though he performed many forbidden labors on it. Similarly, he is liable for a sin-offering for every Sabbath that he inadvertently desecrated.

3 Anyone who knows that a given day is the Sabbath, but inadvertently performed forbidden labors without knowing that these labors are forbidden or knew that they were forbidden, but did not know that one was liable for karet for their violation, is liable for a sin-offering for every general category of forbidden labor. Even if he performed all 39 forbidden labors in one lapse of awareness, he must bring 39 sin-offerings.

4 If he forgot that the day is the Sabbath and also forgot that these labors were forbidden, he is only liable for one sin-offering.

5 When a person performs an action that is the primary forbidden activity of a particular category of labor and also a derivative in one lapse of awareness, he is only liable for one sin-offering. Needless to day, if he performs many derivatives of one category of forbidden labor, he is only liable for one sin-offering.

6 If he performs derivatives of one category of forbidden labor and derivatives of another category of forbidden labor in one lapse of awareness, it appears to me that he is liable for two sin-offerings.

7 If he performs several activities comprising a single category of forbidden labor in one lapse of awareness, e.g., he sowed, extended a vine by replanting one of its branches, grafted a branch onto a tree, he is liable for only one sin-offering. In Hilchot Shabbat, it has already been explained which activities are primary labors, which are derivatives, and which activities comprise a single category of forbidden labor.

8 When a person performs activities comprising a single category of forbidden labor on many Sabbaths, whether he was aware that it was the Sabbath, but unaware that he was performing forbidden labors or he was unaware that it was the Sabbath, but aware that the labor he performed is forbidden on the Sabbath, he is liable for a sin-offering for every forbidden labor he performs.

What is implied? He knew that it was the Sabbath and sowed on that day, because he did not know that sowing constituted forbidden labor. Similarly, on the following Sabbath, he knew that it was the Sabbath and planted because he did not know that planting constituted forbidden labor. Similarly, on the third Sabbath, he extended a vine, because he did not know that extending constituted forbidden labor, he is liable for a sin-offering for each one, even though they all comprise a single category of forbidden labor, because the different Sabbaths are considered like different bodies.

9 When a person was unaware that it was the Sabbath and sowed upon it, although he knew that sowing is a forbidden labor, on the following Sabbath, he forgot that it was Sabbath and planted, although he knew that planting is a forbidden labor, and on the third Sabbath, he forgot that it was Sabbath and extended, although he knew that extending is a forbidden labor, he is liable for a sin-offering for every Sabbath. The rationale is that the days between each Sabbath are considered equivalent to gaining awareness of one's transgression and create a distinction.

10 When a person harvested and ground a dried-fig-sized measure of grain without being aware that it is Sabbath, but knowing that these labors are forbidden on the Sabbath, he is only liable for one sin-offering. Afterwards, he harvested and ground a dried-fig-sized measure of grain while aware that it is the Sabbath, but forgetting that these labors were forbidden, in which instance, he is liable for a sin-offering for every forbidden labor. He then became aware of the harvesting performed without being aware that it is Sabbath, but knowing that these labors are forbidden on the Sabbath. In such an instance, the one act of harvesting draws the other after it and the one act of grinding draws the other after it. Thus it is as if he performed all four acts without being aware that it is Sabbath, but knowing that these labors are forbidden on the Sabbath, in which instance he is liable for only one sin-offering. After he brings that sin-offering, he has secured atonement for all the other forbidden labors he performed. When he later becomes aware of them, he does not have to bring another sin-offering.

If, however, he first becomes conscious of the harvesting performed while aware that it is the Sabbath, but forgetting that these labors were forbidden, and brings a sin-offering, he receives atonement for the harvesting that he became aware of and on the harvesting and grinding performed without being aware that it is Sabbath, but knowing that these labors are forbidden, because the two are considered as one labor and the harvesting and grinding are drawn after the harvesting performed when he was aware that it was the Sabbath. Thus there remains without atonement, only the grinding performed when he was aware that it was the Sabbath until he becomes aware of it and brings a second sin-offering.

If a person harvested half a dried-fig-sized measure without being aware that it is Sabbath, but knowing that this labor is forbidden and then harvested half a dried-fig-sized measure while aware that it is Sabbath, but not aware that this labor is forbidden, these two activities are combined.

One harvesting draws the other after it. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations with regard to the other forbidden labors.

11 When, on the Sabbath, a person had the intent to cut an object that was already severed from the ground, but instead, cut an object that was connected to the ground, even though he had the intent to cut, since his desired intent was not fulfilled, he is exempt from a sin-offering. He is considered as one who is merely busying himself and the Torah forbade only purposeful labor, as we explained several times.

12 The following rule applies when a person stirs coals on the Sabbath, in which instance, he extinguishes the upper ones and ignites the lower ones. If he intended to extinguish and ignite, he is liable for two sin-offerings. If he stirred the coals to become warm and they were ignited on their own, he is liable, because one is liable for performing a forbidden labor even if he has no need for the actual labor he performed, as explained in Hilchot Shabbat. Just as he is liable for karet for the intentional performance of forbidden labor, he is liable for a sin-offering for unintentional violation.

1 Every transgression for which one is liable for a fixed sin-offering if he transgressed inadvertently carries liability for a provisional guilt-offering if he is unsure whether he violated it.

What does being unsure mean? If a person is in doubt whether he inadvertently violated this transgression or not, he is obligated to bring a guilt-offering, as Leviticus 5:17-18 states: "If he was unaware and became guilty, he shall bear his iniquity. He shall bring an unblemished ram from sheep, of the given value, as a guilt-offering." This is referred to as a provisional guilt-offering, for it brings atonement when the person is in doubt, tentatively, until he knows with certainty that he sinned inadvertently, at which time, he brings a sin-offering.

2 A person is not liable for a provisional guilt-offering unless there is a prohibition that is established. What is implied? A person partook of forbidden fat, but was in doubt whether there was an olive-sized portion or not. There was a piece of forbidden fat and a piece of permitted fat before a person and he partook of one of them, but he did not know which one he ate. His wife and his sister were with him at home. He was intimate with one of them, but did not know with whom. Both the Sabbath and a weekday passed and he performed a forbidden labor on one of them, but did not know the day on which he acted. He performed a deed on the Sabbath, but did not know whether it falls into a category of forbidden labor. In all these and similar instances, he should bring a provisional guilt-offering.

If, however, a prohibition has not definitely been established, he is not liable for a provisional guilt-offering. Thus if there was one piece of fat before a person and he was unsure whether it was permitted or forbidden and he partook of it, he is exempt, for there is no established prohibition. Similarly, one who partakes of the fat of a ko'i is exempt from a provisional guilt-offering, for there is not an established prohibition.Similarly, when a man is intimate with a woman who is unsure whether or not she is in the niddah state or we are unsure whether she is an ervah due to family connections, he is exempt from a provisional guilt-offering.

Therefore a man who is intimate with a woman is exempt from this sacrifice, if: a) she finds blood on the examination cloth she uses after time has transpired, or

b) he married his yevamah within three months of his brother's death and she gave birth and it is not known whether the child was conceived by her first husband and was born after a nine-month pregnancy or he was conceived by her second husband and was born after a seven-month pregnancy.Similar laws apply in all analogous situations, for there is no established prohibition.

3 An individual can be required to bring a provisional guilt-offering in the following circumstances:

a) he who ate a piece of fat and one witness states: "What you ate was forbidden fat," while the other states; "You did not partake of forbidden fat;

b) a woman said that he partook of forbidden fat and another woman said that he did not. Since he does not know whether he partook of the forbidden fat or not and the existence of the prohibited substance has been established, he is obligated to bring a provisional guilt-offering.

Similarly, if one was intimate with a married woman about whom one witness states: "Her husband died," but another states: "He did not die," he is obligated to bring a provisional guilt-offering. This law also applies when there is a question if a woman is divorced, for the prohibition was established.If, however, there is a doubt whether or not a woman was consecrated, one who is intimate with her is not liable, because the prohibition has not been established.

4 A person is liable for a provisional guilt-offering in the following situations: There were two pieces of fat before him: one forbidden and one permitted. He ate one inadvertently and a gentile or a dog came and ate the second. The gentile or the dog ate the first and a Jew ate the second. One ate the first intentionally and the second, inadvertently, or he ate the first inadvertently and the second, intentionally. In all these situations, he is liable, because the existence of a prohibited substance had been established.

If, however, he partook of both of them intentionally, he is exempt from bringing a sacrifice. And if he ate them both inadvertently, he must bring a sin-offering. If he ate the first inadvertently and another person came and ate the second inadvertently, they are both obligated to bring a provisional guilt-offering. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

5 A transgressor is exempt from bringing a sacrifice in the following situations. There was a piece of forbidden fat and piece of notar before him. He ate one of them inadvertently, but did not know which one he ate. His wife who was in the niddah state and his sister were at home with him. He was intimate with one of them inadvertently, but did not know which one. The Sabbath and Yom Kippur followed directly after each other, he performed a forbidden labor in the twilight between them. He does not bring a sin-offering, because he does not know which transgression he performed, as we explained. Nor does he bring a provisional guilt-offering, because he knows with certainty that he transgressed.

6 Whenever a person performs a deed that obligates him for one fixed sin-offering when he knows with certainty that he transgressed, he is liable for a provisional guilt-offering if he is unsure whether he transgressed. Whenever a person performs a deed that obligates him for many fixed sin-offerings when he knows with certainty that he transgressed, he is liable for many provisional guilt-offerings, matching the number of sin-offerings, if he is unsure whether he transgressed.

What is implied? Just as a person who ate forbidden fat, blood, notar, and piggul in one lapse of awareness is liable for four sin-offerings,so, too, if he is uncertain whether he partook of them or not, he must bring four provisional guilt-offerings. Similarly, if he is unsure if the woman with whom he was intimate is his wife or so-and-so, another woman who is forbidden to him as an ervah and for whom he would be liable eight sin-offerings if he was intimate with her, he must bring eight provisional guilt-offerings.

7 When a person ate one of two pieces of fat and he was unsure whether he ate forbidden fat or permitted fat, and after that doubt arose in his mind, he ate another one of two pieces of fat and he was unsure whether he ate forbidden fat or permitted fat, he must bring two provisional guilt-offerings.

8 Just as the definitive knowledge that one transgressed creates a distinction with regard to sin-offerings, so too, the awareness that one possibly transgressed creates a distinction with regard to provisional guilt-offerings. Therefore if one partook of five olive-sized portions of forbidden fat in one lapse of awareness and then became aware of the possibility that he sinned with regard to one of them and later, became aware of the possibility that he sinned with regard to a second one, and then with regard to the subsequent ones, he is liable for a provisional guilt-offering for each one.

9 When there is a piece of permitted fat and a piece of forbidden fat and a person ate one of them without knowing which and thus brought a provisional guilt-offering and then partook of the second piece of fat, he must bring a sin-offering. If another person partook of the second piece, that second person must bring a provisional guilt-offering, as stated.

10 When there is a piece of forbidden fat and a piece of forbidden fat that is notar and a person ate one of them without knowing which one, he must bring a sin-offering to atone for partaking of forbidden fat and a provisional guilt-offering because of the possibility that he partook of notar. If he ate the second piece in a second lapse of awareness, he must bring three sin-offerings. If the piece of notar was worth a p'rutah, he must also bring a definitive guilt-offering because of the misappropriation of consecrated articles.

If he ate one of the two pieces and another person came and ate the second, he should bring a sin-offering and a provisional guilt-offering and the second person should bring a sin-offering and a provisional guilt-offering. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

1 There are five sins for whose violation one must bring a guilt-offering. It is called a definitive guilt-offering, because it is not brought because of a doubt. They are: a) intimacy with a consecrated maid-servant, b) robbery, c) misappropriation of sacred articles, d) the contraction of ritual impurity by a nazirite, and e) purification from the infliction of tzara'at.
What is implied by intimacy with a consecrated maid-servant? When a man is intimate with a consecrated maid-servant whether intentionally or inadvertently, he must bring a guilt-offering, provided she is past majority, aware of the transgression, willfully participating, and she had previously engaged in relations in the ordinary manner, and the relations were completed, so that she will also be liable for lashes, as Leviticus 19:20-21 states: "There will be an investigation... and he will bring his guilt-offering," i.e., she receives lashes and he brings a sacrifice.

2 According to the Oral Tradition, it was taught, in a situation where she is liable for lashes, he is liable for a sacrifice. When she is exempt from lashes, he is exempt from a sacrifice.

3 When a youth who is nine years old is intimate with a consecrated maidservant, she is liable for lashes and he is obligated to bring a sacrifice. It appears to me that he does not bring the sacrifice until he comes of age and attains intellectual maturity.

4 We have already explained in Hilchot Bi'ot Assurot, the definition of the term shifchah charufah used in the Torah and that the two are not liable until he is intimate with her in an ordinary manner and the relations were completed. Therefore if two people tell him: "You were intimate with a consecrated maidservant," and he said: "I was not intimate with her," his word is accepted and he does not bring a sacrifice as a result of their statements. For he knows whether or not he completed the relations and his statement: "I was not intimate" can be interpreted as "I did not complete relations."

5 Although a man is intimate with a consecrated maidservant many times, he is only liable for one guilt-offering. What is implied? A man was intimate with a consecrated maidservant many times intentionally or was intimate with her inadvertently, he became aware of the matter, and then he was intimate with her inadvertently again and became aware of the matter - even if the sequence occurs 100 times in 100 lapses of awareness, he is only liable for one guilt-offering. It atones for him for everything, for both his intentional and inadvertent transgressions with her.

When does the above apply? When he was intimate with only one consecrated maidservant. If, however, he was intimate with many consecrated maidservants, even in one lapse of awareness, he is liable for a guilt-offering for every consecrated maidservant.

6 If a man was intimate with a consecrated maidservant, set aside his guilt-offering and then was intimate with her again afterwards, he is liable for every time they were intimate. Setting aside a sacrifice creates a distinction. Thus it is as if he offered the sacrifice and then was intimate with the consecrated maidservant again.

Similarly, if a man was intimate with one consecrated maidservant five times in a single lapse of awareness, he then became aware of one transgression and set aside a guilt-offering and then became aware of the second, he must set aside another one even though both transgression were committed in a single lapse of awareness. Since he did not become aware of the transgression until after he set aside the offering, it is as if he was intimate with her after he set aside the offering. For the laws pertaining to one who acts inadvertently and one who acts intentionally are the same with regard to a consecrated maidservant.

7 In which instance is one obligated to bring a guilt-offering for robbery? Whenever anyone has in his possession a p'rutah's worth or more of Jewish money, whether he obtained it by robbery or theft, or it was entrusted to him, lent to him, came to him as part of partnership agreement, or in another way, and he denied possession of it, taking a false oath, whether intentionally or inadvertently, he must bring a guilt-offering to atone for his transgression. This is called a guilt-offering for robbery.

It is explicitly stated in the Torah that a person will not receive atonement through a guilt-offering until he returned the money in his possession to its owner. The payment of the additional fifth does not, however, hold back the atonement.

We already explained in Hilchot Sh'vuot the types of oaths for which a person will be liable to bring this guilt-offering and when he is exempt from it, in which instances one would be liable for many guilt-offerings commensurate with the number of oaths he is obligated to take and in which instances, he would be liable for only one guilt-offering.

8 In which instance is one obligated to bring a guilt-offering for misappropriating consecrated property? Anyone who inadvertently derives a p'rutah's worth of benefit from consecrated property must make restitution for the benefit he derived, add a fifth, and bring a sacrifice to receive atonement. We already explained in Hilchot Me'ilah that bringing the sacrifice and making restitution for the principal prevent atonement from being granted. The additional fifth does not prevent atonement from being granted.

9 When a person partakes of food for which one is liable for misappropriating consecrated property in five different dishes in one lapse of awareness, he is liable for a guilt-offering for each one, even though the meat comes from one sacrifice, provided he derives a p'rutah's worth of benefit each time he eats. The rationale is that the different dishes create a distinction and they are considered as different types of food even though they are not considered as different transgressions with regard to the liability for karet. The rationale for this is that there is an added dimension of severity to the prohibition against misappropriating consecrated property, for one who causes others to derive benefit is liable just as one who benefits, the measure for which one is liable can be accumulated over time, and when an agent performs the mission with which he is charged, the principal is liable. These concepts do not apply with regard to other prohibitions.

10 Whenever a person is obligated to bring a definitive guilt-offering, he must become aware of his transgression beforehand and then offer his guilt-offering. If, by contrast, he offers the sacrifice before he becomes aware of the transgression and afterwards, becomes aware of it, he does not fulfill his obligation with it.

A king and an anointed priest bring the same sacrifice as an ordinary person for every transgression for which one is obligated to bring a definitive guilt-offering.

11 Whenever a doubt arises in a person's mind whether or not he committed a transgression for which he is liable to bring a definitive guilt-offering, he is entirely exempt. Therefore if a doubt arises whether one caused the misappropriation of consecrated property, he is not liable at all, as stated in Hilchot Me'ilah.

12 When there was a piece of ordinary meat and a piece of sacrificial meat before a person and he partook of one without knowing which one it is, he is exempt. If, afterwards, he partook of the second, he must bring a guilt-offering for the misappropriation of consecrated property. If another person comes and partakes of the second piece, they are both exempt.

13 When there are a piece of forbidden fat and a piece of sacrificial meat before a person and he eats one of them without knowing which it is, he must bring a provisional guilt-offering, because of the possibility that he partook of the forbidden fat. If he ate the second one as well, he must bring a sin-offering for partaking of the forbidden fat and a definitive guilt-offering for misappropriating consecrated property. If another person came and partook of the second piece, that other person must also bring provisional guilt-offering.

When there are a piece of forbidden fat and a piece of sacrificial forbidden fat before a person and he eats one of them without knowing which it is, he must bring a sin-offering. If he ate the second after he became aware that he ate the first, he must bring two sin-offerings and a definitive guilt-offering to atone for misappropriating sacred property. If another person came and ate the second piece, each one should bring only a sin-offering.

In Hilchot Ma'achalot Assurot, we explained the rationale why the prohibition against benefiting from consecrated property falls on forbidden fat. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations concerning other prohibitions.

1 There are six individuals who are commanded to bring an adjustable guilt-offering. They are: one who becomes purified from tzara'at, a woman who gives birth, a person who takes an oath denying the knowledge of testimony whether intentionally or inadvertently, one who takes a false sh'vuat bitu'i inadvertently, an impure person who partook of consecrated food inadvertently and an impure person who entered the Temple inadvertently.

2 With regard to the sacrifice brought by a woman after childbirth: If she is wealthy, she brings a sheep in its first year of life as a burnt-offering and a young dove or a turtle dove for a sin-offering. If she does not have the means, her obligation for a sacrifice is reduced and she must bring merely two turtle doves or two young doves, one as a burnt-offering and one, as a sin-offering. Even if she has the means to bring a sheep, but does not have the means to bring its accompanying offerings, she should bring the offering of a poor woman.

3 When a person afflicted by tazara'at becomes purified, he must bring three animals as sacrifices: two sheep, one, as a burnt-offering and one, as a guilt-offering, and a ewe, as a sin-offering. If he does not have the means, he must bring two turtle doves or two young doves, one, as a burnt-offering and one, as a sin-offering, and a sheep, as a guilt-offering.

4 One who takes a false sh'vuah concerning testimony, inadvertently takes a false sh'vuat habitu'i, or inadvertently enters the Temple or partakes of consecrated food while in a state of ritual impurity must bring a ewe or a she-goat, like other fixed sin-offerings. If he does not have the means, he must bring two turtle doves or two young doves, one, as a burnt-offering and one, as a sin-offering. If he does not have the means to purchase the fowl, he should bring a tenth of an ephah of flour. This is referred to as "the meal-offering of a sinner." The manner in which it is offered has been described in Hilchot Ma'aseh HaKorbanot.

5 All of these sacrifices are explicitly mentioned in the Torah and it is explicitly mentioned that these individuals are obligated to bring them with the exception of an impure person who inadvertently entered the Temple or partook of consecrated food. For it is written in Leviticus 5:1-5: "When a soul will sin and hear a voice of adjuration... or a soul that will touch any impure thing.... or a soul that will take an oath, explicitly stating it with his lips,... and one will be guilty with regard to one of these." According to the Oral Tradition, it was taught that the obligation for an impure person to bring a sacrifice refers to a person who became impure and then entered the Temple or partook of consecrated food without knowing of the prohibition. Although this interpretation was conveyed by the Oral tradition, it is as if it was stated explicitly, for the Torah explicitly obligated an impure person who partook of consecrated food or who entered the Temple for karet. With regard to an impure person who partakes of consecrated food, Leviticus 7:20 states: "And a soul that will partake of meat from a peace-offering brought to God while he is impure will be cut off." And with regard to one who entered the Temple, Numbers 19:20 states: "And the soul shall be cut off from the congregation, because he made the Sanctuary of God impure." Since the Torah obligated one who entered the Temple or partook of consecrated food while impure for karet, it is understood that here it stated the sacrifice that must be brought because of the inadvertent violation of these prohibitions.

6 Whenever a woman is obligated to bring a sacrifice, her husband is obligated to bring it on her behalf. If he is poor, he brings the offering of a poor person. If he is wealthy, he brings the sacrifice of a wealthy person on her behalf. A person may bring an offering of a poor person on behalf of his son, his daughter, his servant and his maid-servant and have them partake of the offerings.

7 A king and an anointed priest must bring the same sacrifices for a false oath regarding testimony, a false sh'vuat bitu'i, and for entering the Temple or partaking of sacrificial food while ritually impure as others. For the Torah did not distinguish between the sacrifices brought by a king or an anointed priest and ordinary individuals except with regard to those commandments for which one is obligated to bring a fixed sin-offering for their inadvertent transgression, as we explained. With regard to an adjustable guilt-offering, by contrast, all are equal.

We already explained in Hilchot Sh'vuot, when one is liable for a sacrifice for a false oath concerning testimony and a false sh'vuat bitu'i and when one is exempt, in which instances he would be liable for many sacrifices according to the number of oaths he took and in which instances, he would be liable for only one sacrifice. In Hilchot Mechusrei Kaparah, I will explain in which instances a woman who gave birth and a person becoming purified from tzara'at will be liable for many sacrifices and in which instance, they will be liable for only one sacrifice.

8 With regard to all sins that one must bring a sacrifice whether he transgressed willfully or inadvertently, if a person violates them due to factors under duress, he is exempt from bringing a sacrifice. Needless to say, this applies with regard to other sins for which he is liable for a sin-offering only when he transgresses inadvertently. If he sins under duress, he is exempt.

9 When a person set aside money for a ewe for a sin-offering and then needed it for another purpose, he may bring a she-goat and transfer the holiness of the money to the she-goat and derive benefit from the money. Similarly, if he set aside money for a she-goat and purchased a ewe, he may derive benefit from the money.

10 When a person set aside money for an animal and then became poor, he should take two turtledoves or two young doves and transfer the holiness of the money to them. Then he may benefit from the remainder.

If one set aside money for young doves or turtledoves and became poor, he should take an tenth of an ephah and transfer the holiness of the money to it. Then he may benefit from the money. Conversely, if he was poor and set aside money for a tenth of an ephah and became wealthier, he should add to that amount and bring a fowl. If he set aside money for a fowl and became wealthy, he should add to it and bring a ewe or a she-goat.

Even if a person was fit to inherit money and the testator was on his deathbed, he is still considered as poor until the testator dies and he inherits his estate.

11 When a wealthy person set aside a ewe or a she-goat and it contracted a blemish and then he became poor, if he desires, he may bring a fowl with the proceeds of its sale. If, however, he set aside a fowl and it was disqualified, he may not bring a tenth of an ephah of meal with the proceeds of its sale. It may not be sold, since there is no concept of redeeming a fowl.

12 When a person set aside a tenth of an ephah and then became wealthy before the meal was consecrated by placing it in a sacred utensil, it is like all other meal offerings and may be redeemed and eaten. Once it has been consecrated in a sacred utensil, it cannot be redeemed. Instead, it should be left overnight and then taken to the place where sacrifices are burnt.

13 When a wealthy person set aside a pair of doves to be sold with the intent of using the proceeds of the sale as part of the funds for a ewe or a she-goat and then became poor, he may bring this pair of doves even though they were consecrated only for their worth and thus originally disqualified as sacrifices.

Why are these doves not disqualified forever? Because when they were disqualified originally, they were not disqualified in an ultimate sense. For this pair of doves is now fit for sacrifice.

When a poor person brings the sacrifice of a rich person, he fulfills his obligation. Conversely, when a rich person brings the sacrifice of a poor person, he does not fulfill his obligation.

Chapter 11

1 There is a difference with regard to the inadvertent violation of the prohibitions against entering into the Temple and partaking of consecrated food while ritually impure that does not apply with regard to other transgressions punishable by karet. With regard to all the other transgressions punishable by karet, if one transgressed inadvertently and ultimately, became aware that he transgressed, he is liable for a sin-offering, even though he did not have any knowledge of the transgression beforehand. With regard to the prohibitions against entering into the Temple and partaking of consecrated food while ritually impure, by contrast, one does not bring an adjustable guilt-offering unless he was aware of his ritual impurity and aware of the consecrated nature of the Temple or the food at the outset and aware of his ritual impurity and aware of the consecrated nature of the Temple or the food afterwards, and there was a lapse of awareness in the interim.

What is implied? He unknowingly contracted impurity and entered the Temple or partook of consecrated food and afterwards, he became aware that he had contracted impurity, that he was impure at the time he ate or entered, and that it was consecrated food that he ate or the Temple that he entered, he is exempt from the obligation to bring a sacrifice. He is not obligated unless he knew that he contracted impurity and that it was consecrated food or the Temple, before he entered or ate.

What is implied? He contracted impurity and became aware that he contracted impurity and knew that the building was the Temple or the food was consecrated. Afterwards, he had a lapse of awareness regarding the impurity, forgetting that he had contracted impurity, and entered the Temple or ate consecrated food, knowing that this was the Temple or that this was consecrated food. Alternatively, he had a lapse of awareness and forgot that this was the Temple or that this was consecrated meat, but he was aware that he was ritually impure, and he entered or partook of the meat. Or he acted inadvertently or forgot that he contracted impurity, forgot that this was consecrated meat, or that this was the Temple and entered and ate. Then afterwards, he became aware of the matters of which he had been unaware, he must bring an adjustable guilt-offering in all these six possible instances.

How do we know that this is the law regarding the inadvertent violation of the prohibitions concerning the Temple and consecrated food? Because with regard to other inadvertent transgressions, Leviticus 4:27-28 states: "Acting in violation of one of the commandments of God that forbids an act to be performed and he was guilty or if the sin that he committed becomes known to him," implying that he is liable if he ultimately knew of the transgression even if he was not aware of it originally. With regard to entering the Temple or partaking of consecrated food while ritually impure, ibid. 5:3 states: "And it became hidden from him, he became aware, and he became guilty." Since the verse states "And it became hidden from him," the implication is that he had knowledge of the matter beforehand. And since it is written: "he became aware, and he became guilty," he ultimately had knowledge. Thus we have learned that he must have awareness initially and ultimately and a lapse of awareness in the interim.

2 If a person contracts impurity and knows that he is impure and is aware of the Temple or that food is consecrated, but does not know the type of impurity that he contracted, then forgot that he became impure and entered the Temple or ate consecrated food, and after entering or eating became aware of the type of impurity that he had contracted, he is liable to bring a sacrifice. Although at the outset, he did not know the type of impurity he had contracted, since he knew that he was ritually impure, it is considered as if he was aware of his impurity at the outset.

If, however, he suffered a lapse of awareness concerning the laws of ritual impurity, e.g., he became impure because of contact with a lentil-sized portion of the carcass of a crawling animal, and he knew that the carcass of a crawling animal imparted ritual impurity, but did not know the measure that imparts impurity and then forgot entirely that he touched the carcass of a crawling animal and entered the Temple or ate consecrated food, and then became aware that he touched a lentil-sized portion of the carcass of a crawling animal, there is an unresolved doubt whether or not he is liable for a sacrifice.

A similar issue arises when a person who never saw the Temple and never was aware of its place, became impure and knew that he was impure, entered the Temple without knowing at the outset that this was its place, since he never saw it, and afterwards, remembered that he had contracted impurity and became aware that this was the Temple. There is an unresolved doubt if the knowledge that there is a Temple in the world is considered as awareness of the Temple or it is necessary for a person to know of the Temple's place.

It appears to me that those for whom a doubt exists regarding their obligation to bring a sacrifice should not bring a sacrifice, lest they be bringing a non-consecrated animal into the Temple Courtyard. If one would say: A sin-offering of fowl is brought even in a case of doubt although it is not eaten. There is a difference between the two. A sin-offering of fowl is brought, because the one bringing it is possibly lacking atonement and is forbidden to partake of sacrificial food until he brings a sacrifice as atonement. When, however, one is not lacking in atonement, he should not bring a sacrifice when there is a doubt involved.

3 When a person contracts ritual impurity in the Temple Courtyard, to be liable for the abovementioned offering, he must initially know that he contracted impurity and that he is in the Temple. Afterwards, if he loses awareness that he contracted impurity, but remembered that he was in the Temple or he lost awareness that he was in the Temple, but did not forget that he was ritually impure, or he lost awareness of both matters, when he regains awareness, he should bring an adjustable guilt-offering. The above applies provided he waits the minimum amount of time, as we explained in Hilchot Bi'at HaMikdash.

4 When a person intentionally made himself ritually impure, but did not remain in the Temple Courtyard for the minimum amount of time specified, there is an unresolved doubt with regard to his obligation. Does the concept of a minimum amount of time apply only to one who contracted impurity due to forces beyond his control or does it also apply to one who willfully contracted impurity? Therefore if such a person loses awareness of his ritual impurity, but nonetheless leaves the Temple Courtyard without tarrying, he should not bring a sacrifice.

Similarly, there is an unresolved question if an impure person suspended himself in the space above the Temple Courtyard. It is unresolved whether the space above the Temple Courtyard is considered as the Temple Courtyard or not.

5 When a person is in doubt whether or not he entered the Temple or partook of consecrated food while ritually impure, he does not bring a provisional guilt-offering. For a person does not bring such a sacrifice unless he is unsure of the violation of a prohibition punishable by karet for which one brings a fixed sin-offering to atone for his inadvertent transgression.

6 The following rules apply when there where two paths in front of a person, one pure and one impure. and he walked down the first and then walked down the second, and at the time he walked down the second, he forgot that he walked down the first. If he lost awareness of this ritual impurity and entered the Temple or partook of consecrated food, he is liable. Even though originally, he did not have a definitive knowledge of his ritual impurity, but merely a partial knowledge, because he did not know that he walked down both paths so that he would definitely be impure, he is, nevertheless, liable for a sin-offering. For partial knowledge is considered as complete knowledge.

If he only walked down the first path and entered the Temple or partook of consecrated food, he is exempt, because it is not certain that he contracted ritually impurity.

7 If, in the previous situation, he had the ashes of the Red Heifer sprinkled upon him on the third and seventh days and immersed himself after entering the Temple and then walked down the second path and entered the Temple, he is certainly liable, for he has certainly entered the Temple in a state of ritual impurity, either the first time or the second time.

Although on each occasion he was in a state of uncertainty, for the status of both paths is a matter of question, here, with regard to the impurity of the Temple and consecrated objects, uncertain knowledge is considered as definite knowledge.

8 If a person was ritually impure and two witnesses tell him: "You entered the Temple," and he tells them: "I did not enter," his word is accepted and he does not bring a sacrifice. For if he desired, he could have said: "I entered intentionally."

The following rules apply if two witnesses tell a person: "You were impure when you entered the Temple. You contracted ritual impurity in our presence and you knew you were impure." Even though there was an interim of many days between the contraction of impurity which they testified about and his entry into the Temple and thus he could have said: "I already immersed myself," since he denies the statement of the witnesses and says: "I never contracted impurity," the statement of the witnesses is accepted and he is required to bring a sacrifice because of them. The rationale is that if two witnesses can cause him to receive as severe a punishment as execution, certainly, they can obligate him for an easier punishment, bringing a sacrifice, for he denied their testimony.

9 When a person entered the Temple or partook of consecrated food in a state of ritual impurity had a knowledge of the situation at the outset, but ultimately did not have knowledge of the matter, the goat whose blood is sprinkled in the Holy of Holies and Yom Kippur bring about tentative atonement until he becomes aware and brings an adjustable guilt-offering.

When he does not have knowledge at the outset, the goat offered in the Temple Courtyard and Yom Kippur bring about atonement. If he did not have knowledge neither at the outset, nor ultimately, the goats offered on the festivals and on Rosh Chodesh, bring about atonement. If one purposefully entered the Temple or partook of consecrated food while ritually impure, the bull offered by the High Priest on Yom Kippur brings about atonement if the transgressor was a priest. If he was an Israelite, the blood of the goat which is sprinkled in the Holy of Holies and Yom Kippur bring about atonement, as Leviticus 16:16 states concerning that goat: "And he shall atone for the holy place, because of the impurity of the children of Israel."

Chapter 12

1 The following rule applies with regard to every transgression for which an individual is obligated to bring a fixed sin-offering. If the High Court inadvertently erred in their ruling and ruled that a forbidden substance is permitted and as a result of their ruling, the people erred inadvertently and acted in transgression of the prohibition, while relying on the ruling of the court, and afterwards, the court discovered that they had erred, the court is obligated to bring a sin-offering for their erroneous ruling. Even if the judges themselves did not perform a deed in violation of the prohibition, they must bring this sacrifice. For we do not consider the deeds of the judges at all, what they did or did not do, only their ruling. The remainder of the people are exempt from bringing a sacrifice as individuals, even though they performed the transgression, because they relied on the court.

Which sacrifice do they bring for this erroneous ruling? If their erroneous ruling concerned the worship of false deities, they must bring a bull as a burnt-offering and a goat as a sin-offering from every tribe. This is the sacrifice referred to in Parshat Shelach Lecha, which states Numbers 15:24: "If due to the seers of the congregation, a transgression was erroneously violated...." According to the Oral Tradition, it was taught that this is referring to an erroneous ruling concerning the worship of false deities.

If they ruled erroneously with regard to other transgressions punishable by karet for which a fixed sin-offering is brought for their inadvertent violation, every tribe must bring a bull as a sin-offering. This sacrifice is mentioned in Parshat Vayikra which states Leviticus 4:3: "If the entire congregation of Israel shall inadvertently err...."

Thus we have learned that if the High Court rules erroneously with regard to the worship of false deities, the entire congregation bring twelve bulls as burnt-offerings and twelve goats as sin-offerings. They are burnt, because their blood is taken into the inner chamber. They are called the goats offered because of the worship of false deities.

If they ruled erroneously with regard to other mitzvot, they bring twelve bulls as sin-offerings and they are burnt, because their blood is taken into the inner chamber. Each one of the bulls is called a bull brought due to a lapse of awareness by the congregation, as ibid.:14 states: "And the congregation shall offer...," i.e., every congregation. Every tribe is referred to as a congregation, as II Chronicles 20:5 states: "And Yehoshefat stood in the congregation of Judah."

A bull is brought for every tribe - and for the worship of false deities, a bull and a goat are brought for every tribe whether the entire Jewish people in Eretz Yisrael transgressed because of the ruling of the court, the majority of the Jewish people transgressed even though they comprised only a lesser portion of the tribes, or the majority of the tribes transgressed, even though they comprise a lesser portion of the entire Jewish people. Even those tribes who did not transgress bring because of the transgressors. Even if only one tribe transgressed, but it constituted the majority of the congregation, the entire congregation bring twelve bulls, and for the worship of false deities, twelve bulls and twelve goats.

2 When the court is in doubt whether or not they ruled erroneously concerning a matter, they are not required to bring a provisional guilt-offering, as implied by Leviticus 4:14: "And the sin becomes known," i.e. only when the matter becomes known to them are they liable for a sacrifice, as will be explained.

When does the concept that the court is liable for a sacrifice and those who act upon their ruling are exempt apply? When the following conditions are met:

a) when those who deliver the ruling are the High Court of 71 judges;

b) when the head of the academy, participates in the ruling with them;

c) when they are all fit to deliver rulings;

d) when all - or the majority - of them err in the ruling they delivered;

e) that they rule explicitly and tell the people: "You are permitted to do this"; similarly those who heard from the court must have told others: "You are permitted to do this"; and the majority of the people or all of them must act because of their ruling;

f) those who commit the transgression must act in error because of them, thinking that the court ruled according to law;
g) they must rule to negate part of a commandment, but to preserve part of it, but not to displace the entire commandment; h) when they become aware of their error, they must know the precise matter concerning which they ruled erroneously.
When all of these conditions are met, the court is liable to bring a sacrifice and those who act upon their rulings are exempt. If, however, one of these conditions is not met, the court is exempt from the sacrifice and anyone who unknowingly performed a transgression must bring a fixed sin-offering for his inadvertent transgression.

1 What is meant by the statement that if one of the conditions mentioned the court will be exempt and the transgressors liable?
If the court of one of the tribes ruled that the fat of the stomach is permitted and the people of that locale ate it as a result of these statements, that court is exempt and all of those who partook of it must bring a fixed sin-offering for his inadvertent transgression.
Similarly, if the High Court ruled that the blood that collects in the heart is permitted, but the head of the academy was not with them one of them was not fit to be appointed to the Sanhedrin, e.g., he was a convert, a bastard, an old man, childless, or the like, and the people acted on their ruling and partook of the blood that collects in the heart, the court is exempt and all of those who partook of it must bring a fixed sin-offering for his inadvertent transgression.

What is the source that teaches that the verse is referring only to the High Court? Leviticus 4:13 states: "If the entire congregation of Israel shall inadvertently err...." What is the source that teaches that all must be fit to deliver rules? Numbers 15:40: "If the seers of the congregation....," i.e., you must regard them as seers, and Numbers 35:24 states:"And the congregation shall judge." Just as the term "congregation" used in reference to capital cases must be comprised entirely of judges fit to render judgment, so too, the term "congregation," used in reference to this inadvertent violation must be comprised only of judges fit to render judgment.

Similarly, if the court issued a ruling and one of them knew that they erred and protested: "You are making an error," but those who sought to permit the matter outnumbered him and permitted it, the court is exempt and all of those who acted on their ruling must bring a fixed sin-offering for his inadvertent transgression, as Leviticus, op. cit. states: "If the entire congregation of Israel shall inadvertently err...," i.e., the entire Sanhedrin.

If one or a lesser part of the Sanhedrin knew that those who sought to permit the matter erred, but he or they remained silent, since the ruling was issued, and there was no dissenting view, and the ruling was disseminated among the entire people, the court is liable and all of those who acted on their ruling are exempt. If those who remained silent act upon the court's ruling, they are liable for a sin-offering, because they did not rely on the court.

Similarly, if the court debated the issue and stated "This matter is permitted," but did not issue a ruling and did not explicitly tell them:

"You are permitted to act in this manner," and a person heard their decision that the matter is permitted and went and acted according to what he heard, anyone who performs a transgression is liable for a fixed sin-offering, The court is exempt, for it did not issue a specific ruling to act.

Similarly, if they issued a ruling and the lesser portion of the congregation acted according to their ruling and the error became known, the court is exempt and the lesser portion of the people who acted upon their directive must bring a sin-offering.

2 When the members of the Sanhedrin themselves act according to their ruling they are not counted when determining if a majority followed their ruling. Instead, the majority must be comprised of others aside from the members of the Sanhedrin.

If the majority of the inhabitants of Eretz Yisrael acted according to the erroneous ruling even if the transgressors were only from one tribe, and, similarly, if the majority of the tribes acted according to the erroneous ruling even if they are the lesser portion of the congregation, the court is liable for this sacrifice and the transgressors are exempt.

What is implied? There were 600,001 inhabitants of Eretz Yisrael. Those who acted according to the ruling of the court were 300,001 and they were all members of the tribe of Judah alone - or they were members of seven tribes even if they numbered only 100,000 the court is liable for this sacrifice and the transgressors are exempt.

We are not concerned with the inhabitants of the Diaspora, for the term kahal ("congregation") applies only to the inhabitants of Eretz Yisrael. The tribes of Efraim and Menashe are not considered as two tribes in this context. Instead, they are counted as one tribe.

3 If at the time the transgression was committed, the transgressors constituted the majority of the people, but at the time they became aware that a transgression had been committed, they were the lesser portion of the people, or they were the lesser portion at the time of the transgression, but the majority at the time they became aware, the ruling whether or not the court is required to bring a sacrifice depends on the proportion at the time of the transgression.

4 The people at large are exempt in the following instance. The court issued a ruling that one of the types of forbidden fat was permitted and the lesser portion of the congregation partook of it because of their ruling. They became aware that they sinned and retracted the ruling. Afterwards, they ruled that a particular form of worship of false deities was permitted and a lesser portion of the congregation performed that form of worship because of their ruling. If a majority of the congregation would be reached when the number of those who partook of the forbidden fat were added to the number were added to those who worshiped the false deity, the two numbers are combined and the people exempted even though the court became aware of their first error in the interim.

When does the above apply? When it was one court that delivered the rulings. If, however, the members of the court that issued the ruling died and another court arose and issued the second ruling, the two groups of transgressors are not combined.

5 Even if two courts issued rulings concerning one matter, e.g., concerning two types of forbidden fat or two types of blood and similarly, if the transgressors did not inadvertently sin because of the ruling, the court is exempt and all of the transgressors are liable.

What is implied? The court ruled that it is permissible to partake of that fat of the stomach in its entirety. One of the members of the congregation knew that the court erred and that the fat of the stomach is prohibited. He, nevertheless, partook of the forbidden fat, because he thought that it was a mitzvah to listen to the court even though they erred. This person who partook of the fat is liable to bring a fixed sin-offering for partaking of it. He is not included among the number of those who transgressed inadvertently because of their ruling.

When does the above apply? When the person who knew the error was a sage or a student who had attained the knowledge that enables him to issue a ruling. If, however, he is a common person, he is exempt, because his knowledge regarding the Torah's prohibitions is not definitive. He is thus included among those who transgressed inadvertently because of their ruling.

Similarly, if one did not know that the court erred and intended to eat permitted fat, but instead ate the fat of the stomach which they erroneously permitted, but he did not know that it was the fat of the stomach, that individual is liable for an individual sin-offering. The rationale is that his eating came as a result of his own inadvertent error, not because of their ruling. He is not included in the number of those who transgressed inadvertently because of their ruling. These concepts are alluded to by Numbers 15:26;: "For the entire nation has erred unknowingly." Implied is that the entire nation committed the same error. Similarly, if the person acted on his own initiative and partook of the fat of the stomach that the court ruled was permitted, not because of their ruling, but because he considered it as permitted, he is obligated to bring a fixed sin-offering individually.

This is the general principle: Whenever one relies on the court, he is exempt, provided all of the conditions that were mentioned were fulfilled. Anyone who is individually liable is not included when calculating whether a majority transgressed inadvertently.

6 When the court intentionally ruled incorrectly and permitted something that is forbidden and the congregation erroneously acted on their ruling, the court is exempt from bringing a sacrifice, because they acted intentionally. Each of the people who acted upon their ruling is obligated to bring a sin-offering individually, because he transgressed inadvertently.

If the court delivered an erroneous ruling unknowingly and the congregation knew that they erred and that it is not correct to accept their ruling, and yet they acted in accordance with it, both the people and the court are exempt from bringing a sacrifice. The court is exempt, because the congregation did not act according to their erroneous ruling. And all the transgressors are exempt, because they are considered as having acted willfully, because they knew that the court erred and that it was not correct to act according to their ruling.

1 When the court inadvertently err and rule to eliminate one of the Torah's fundamental laws and the entire people acted according to their ruling, the court is exempt and each of the transgressors is obligated to bring a fixed sin-offering, as implied by Leviticus 4:13: "And a matter will lapse...," i.e., a matter, but not an entire fundamental law.

2 The court is never liable for a sacrifice unless they issue a ruling, nullifying a certain aspect of a prohibition, but maintaining others regarding matters that are not explicitly stated and elaborated upon in the Torah. Only in such a situation will the court be obligated to bring a sacrifice and those who follow their ruling exempt.

What is implied? They erred and ruled that it is permitted to bow down to a false deity, that it is permitted to transfer an article from one domain to another on the Sabbath, or that it is permitted to be intimate with a woman who is watching day to day because of zivah bleeding. This is considered as one who stated that there is no prohibition in the Torah against performing labor on the Sabbath, worshiping false deities, or being intimate with a niddah, eliminating the entire prohibition. This is not considered as an erroneous ruling, but rather as forgetting the matter. Therefore the court is exempt from bringing a sacrifice and anyone who acted upon their ruling is liable for a sin-offering individually.

If, however, they erred and issued a ruling, saying that one who transfers an article from one domain to another is liable, as implied by Exodus 16:29: "A man should not depart from his place," but it is permitted for one to throw or pass an article from one domain to another - alternatively, they eliminated one of the primary categories of forbidden labor, ruling that it is not considered as forbidden labor - they are liable.

Similarly, they are liable if they erred and issued a ruling, saying that someone who prostrates himself, spreading out his hands and feet is liable, as ibid. 34:14 states: "Do not prostrate yourself to a foreign god," but it is permitted for one to kneel on the ground without spreading out his hands and feet.

Similarly, they are liable if they erred and issued a ruling, saying that one who is intimate with a woman who is watching day to day because of zivah bleeding, as implied by Leviticus 15:26 "all the days of her flow," but if she discovered bleeding at night, it is permitted to be intimate with her - alternatively, they issued a ruling, saying that one whose wife began to experience menstrual bleeding in the midst of intimacy is permitted to withdraw from her while erect.

Similarly, they are liable if they erred and stated that one is liable for partaking of blood which emerges from an animal at the time of ritual slaughter, but one who partakes of blood that collects in the heart is not liable. Similar laws apply with regard to all analogous errors. If they issued such rulings and the majority of the congregation acted because of their ruling, the people are exempt and the court must bring a sacrifice because of their error.

3 If the court ruled that the Sabbath ended because the sun became covered with clouds and it appeared to have set, and then it shined forth again, this is not considered as a mistaken ruling, but as an error. Any individual who performed a forbidden labor as a result is obligated to bring a sin-offering, but the court is exempt.

Similarly, if the court granted a married woman license to remarry, because testimony was delivered in their presence that her husband had died and then her husband appeared this is not considered as a mistaken ruling, but as an error. The woman and her second husband are obligated to bring a sin-offering for their inadvertent transgression. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

4 When a court delivers an erroneous ruling and then forgot the nature of the prohibition concerning which they ruled, they are exempt and those who transgressed as a result of their ruling are liable. This applies even if they have definite knowledge that they erroneously caused the violation of a prohibition and even when the people inform them about their ruling, telling them: "You ruled concerning this-and-this." This is derived from Leviticus 4:14: "And the transgression which they caused to be violated became known to them," i.e., they became aware of it on their own, rather than being informed about it by the transgressors.

What is implied? The court erred and ruled that the fat on the stomach was permitted and the majority of the people partook of it. Afterwards, they became aware that they issued an erroneous ruling and permitted an entity for which one would be liable for karet had one partaken of it willfully or a fixed sin-offering if one partook of it inadvertently. They were in doubt, however, if they ruled that some forbidden fat was permitted or that some forbidden blood was permitted. In such a situation, the court is exempt and all those who partook of the forbidden fat must bring a fixed sin-offering.

5 The following rules apply when the court ruled erroneously and then became aware of their error. Whether they already brought a sacrifice as atonement or did not yet bring one, whenever one transgresses because of their erroneous ruling that was disseminated throughout the Jewish people after they became aware of their error, the transgressor must bring a provisional guilt-offering. The rationale is that since he should have continually inquired about the new developments in the court, but failed to do, he is considered like one who is in doubt whether he transgressed or not.

To whom does the above apply? To one who is in the same region as the court. If, however, one saw the initial, erroneous ruling and then journeyed to another region, he is exempt even if he transgressed after the court became aware of their error, because he relied upon them and cannot inquire about their rulings in his present place. Moreover, even if a person who is hurrying to depart, but has not yet set out on his journey, acts on their ruling after they became aware of their error, he is also exempt from bringing a provisional guilt-offering.

1 We have already explained that for every transgression for which an ordinary person must bring a ewe or a she-goat as a fixed sin-offering, a *nasi*who violates it inadvertently must bring a he-goat. And if an anointed priest violates it inadvertently, he must bring a bull.

When does the statement that an anointed priest brings a bull because of his inadvertent transgression apply? When he errs in issuing a ruling and acts according to his ruling alone. And to be liable he must be a sage of distinction, as implied by Leviticus 4:3: "If the anointed priest will sin, bringing guilt to the nation," i.e., an equivalence is established between the anointed priest and the people as a whole. Just as the community, i.e., the court, are not obligated to bring a sacrifice unless the judges are sages fit to deliver rulings, they deliver an erroneous ruling, the transgressors err because of this ruling, and they ruled to nullify certain aspects of a prohibition and maintain others, so too, an anointed priest is not liable unless all these stipulations are met.

2 What is implied? If the anointed priest ruled erroneously for himself and thought that it was permitted to throw an article from one domain to another on the Sabbath and acted in this manner, relying on his judgment, when he becomes aware of his transgression, he should bring a bull as a sin-offering. If, however, he did not rely on his ruling, but instead, acted inadvertently and threw an article, or he relied on his ruling, but was not a distinguished sage, or he nullified a prohibition in its entirety when ruling for himself, or he ruled erroneously to negate only a portion of the prohibition, but did not act while relying on his ruling, but instead, performed the transgression inadvertently for another reason, or he purposely delivered an erroneous ruling, but performed the transgression inadvertently, he is exempt from bringing a sacrifice entirely. For the laws that apply to an anointed priest's ruling for himself are identical to those applying to the congregation with regard to the ruling of the court in all regards.

If he delivered a ruling for himself and then forgot the rationale motivating the ruling and at the time he acted said: "I am acting on the basis of my previous ruling," he must bring a bull as a sin-offering.

3 If he delivered a ruling for himself to nullify certain aspects of the prohibition against the worship of false deities and maintain others and he acted according to his ruling, he brings a she-goat, as does an ordinary person, provided he erred in his ruling, as we explained. For the anointed priest is not obligated to bring a sacrifice unless he has a lapse of awareness while delivering a ruling and then acts inadvertently as is the law with regard to the community as a whole. If, however, he merely acted inadvertently without delivering a ruling, whether he violated the prohibition against the worship of false deities or other commandments, he does not bring a sacrifice at all.

4 When the anointed priest ruled together with the High Court and he and they both erred in their ruling, the anointed priest is exempt even though he acted according to the mistaken ruling that he issued. The rationale is that he did not rely only on his ruling alone, but his ruling together with that of the court. Hence it is not necessary for him to bring a sacrifice for atonement individually. Instead, if the court bring a sacrifice, he receives atonement together with the community at large. And if the transgressors bring a sacrifice, he does not bring a sacrifice, because he does not bring a sacrifice individually.

5 If he together with the court ruled erroneously, they ruled concerning forbidden blood and he ruled concerning forbidden fats, he does not receive atonement together with the community. Instead, he brings a bull on his own accord.

6 When an anointed priest is in doubt of whether or not he committed this type of advertent transgression - i.e., he ruled in error and acted accordingly - he does not bring a provisional guilt offering, for he is comparable to the community at large who do not bring a provisional guilt-offering. When, by contrast, a nasi is in doubt whether he transgressed or did not transgress, he should bring a provisional guilt-offering like other ordinary people, because his obligation for an inadvertent transgression is not dependent on his ruling.

What is the connotation of the term nasi used in the Torah? A king who is not under the jurisdiction of any other man in Israel. There is no one superior to him in his sovereignty except, God, his Lord. This applies whether he is of the Davidic dynasty or of other tribes. If there were several kings and one is not subject to the other, each one should bring a goat for his inadvertent transgression.

What is meant by the term "anointed priest"? This refers to a High Priest who was anointed with the oil of anointment, not one who was installed in his office through wearing the priestly garments.

7 When a High Priest who had been anointed with the anointing oil, but was removed from his office, because of a physical blemish, old age, or the like and inadvertently violated a transgression in this manner, he must bring a bull for his inadvertent transgression. For there is no difference between an anointed priest who serves and one who was removed from his office except the bull offered on Yom Kippur and the tenth of an ephah offered each day. These are brought only by a High Priest who is serving in his office, but with regard to the bull brought for the inadvertent violation of all the mitzvot, the two are governed by the same laws.

8 When a nasi performs a transgression together with the community, because of a ruling of the court, he receives atonement together with the people at large. If the court were offering a sacrifice due to their error, the entire nation and the king are exempt from a sacrifice, as we explained. If those who transgressed due to the court's ruling were obligated to bring a sacrifice and the king was one of them who transgressed, he should bring a goat. For the goat brought by the nasi takes the place of a ewe or a she-goat that an ordinary person brings.

9 When a nasi becomes afflicted by tzara'at and is removed from his office or he is removed from his office for other reasons, he is considered as an ordinary person. If a nasi transgressed while in office and then was removed, he must still bring a goat, as can be inferred from Leviticus 4:22: "because of his transgression that he violated," i.e., the sacrifice that he brings depends on his status at the time he transgresses.

10 When an anointed priest or a king violate a transgression requiring a sacrifice before they are appointed to their office, they must bring a sacrifice like an ordinary person even if they become aware of it after they become appointed. This is derived from Leviticus 4:22: "When a nasi transgresses," and ibid.:3: "If the anointed priest will transgress...," i.e., these sacrifices are required only when he transgresses while a nasi or while anointed.

Accordingly, if a priest ate a piece of fat concerning which there was a question whether it was forbidden and he became aware of this question after he was appointed as a High Priest, he must bring a provisional guilt-offering.

If one ate half an olive-sized portion of forbidden fat while he was an ordinary person and another half after becoming a nasi in one lapse of awareness or he ate half an olive-sized portion while he was a nasi and half after leaving his office, they are not combined and he is exempt.

If one ate half an olive-sized portion when he was an ordinary person, he was appointed as a nasi and then was removed from his office, there is an unresolved doubt if the two times he ate are combined to make him liable or his service as a nasi creates a distinction between the two.

Mishneh Torah, Offerings for Those with Incomplete Ato…

Trans. by Eliyahu Touger, Moznaim Publishing

1 There are four individuals who are referred to as "requiring atonement": a zavah, a woman after childbirth, a zav, and a person afflicted by tzara'at. Why are they referred to as "requiring atonement"? Because even after each one of them has become pure from the condition that caused his impurity, he has immersed in a mikveh, and the day of the immersion has passed, the person's status is still lacking. His attainment of purity is not complete to the extent that he may partake of sacrificial foods until he brings the sacrifice required of him. Before he brings this sacrifice, he is forbidden to partake of sacrificial food as explained in Hilchot Pesulei HaMukdashim.

2 When a convert becomes circumcised, but has not brought his sacrifice, although he is forbidden to partake of sacrificial food until he brings his sacrifice, he is not considered as one requiring in atonement. It is merely that failing to bring his sacrifice prevents him from being a complete convert and being from the full-fledged members of the Jewish people. Accordingly, he may not partake of sacrificial foods, because he has not become a full-fledged member of the Jewish people. Once he brings his sacrifice and becomes a full-fledged member of the Jewish people, he may partake of sacrificial foods in the evening.

If he brings one dove as a sacrifice in the morning, he may partake of sacrificial foods and bring the second dove at a later time. For the sacrifice of a convert is an animal brought as a burnt-offering or two young doves or two turtle doves both brought as burnt-offerings, as explained in Hilchot Ma'aseh HaKorbanot.

3 The sacrifice brought by either a zav or a zavah is two turtle doves or two young doves, one brought as a burnt-offering and one brought as a sin-offering. The sacrifice of a woman after childbirth is a sheep as a burnt-offering and a young dove or turtle dove as a sin-offering. If she lacks the means for that offering, she must bring two turtle doves or two young doves, one as a burnt-offering and one as a sin-offering. The sacrifice of a person afflicted by tzara'at is three sheep, one as a burnt-offering, one as a guilt offering, and a ewe as a sin-offering. If he does not have the means, he may bring two doves, one as a burnt-offering and one as a sin-offering, and a sheep as a guilt-offering.

4 Each of the three, a zav, a zavah, and a person afflicted by tzara'at, bring the sacrifices for their atonement on the eighth day after they become purified from their condition. For each one of them must count seven days of purity, immerse on the seventh day, wait until the conclusion of that day, and offer his sacrifices on the eighth day.

5 A woman does not bring her sacrifices on the fortieth day after the birth of a male or the eightieth day after the birth of a female. Instead, she waits until that day is completed and on the following day, the forty-first day after the birth of a male and the eighty-first day after the birth of a female.

This is the day concerning which Leviticus 12:6 states: "And upon completion of her days of purity for a son or for a daughter, she shall bring...." If she brings the sacrifices in the midst of these days, she does not fulfill her obligation. Even if she brings these sacrifices for a previous birth in the midst of the days of purity for her present offspring, she does not fulfill her obligation.

If these days passed and the individuals mentioned above did not bring the sacrifices for their atonement, they should offer them afterwards. As long as they have not brought the sin-offering for which they are liable, they are forbidden to partake of sacrificial foods. Failure to bring their burnt-offering and guilt-offering does not hold them back.

We already explained in Hilchot Ma'aseh HaKorbanot that a sacrifice may not be brought on behalf of anyone obligated to bring it without their consent with the exception of the sacrifices of those requiring atonement. In this instance, the consent of the principals is not required, as evident from the fact that a person may bring sacrifices on behalf of his sons and daughters who are below majority if they require atonement and allow them to partake of sacrifices.

6 What is meant by a zavah? A woman who experienced uterine bleeding for three consecutive days at a time other than the days when she usually menstruates. She is considered a greater zavah and is required to count seven spotless days and bring a sacrifice. We have already explained with regard to the laws of nidah, when a woman will be considered as a zavah because of uterine bleeding that she discovers and when she will not be a zavah, but rather a nidah or ritually pure, and when there will be a question whether she is a zavah. In all situations that we said that she was a zavah and should count seven "spotless" days, she is obligated to bring a sacrifice and her sin-offering should be eaten. Whenever we said that there is a question of whether she was a zavah, she should bring a sacrifice, but her sacrifice is not eaten. We have already explained that a sin-offering of fowl brought because of a questionable situation should be burnt.

We have already explained what type of birth or miscarriage will cause a woman to contract impurity because of birth and which will not cause her to contract impurity. Whenever we stated that she contracts impurity because of birth, she must bring a sacrifice and her sacrifice is eaten. Whenever we stated that she is not impure because of birth, she is exempt from bringing a sacrifice.

7 When a woman was uncertain whether or not she was pregnant and then miscarried and she did not know the nature of the fetus that she miscarried, whether she was required to bring a sacrifice for it or not, she is considered as a woman in childbirth of doubtful status. She must bring a sacrifice, but her sin-offering is not eaten. Similarly, if two women both miscarried, the fetus that one had carried was mature enough to warrant a sacrifice, but the other fetus was not, and the women did not know which of them had carried which fetus, they should each bring a sacrifice because of the doubt, but neither of their sin-offerings are eaten. For a sin-offering of fowl that is brought because of an unresolved question is burnt, lest the woman bringing it not be liable. In such a situation, this sin-offering would be a non-consecrated animal slaughtered in the Temple Courtyard, from which it is forbidden to benefit, as explained in Hilchot Shechitah.

8 Whether a woman who gives birth or miscarries gives birth or miscarries to one offspring or many offspring, she may bring one sacrifice that includes all of them. This applies provided the births or the miscarriages take place within the days associated with the prior birth or miscarriage. If, however, they take place afterwards, a separate sacrifice must be brought for the second birth or miscarriage.

What is implied? When a woman gives birth to a girl, any miscarriages that occur from the day of that child's birth until the conclusion of the eightieth day are grouped together with the first child. It is as if she gave birth to twins, one after the other, and she is only required to bring one sacrifice. If she miscarried on the eighty-first day or from that date onward, should it be mature enough to require a sacrifice, she must bring a sacrifice for it independently.

Should she have given birth to a girl and after sixty or seventy days, miscarry a female fetus, she is exempt from bringing a sacrifice for any fetus she miscarries within the eighty days associated with this second female. Similarly, if she miscarries a third female after sixty or seventy days since the miscarriage of the second female, she is exempt from bringing a sacrifice for any fetus she miscarries within the eighty days associated with this third female. The rationale is that it is taken into account with the third miscarriage and the third birth is taken account with the second birth, because it is within the days associated with it. The second birth is taken into account with the first birth. Thus the woman is required to bring only one sacrifice for everything.

9 When a woman gives birth to a tumtum or an androgynus, and then miscarries after forty days from the birth of the first child, she should bring a sacrifice for this miscarriage, for perhaps the first one was a male and thus the miscarriage took place after the days associated with its birth. Nevertheless, her sin-offering is not eaten, lest the first birth have been a female and thus the miscarriage took place in the days associated with its birth, in which instance, she is exempt from a second sacrifice.

10 When there are five births or miscarriages of questionable status for which a woman might be liable or five states of zivah of questionable status for which she might be liable, she may bring one set of sacrifices and partake of sacrificial food. The remainder are not considered as an obligation that she must requite. If she was obligated to bring sacrifices for five definite births or five definite zavah bleedings, she may bring one set of sacrifices and partake of sacrificial food. The remainder are considered as an obligation that she must requite. Similar concepts apply to a zav.

If a woman is liable for five definite births or miscarriages and five births or miscarriages of questionable status or five definite births or miscarriages and five zivah bleedings of questionable status, she must bring two sets of sacrifices. One is for the definite obligations. That sin-offering is eaten; the sacrifices for the other definite births remain an obligation for her. And she brings one set of sacrifices for the questionable situations. That sin-offering is not eaten; the sacrifices for the other questionable situations do not remain an obligation for her. She may then partake of sacrificial food.

11 When a woman converted and it was not known whether she gave birth before she converted or afterwards, because of the doubt, she must bring a sacrifice for the birth, but the sin-offering is not eaten.

In Hilchot Shegagot, we already explained that whenever there is an unresolved question whether or not a person requires atonement and Yom Kippur passes, they must bring the sacrifices after Yom Kippur, because it is these sacrifices which make them fit to partake of sacrificial food.

12 When a woman is obligated to bring a sacrifice for a birth or a zivah, she should bring money for the set of doves and place it in the appropriate chest. She may then partake of sacrificial food in the evening, relying on the assumption that the court of priests will not depart from the Temple until all of the money in the chest is used and sets of doves are offered for it, as we explained in Hilchot Shekalim and in Hilchot K'lei HaMikdash VeHaOvdim Bo.

13 When a woman brought her sin-offering and then died, her heirs should bring her burnt-offering even if she did not separate it during her lifetime. The rationale is that a lien for the sacrifice was already established on her property and this lien has the power of Scriptural Law.

Chapter 2

1 The term zav used by the Torah refers to a discharge of sperm that is released because of an internal sickness that effects the organs of the body in which it collects. When a zav emission is discharged, it is not released with an erection like semen and its release does not involve any desire or satisfaction. Instead, it is drawn out like a barley dough and is dark like the white of an unfertilized egg. In contrast, viable sperm is white and adhesive like the white of a fertilized egg.

2 If a person releases a discharge which would have caused him to be deemed a zav because of another sickness or because of factors beyond his control, he is not deemed a zav, as implied by Leviticus 15:2: "A man who will release discharges from his flesh." That phrase can be interpreted to mean: He will become impure "because of his flesh," and not due to any other factor.

On this basis, our Sages said: we check a zav with regard to seven factors: food, drink, burdens, jumping, infirmity, provocative sights, and thoughts.

What is implied? If a person overate or overdrank or he ate or drank foods or beverages that lead to the discharge of seed, he carried a heavy burden, he jumped from place to place, included in this category is also his being beaten on his back, he was sick, he saw a woman and desired intimacy with her, or he thought about sexual relations even if he did not think specifically about a particular woman whom he knew - if any of these factors preceded his discovery of a zav discharge, we account the discharge to it and it does not render him impure.

3 When a person has a seminal emission, he is not rendered impure as a zav for an entire 24-hour period, for the zav comes as a result of the seminal emission. Similarly, we attribute a discharge to provocative sights and lustful thoughts for 24 hours afterwards. By contrast, with regard to food, drink, jumping, and a burden, we attribute a discharge to them only for as long as this factor causes discomfort.

4 When a man, whether a gentile or a Jew, becomes circumcised and then sees a discharge, we attribute it to the circumcision as long as he is suffering. When a gentile has a seminal discharge and converts afterwards, he can become impure because of zivah immediately. We do not attribute any discharges in a 24-hour period to the seminal emission.

When a minor has a discharge, we do not attribute it to provocative sights and lustful thoughts, for there are no provocative sights and lustful thoughts that will cause a minor to have a discharge. Therefore we check him only with regard to five factors.

5 Just as we attribute the discharges of a minor to his sickness, so too, we attribute his discharges to the sickness of his mother if he is nursing or in need of her care.

When does the statement that we check a zav with regard to these matters apply? With regard to his second discharge of zivah, for that characterizes him as a zav, as will be explained. If, however, he has one discharge due to factors beyond his control and one "because of his flesh," he is impure with the impurity of zivah. Nevertheless, he should also be checked initially, in order to count three discharges so that he will be liable for a sacrifice.

He is not checked for the third discharge. Instead, even if he experiences it due to factors beyond his control, since he was already categorized as impure - because the first two discharges that caused him to be characterized as a zav were "because of his flesh" - he is therefore obligated to bring a sacrifice.

6 When a person experiences one zav discharge, his status is equivalent to that of one who had a seminal emission. If he experiences two discharges, this is a zav condition. He must count seven clean days and immerse in "living water." He is not, however, obligated to bring a sacrifice.
If he experiences three discharges, he is a zav in the full sense of the term and is obligated to bring a sacrifice. There is no difference between a zav who experienced two discharges and one who experienced three except the obligation to bring a sacrifice. All of these matters are part of the Oral Tradition conveyed from Moses from Sinai.

7 Whether a person experiences two discharges or three in one hour one after the other or experienced one discharge a day for three consecutive days, he is categorized as a zav. For the Torah made the categorization of a zavah dependent on days, as Leviticus 15:25 states: "If she will experience a flow of blood for many days," It did not make the categorization of a zav dependent on days.

8 If the zav experienced an interruption of an entire day between one discharge and another, they are not linked together.
What is implied? A man experienced a discharge on the Sabbath and a second discharge on Monday, they are not linked together and he is not categorized as a zav. Similarly, if he experienced a second discharge on Sunday ands experienced a third discharge on Tuesday, he is not obligated to bring a sacrifice, for it is not linked to the first two, for there was an interruption of a day between them. If, however, he experienced a discharge during the day and another, on the following night, they are linked together. Needless to say, if he experienced one discharge at night and the second, on the following day, that they are linked together. Similarly, if he experienced three discharges, one on each of three consecutive nights, they are linked together.

9 There is no minimum measure for the discharge of a zav. Instead, even a discharge of the slightest size renders him impure, as Leviticus 15:3 states: "or whether it seals his flesh." Implied is any discharge that is apparent on his flesh renders him as ritually impure.

10 The following rules apply when a zav discharge flowed without interruption for an extended time. If the time that elapsed from the beginning of the discharge until its end was as long as it takes to immerse oneself and dry or longer, it is considered as two discharges, because it takes as long a time as two would. If it did not take that long, even if it ceased in the middle, and he had a second discharge within that time period, it is considered as one discharge.

Similarly, if one discharge lasted the amount of time that three discharges would take - i.e., from its beginning to its end, there was enough time for a man to immerse himself and dry himself twice - it is considered as three discharges and he must bring a sacrifice.

11 If a person experienced a discharge during the day, it ceased for the amount of time it takes to immerse and dry oneself and afterwards, he experienced another two discharges or one discharge that lasts as long as two or if he experienced two discharges or one discharge that lasts as long as two, and then it ceased for the amount of time it takes to immerse and dry oneself and afterwards, he experienced another discharge, he is a zav in a full sense.

12 A discharge is considered as two discharges even though it did not last for the time two discharges last, if part of it was experienced at the end of the day and part at the beginning of the night. The rationale is that the change of dates divides the discharge as it were, and causes it to be considered as two.

Therefore if a man experiences a discharge bein hashamashamot concerning which there is an unresolved doubt whether it is considered as day or as night, there is an unresolved doubt whether he is impure.

13 If a man experiences one discharge during the day and another bein hashamashot, he has definitely contracted the impurity of a zav, but there is an unresolved doubt whether he must bring a sacrifice. He must bring a set of doves as sacrifices, but the sin-offering is not eaten.

14 If a person experienced a discharge during bein hashamashot on the night of the Sabbath and another discharge on the night following the Sabbath there is an unresolved doubt whether he contracted zav impurity and there is an unresolved doubt whether he is obligated for a sacrifice.

There is an unresolved doubt whether he has contracted zav impurity, for perhaps the first discharged took place on Friday and the second on Saturday night. Thus the Sabbath intervened between them and there is no concept of zav impurity at all. And there is an unresolved doubt whether he is obligated to bring a sacrifice, for perhaps one of them took place, partially during the day and partially during the night, in which instance, it is considered as two. Thus he would have experienced three discharges and would be liable for a sacrifice. Therefore he brings a sacrifice, but it is not eaten.

Chapter 3

1 During all the days when a zav experiences zav discharges, he is ritually impure. When the zav discharges cease, he counts seven clean days, like a zavah must, immerses himself on the seventh day, and waits until nightfall. On the eighth day, he brings his sacrifice if he had experienced three discharges.

If he experienced a zav discharge even at the end of the seventh day after he immersed himself, he negates his entire counting and must begin to count seven clean days from the day of his last discharge.

2 When a zav has a seminal emission during the seven clean days he counts, he only nullifies that day. From the following day onward, he completes the seven days and then brings his sacrifice.

What is implied? He had a seminal emission on the fifth day, He counts another three clean days afterwards, immerses himself on the third day and brings his sacrifice on the fourth day.

3 When a zav checks himself on the first day of his counting and finds himself pure and does not check himself for the remainder of the seven days until the seventh day when he checks himself and finds himself pure, he may rely on the presumption that he is pure. Even if he checked on the day when he had an impure discharge and saw that he was pure and that the discharge had ended and he did not check himself throughout the seven days, but did check himself on the seventh dayor the eighth day, should he find himself pure, the days of counting are significant and he may rely on the presumption that he is pure.

4 Any discharge that causes the counting of the days to be nullified does not bring about an obligation for a sacrifice.

What is implied? A man experienced two discharges and then had an interruption for a day or two and thus he began counting his seven clean days. Although he experienced a zav discharge in the midst of the seven days, it is not combined with the previous two. Instead, it nullifies the counting and he must begin to count over again, as we explained.

Moreover, even if he experienced three consecutive discharges in the midst of the counting - even if he experienced them on one day, and even if that was on the conclusion of the seventh day of the seven clean days - he should not bring a sacrifice. For these discharges are considered as nullifying the clean days that were being counted. If he experienced three discharges on the night of the eighth day, he must bring a sacrifice, because these discharges do not nullify the previous counting.

To whom does the above apply? To a zav who has experienced two discharges. A zav who experienced three discharges previously, by contrast, who experiences three discharges on the eighth night after the seven clean days does not bring a second sacrifice because of these three discharges, only one sacrifice for the first three discharges. Although these three discharges do not nullify the clean days that were counted, the man has not entered a time when it is fit for him to bring a sacrifice, since the preceding night is considered as "lacking in time," with regard to all Torah laws, with the exception of a woman after childbirth who miscarried on the night of the eighty-first day. She brings a second sacrifice, as we explained. This concept was communicated by the Oral Tradition.

5 If a man experienced one discharge on the eighth night and two discharges on the eighth day, they are linked together and he is required to bring a sacrifice because of the two latter discharges. The rationale is that a zav's first discharge is considered as a seminal emission. If he experiences two others afterwards, it is combined together with them to obligate him for a sacrifice. If, however, he experienced two discharges on the eighth night and one on the eighth day, they are not linked together and he is not required to bring a second sacrifice because of the latter zav discharges.

6 Every male can contract zav impurity, even an infant on the day of his birth, a convert, a servant, a deafmute, and an intellectually and/or emotionally unstable person. It appears to me that atonement is brought for them so that it is possible for them to partake of sacrificial food. Their sin-offering should be eaten, for they are like a child who is not intellectually capable.

A person who was castrated or one who is born sexually impotent may contract impurity because of a zav discharge like other men.

7 The stringencies that apply both to males and females are placed upon a tumtum and an androgynus They contract ritual impurity because of uterine bleeding like a woman or because of clear discharges like a man. Their impurity is of questionable status. Therefore if one such person had three zav discharges or discovered zavah bleeding for three consecutive days, he must bring a sacrifice, but it is not eaten. If he was counting seven clean days to purify himself from a zav discharge and he experienced uterine bleeding or he was counting to purify himself from uterine bleeding and experienced a zav discharge, the counting is not disrupted.

Chapter 4

1 When a person afflicted by tzara'at is healed of his affliction, and he has been purified with a cedar branch, a hyssop, a crimson thread, and two birds, all of his flesh is shaved and he is immersed in a mikveh. After this entire process, he may enter Jerusalem. He then counts seven days and on the seventh day, he shaves a second time like the first shaving. He then immerses himself. His status is then that of a t'vul yom. He waits until the evening. On the morrow, on the eighth day, he immerses a second time and then he brings his sacrifices.

Why must he immerse himself on the eighth day if he immersed himself previously? Because he had become habituated to contracting lesser types of impurity during the days that he was identified as one afflicted by tzara'at and he would not show care not to contract impurity and perhaps he contracted impurity after he immersed. Therefore, he would immerse himself on the eighth day in the Women's Courtyard, in the Chamber for those Afflicted by Tzara'at,even though he did not divert his attention after his immersion.

2 If he delayed and did not shave on the seventh day, but instead, shaved on the eighth day or after several days, on the day that he shaves, he should immerse and wait until the evening. On the following day, he brings his sacrifices after immersing himself a second time, as we explained.

What are the rites performed for him? The person who had been afflicted with tzara'at stands outside the Courtyard of the Israelites, in front of the eastern entrance, at the lintel of the Gate of Nicanor, facing west. There all those who require atonement stand at the time they are being purified and a sotah is forced to drink the bitter waters there.

The priest takes the sheep to be offered as the guilt-offering of the afflicted person while it is alive and performs tenufah with it together with the log of oil in the eastern portion of the Temple Courtyard where all tenufot are performed. If tenufah was performed with the sheep and the oil each separately, the person fulfills his obligation.

Afterwards, the guilt-offering of the afflicted person is brought to the entrance to the Temple Courtyard. The afflicted person inserts his two hands into the Courtyard and places them on his sheep. It is then slaughtered immediately. Two priests receive its blood. One receives it in a receptacle and casts it on the altar and one receives it in his right hand. He pours it into his left hand and sprinkles it with the index finger of his right hand. If he deviated and received it in his left hand first, it is disqualified.

The priest who received a portion of the blood in a receptacle should carry it and cast it on the altar first. Afterwards, the priest who received the blood in his palm should approach the afflicted person at the entrance. The priest stands inside and the afflicted person outside. The afflicted person inserts his head and the priests applies some of the blood in his hand on the middle lobe of his right ear. Afterwards, the afflicted person inserts his right hand and the priest applies the blood to his thumb. Afterwards, he inserts his right foot and the priest applies the blood to his large toe. If he applies it the left organs, the afflicted person does not fulfill his obligation. Afterwards, his sin-offerings and burnt-offering are sacrificed.

After he applied the blood to his thumb and toe, the priest takes the log of oil and pours it into the left palm of a colleague. If he pours it into his own palm, the person fulfills his obligation. He dips his right index finger in the oil in his palm and sprinkles seven times toward the Holy of Holies. Each time he sprinkles the oil, he dips his finger into it. If he sprinkled it, but did not direct it toward the Holy of Holies, it is acceptable.

Afterwards, he approaches the afflicted person and applies the oil to the place where he applied the blood on the middle lobe of his ear, his thumb, and his large toe. He then applies the remainder of the oil to the head of the person seeking purification. If he did not apply it, he does not achieve atonement. The remainder of the log is divided among the priests.

3 The remainder of the log of oil may be eaten only in the Temple

Courtyard by males of the priestly family like other sacrifices of the most holy order,for an association was established between it and the guilt-offering. It is forbidden to partake of the log of oil until after the seven sprinklings and the application of blood to the thumbs and toes were performed. If one partakes of it, he is liable for lashes, like one who partook of the meat of sacrifices of the most holy order before their blood was cast upon the altar.

Chapter 5

1 What is meant by the term "the tinuch of the ear"? The middle lobe.
If the priest applied the oil to the sides of the thumb and the large toe, it is acceptable. If he applied it to their lower surface, it is invalid. Whether the priest applies the oil to the blood of the guilt-offering directly above it or he applied it at the side of the blood, even if the blood was cleaned off before he placed the oil on the thumb and the toe, he fulfills his obligation, as implied by Leviticus 14:28 which states that the oil must be applied "on the place of the blood of the guilt-offering."
If an afflicted person does not have a right hand, a right foot, or a right ear, he can never regain ritual purity.

2 When a guilt offering of an afflicted person was slaughtered without the proper intent or its blood was not applied to the person's thumb and toe, it should be brought to the altar and it requires additional offerings like those offered for a guilt-offering of one afflicted with tzara'at. The afflicted person must bring another guilt-offering for his purificiation.

3 If the afflicted person's sin-offering was offered before his guilt-offering, we do not say that one should stir the blood of the sin-offering until the guilt-offering was offered. Instead, it should be left overnight and then taken to the place where sacrifices are burnt.

4 A person may bring his guilt-offering one day and his log of oil even after ten days. If he desires to alter the designation of the log and designate it for the guilt-offering of another afflicted person, he may although he has already had it consecrated in a sacred utensil. If the amount of oil decreased before it was poured into the priest's hand and was less than a log, the measure should be refilled. If it decreased after it was poured, another log should be brought instead.

5 The following laws apply if the oil was poured into the priest's hand, his colleague began to sprinkle it and then the log spilled. If it spilled before he completed the seven sprinklings, he should bring another log of oil and begin the seven sprinklings. If he completed the seven sprinklings and then the log of oil spilled, he should bring another log and begin applying the oil to the thumb and toe. If he already began applying the oil to the thumb and toe and the log spilled before he could complete it, he should bring another log and begin applying the oil to the thumb and toe. If he completed applying the oil to the thumb and toe and the log spilled before he placed the remainder of the oil on the head of the person being purified, he does not have to bring another log, for the application of the oil to his head is not an indispensable requirement, as implied by Leviticus 14:17, 18 which mentions "the remainder of the oil," and "the additional oil."

6 If the priest applied the oil before he applied the blood, he should fill the log container with additional oil and apply the oil after the blood. If the oil was applied to the thumb and toe before the seven sprinklings were made, the log container should be filled with additional oil which should be applied to the thumb and toe after the seven sprinklings. These laws are derived from Leviticus 14:2 which states: "This is the law applying to one afflicted with tzara'at." Implied is that the entire law should be carried out according to the prescribed sequence.

7 If the seven sprinklings were made without the proper intent, the offering does not find favor Above, but the afflicted person regains his status of purity.

8 When a person who had been afflicted with tzara'at becomes afflicted again after bringing his guilt-offering, he must bring another set of sacrifices for the second affliction. Similarly, if he brings his guilt-offering for the second affliction and becomes afflicted again, he must bring a sacrifice for every time he became afflicted. If, however, he became afflicted and was healed and brought the birds and then became afflicted again, when he was healed a second time and brings his birds, it is sufficient to bring one set of sacrifices for all the times he was afflicted.

9 The following laws apply when an afflicted person brings the sacrifices required of a poor person and then he becomes rich, or he brought the sacrifices required of a rich person and he became poor. Everything depends on his status at the time he brings his guilt-offering. If he was wealthy at the time the guilt-offering was slaughtered, he should complete the offering of a wealthy person. If he was poor at that time, he should complete the offering of a poor person.

10 There were two afflicted persons whose sacrifices became intermingled and the blood of one of the sin-offerings was sprinkled on the altar and then one of the afflicted persons died. What should the afflicted person who is alive do? He may not bring an animal as a sin-offering, for perhaps the sin-offering whose blood was cast on the altar was his and we follow the principle: an animal is not brought as a sin-offering when there is a doubt whether one is liable. He may not bring a sin-offering of fowl, because a rich man who brings a poor man's offering does not fulfill his obligation.

What then should he do? He should sign all his property over to another person. Thus he will be poor. Hence he may bring a sin-offering of fowl, because of the doubt. It is not eaten, as we explained. He may then partake of sacrificial foods.

11 When a rich man says: "I take responsibility for the sacrifices of this afflicted person," and the afflicted person was poor, he must bring the sacrifices of a wealthy man, for the person who took the vow has the financial capacity. If a poor person said: "I take responsibility for the sacrifices of this afflicted person," and the afflicted person was wealthy, he must bring the sacrifices of a wealthy man, for the person who took the vow obligated himself to bring the sacrifices of a wealthy man.

1 Anyone who transfers holiness from one animal to another is liable for lashes for every animal from which he transferred the holiness, as Leviticus 27:10 states: "Do not exchange it and do not transfer its holiness," even though he did not perform a deed. According to the Oral Tradition, it was taught that any negative commandment that does not involve a deed is not punishable by lashes with the exception of one who takes a false or unnecessary oath, one who transfers the holiness of a sacrificial animal, and one who curses a colleague mentioning God's name. These three negative commandments can never involve a deed at all, and yet one is liable for lashes for their violation.

Why is one liable for lashes for transferring the holiness of an animal, it is a negative commandment that can be corrected by a positive commandment, as ibid.:33 states: "If he will transfer its holiness, it and the animal to which its holiness will be transferred shall be consecrated"? Because it has one positive commandment and two negative commandments and because the negative commandment it involves is not of the same nature as the positive commandment.This is reflected in the ruling that if the Jewish community or partners try to transfer the holiness of a sacrificial animal, the transfer is not effective. Nevertheless, they are warned not to transfer the holiness. Thus when an individual transfers the holiness of a sacrificial animal, the animal to which he transferred the holiness is consecrated. Even if he transfers holiness on the Sabbath, he is liable for forty lashes. If, by contrast, a partner in a sacrificial animal endeavors to transfer its holiness or an endeavor is made to transfer the holiness of an animal designated for a communal sacrifice - since that person has a share in these sacrifices he is liable for lashes, but the animal to which he endeavored to transfer the holiness is not consecrated.

2 Whether one transfers the holiness of an animal as an intentional transgression or one does so inadvertently, the transfer of holiness is effective and the person is liable for lashes.

What is implied? One intended to say: "This animal should be considered as an exchange for an animal consecrated as a burnt-offering that I possess," and instead, he said: "This animal should be considered as an exchange for an animal consecrated as a peace-offering that I possess," the transfer of holiness is effective and he is liable for lashes. If, however, he thought that it was permitted to transfer holiness or he said: "I will enter that house and transfer the holiness of a sacrificial animal willfully," and instead, he entered and transferred the holiness of the animal unknowingly, the transfer of holiness is effective, but he is not liable for lashes for it.

3 A person cannot transfer the holiness of a sacrificial animal that does not belong to him. If the owner of a sacrificial animal says: "Whoever desires to transfer the holiness of my sacrificial animal may come and do so," another person may transfer the holiness of that animal.

If a person transferred the holiness of a sacrificial animal belonging to him to another animal that does not belong to him, the transfer is not effective. The rationale is that a person cannot consecrate an entity that does not belong to him.

4 It is the one who will receive atonement who has the potential to exchange the holiness of a sacrificial animal, not the person who consecrates it.
What is implied? A person consecrated an animal so that his colleague could gain atonement through its sacrifice, e.g., one consecrated the animals required for the sacrifices of a nazirite so that so-and-so, the nazirite, could gain atonement thereby. It is that nazirite who can transfer their holiness, but not the person who consecrated them, because they do not belong to him.

5 An heir can transfer the holiness of a sacrificial animal he inherits. If a person dies, leaving a sacrificial animal to his two sons, this animal should be offered, but its holiness cannot be transferred. The rationale is that the sons are partners and partners cannot transfer the holiness of a sacrificial animal, as we explained.

6 The holiness of sacrificial animals consecrated by gentiles may not be transferred according to Scriptural Law. According to Rabbinic Law, however, if a gentile transfers the holiness of a sacrificial animal, the transfer is effective. If a gentile consecrated a sacrificial animal with the intent that a Jew receive atonement through its being offered and then the gentile transferred its holiness to another animal, there is an unresolved question whether the transfer is effective.

7 When either a man or a woman seek to transfer the holiness of a sacrificial animal, the transfer is effective.

8 Even though he is not liable for lashes, there is an unresolved question whether a transfer of holiness made by a minor who has reached the age when his vows are binding is effective or not.

9 The priests cannot transfer the holiness of animals to be sacrificed as sin-offerings and guilt-offerings that were given to them to offer. Although portions of the animal belong to them, they do not acquire them during the lifetime of the animal, for they do not receive a portion of the meat until the blood is cast on the altar.

A priest cannot transfer the holiness of a firstborn animal; even though he does acquire it while it is alive, he does not acquire it at the outset. On the contrary, at the outset, it should be in the home of the Israelite. When, by contrast, an owner transfers the holiness of a firstborn animal, as long as it is in his household, the transfer is binding.Similarly, when a priest transfers the holiness of a firstborn animal born in his herd, not a firstborn animal given to him by an Israelite, the transfer is binding.

10 The holiness of the ram of the High Priest can be transferred to another animal. The holiness of his bull, by contrast, cannot be transferred to another animal. Even though it is brought from his own resources, since his priestly brethren derive atonement through its sacrifice, they are considered as partners in it.

11 The holiness of fowl and meal-offerings cannot be transferred, for the relevant verses mention only animals.

12 The holiness of animals consecrated for the upkeep of the Temple may not be transferred, for with regard to the tithe offering, Leviticus 27:33 states: "He shall not distinguish between good and bad and he should not transfer its holiness." Now the tithe offering was part of the general category of all the sacrifices, why was it singled out?To teach us a concept that applies to the entire general category. The tithe-offering is the sacrifice of an individual, thus excluding communal offerings and sacrificial animals owned by partners. The tithe-offering is a sacrifice offered on the altar, thus excluding animals consecrated for the sake of the upkeep of the Temple. There is an association between the tithe-offerings and the tithes of the crops in which are obligated Jews and not non-Jews; thus excluding sacrifices of the gentiles whose holiness cannot be exchanged as stated.

13 When a person consecrates an animal that has a permanent disqualifying blemish, its holiness cannot be transferred to another animal, because its body has not been consecrated in a complete way; only its worth was consecrated. If, however, one consecrates an animal with a temporary blemish or one consecrates an unblemished animal and then it contracted a permanent blemish, its holiness can be transferred.

14 Whether one transfers the holiness of a blemished animal to an unblemished one or that of an unblemished animal to a blemished one, one transferred the holiness of sheep to cattle, or the holiness of cattle to sheep, or that of goats to sheep or that of sheep to goats, or that of males to females or that of females to males, or transferred the holiness of 100 animals to one or that of one to 100, whether he did so all at once or one after another, the transfer is effective and he is liable for the same number of sets of lashes as animals to which he transferred holiness.

15 The holiness of an animal to which holiness has been transferred cannot be transferred to another animal, nor may the holiness of the offspring of a consecrated animal be transferred to another animal. This is derived from Leviticus 27:10: "And it and the animal to which its holiness was transferred shall be holy." Implied is "it" and not its offspring, "the animal to which its holiness was transferred" and not an animal to which there was an attempt to transfer the holiness of the animal to which its holiness was transferred. If, however, one transferred the holiness of an animal and then transferred its holiness a second time, even 1000 times, the holiness has been transferred to each of them, and one is liable for lashes for each transfer, as we explained.

16 The holiness of an entire animal may not be transferred to limbs or fetuses, nor may the holiness of the latter be transferred to an entire animal.

What is implied? If one says: "The hindfoot of this animal..." or "Its forefoot should be substituted for this burnt-offering," or he said: "The fetus of this animal should be substituted for this burnt-offering," the holiness is not transferred. Similarly, if one says: "This animal should be substituted for the forefoot..." or "the hindfoot of this burnt-offering," or he said: "This animal should be substituted for the fetus of this sin-offering," the holiness is not transferred.

17 When one seeks to transfer the holiness of a consecrated animal to a hybrid, an animal that is tereifah, one born of Caesarian section, a tumtum, or an adrogynus, the holiness is not transferred to them and it is as if one sought to transfer the holiness of a sacrificial animal to a camel or a donkey. The rationale is that this type of animal is not fit for sacrifice. Therefore one who tries to transfer the holiness of a sacrificial animal to it is not liable for lashes.

What is the difference between these and an animal that is blemished? There is the possibility of the type of animal that is blemished serving as a sacrifice, while these types of animals cannot serve as sacrifices.

18 An animal that was engaged in intercourse with humans - whether it acted as the male or female - is considered as a blemished animal and the holiness of a sacrificial animal can be transferred to it. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

19 When an animal was half consecrated and half unconsecrated, holiness cannot be transferred to it, nor may its holiness be transferred.

20 The holiness of all of the sin-offerings that are consigned to death may not be transferred to another animal. By contrast, the holiness of all of the sin-offerings that are designated to pasture until they contract a blemish and are sold may be transferred to another animal.

21 When a person sets aside a female animal for his Paschal sacrifice, burnt-offering, or guilt-offering, its holiness can be transferred even though it is not fit to be offered. The rationale is that since its worth is consecrated and it is unblemished, it is considered as if its body was consecrated.

If, by contrast, one separated a goat as a sin-offering, a king separated a she-goat as a sin-offering, and a High Priest separated a cow as a sin-offering, their holiness cannot be transferred. The rationale is that anyone who deviates from the commandments prescribed for a sin-offering does not cause the designated animal to be consecrated at all, not even its worth, as we explained in Hilchot Pesulei HaMukdashim.

Chapter 2

1 The act of transferring the holiness of a sacrificial animal involves the owner of the animal saying with regard to an ordinary animal that he possesses: "This should be substituted for this" or "This is a replacement for this." Needless to say, holiness is transferred if one says: "This should be substituted for this sin-offering" or "... substituted for this burnt-offering." Similarly, holiness is transferred if one says: "This should be substituted for the sin-offering I possess at home" or "...substituted for the burnt-offering I possess in such-and-such a place."

If, by contrast, one said with regard to an ordinary animal: "This should be substituted for a burnt-offering" or "This is substituted for a sin-offering," his words are of no consequence. If he states: "The holiness of this is conveyed to this," a transfer of holiness is not brought about.

2 The following rules apply when there were two animals before a person, one ordinary animal and one consecrated animal that became blemished. If he placed his hand on the ordinary animal and said: "This one is substituted for this," he has brought about a forbidden exchange of holiness and he is liable for lashes. If, by contrast, he placed his hand on the consecrated animal and said: "This is substituted for this," he has exchanged its holiness and transferred it to the ordinary animal. This is not a forbidden exchange of holiness, but instead, is comparable to redeeming the blemished sacrificial animal with this ordinary animal.

3 The following rule applies when there were three animals consecrated for the altar before a person and one of them was blemished and awaiting redemption and also three unblemished ordinary animals. If he says: "These are substituted for these," the holiness of two of the consecrated animals is transferred to two of the ordinary animals through the convention of temurah and he is liable for two sets of lashes. The third ordinary animal is substituted for the blemished animal through the convention of chillul. We assume that he sought to use that convention rather than the convention of temurah. The rationale is that since the person had a forbidden course of action, temurah and a permitted course of action, chillul, we operate under the assumption that a person will not abandon the permitted course of action and follow the forbidden one. Therefore he is not liable for three sets of lashes.

Similarly, if one says: "These ten ordinary animals are substituted for these ten consecrated animals," and one of the consecrated animals is blemished, the person is liable for only nine sets of lashes, for he intended to transfer the holiness of the tenth animal through the convention of chillul. Even though he had established a halachic presumption by being liable for many sets of lashes, since there is a permitted way for him to transfer the animal's holiness, we presume that he will not abandon the permitted course of action and follow the forbidden one.

When there are two consecrated animals and one of them is blemished and two ordinary animals and one of them is blemished, and one says: "These are substituted for these," the holiness of the unblemished animal is transferred to the unblemished animal through the convention of temurah and he is liable for one set of lashes and the holiness of the blemished animal is transferred to the blemished animal through the convention of chillul. The rationale is that we presume that he will not abandon the permitted course of action and follow the forbidden one.

4 When one says: "The holiness of an animal designated as a burnt-offering and one designated as a peace-offering is transferred to this animal," his statements are of consequence. The animal should be sold and half of the proceeds used to bring the exchange of a burnt-offering and half used to bring the exchange of a peace-offering.

If one said: "The holiness of an animal designated as a burnt-offering and the holiness of an animal dedicated as a peace-offering are transferred to this animal," we examine if that was his original intent. If it was, his words are of consequence. If his original intent was merely to transfer the holiness of a burnt-offering, and he afterwards, added "the holiness of a peace-offering" later, only his original statements are of consequence. Even though he retracted them immediately thereafter, only the holiness of a burnt-offering was transferred to the animal.

Chapter 3

1 What are the laws governing the offering of an animal to which holiness was transferred? A male animal to which the holiness of a burnt-offering was transferred should be sacrificed as a burnt-offering. If the animal to which the holiness of a burnt-offering was transferred was female or blemished, the female should be left to pasture until it contracts a disqualifying blemish. Then it should be sold and a burnt-offering brought with the proceeds of the sale.

An animal to which the holiness of a sin-offering was transferred should be consigned to death, as we explained in Hilchot Pesulei HaMukdashim.

An animal to which the holiness of a guilt-offering was transferred should be left to pasture until it contracts a disqualifying blemish. Then it should be sold and freewill offerings brought with the proceeds of the sale. An animal to which the holiness of a peace-offering was transferred is like a peace-offering in all respects: It requires semichah, accompanying offerings, and the waving of the breast and the thigh.

An animal to which the holiness of a thanksgiving-offering was transferred is like a thanksgiving-offering except that it does not require bread, as we explained in Hilchot Pesulei HaMukdashim.The following laws apply to an animal to which the holiness of a Paschal sacrifice was transferred. If the transfer was made before noon on the fourteenth of Nisan, the animal to which the holiness was transferred is not offered. Instead, it should be left to pasture until it contracts a disqualifying blemish. Then it should be sold and a peace-offering brought with the proceeds of the sale. If the transfer was made after noon, the animal to which the holiness was transferred should itself be sacrificed as a peace-offering.

An animal to which the holiness of a firstborn offering or a tithe offering was transferred should never be sacrificed. This is derived from Leviticus 27:26 which states with regard to a firstborn: "It is God's." According to the Oral Tradition, it was taught: "It" is sacrificed, but an animal to which its holiness is transferred is not sacrificed. The laws pertaining to the tithe offering are the same as those pertaining to the firstborn offering. An animal to which the holiness of these offerings was transferred should be left to pasture until it contracts a disqualifying blemish. Afterwards, it may be eaten.

2 An animal to which the holiness of a firstborn is transferred should be given to the priests and an animal to which the holiness of a tithe offering was transferred is given to its owners. Just as a firstborn animal or a tithe offering that contracts a disqualifying physical blemish is not redeemed, as explained in Hilchot Issurei Mizbeiach, so too, an animal to which their holiness is transferred is not redeemed.

3 When an animal was consecrated half as a burnt-offering and half as a peace-offering, an animal to which its holiness was transferred is given the same status. Similarly, when the holiness of any consecrated animal which should not be sacrificed because of a difficulty at the time of its consecration was transferred to another animal, that second animal should also not be sacrificed.

If one said: "The holiness of a sacrificial animal should be transferred to half this animal and the other half should be consecrated as a burnt-offering," it should be offered as a burnt-offering. If he consecrated it half as a burnt-offering and half, as a tithe offering, it should be sacrificed as a burnt-offering. If he transferred the holiness of a sacrificial animal to half of it and he consecrated half as a tithe offering, its status is in doubt and it should not be sacrificed.

4 The following rules apply when a person consecrates an animal with a temporary blemish or, needless to say, an unblemished animal and then it contracts a permanent blemish and it is redeemed. If one endeavored to transfer its holiness after it was redeemed, the transfer is binding, but the animal to which the transfer was made should neither be sacrificed, nor redeemed. Instead, it should be left until it dies. It should not be sacrificed, because it comes from holiness that was already deferred. Nor may it be redeemed, because its holiness does not have the strength to encompass the entity used to redeem it.

5 When any animal to which holiness was transferred was permanently blemished from the outset, they should be redeemed. Nevertheless, they do not become ordinary animals in a complete sense to the extent that it is permitted to shear them or perform work with them after they are redeemed. For holiness that is transferred can encompass an animal that possesses a permanent blemish, as evident from Leviticus 27:10 which speaks of transferring holiness "from the good to the bad." Here the intent of the term "bad" is an animal that is blemished or the like and thus is not fit to serve as a sacrifice. Nevertheless, concerning it, the verse continues: "It shall be consecrated."

6 The following laws apply when an animal consecrated as a burnt-offering became intermingled with sacrificial animals consecrated as peace-offerings and one transferred the holiness of one of the animals in the mixture to an ordinary animal.One should bring another animal and consecrate it, saying: "If this one had the holiness of a burnt-offering transferred to it, this animal is a peace-offering. And if this one had the holiness of a peace-offering transferred to it, this animal is a burnt-offering." Thus the animal which he brought together with the animal to which the holiness of the animal was transferred are like animals consecrated as burnt-offerings and as peace-offerings that became intermingled.

If the person transformed the holiness of one of these two to a third animal and it is not known which one's holiness he transferred, he should bring another animal fit for sacrifice from his home and consecrate it conditionally, saying with regard to the second animal to which holiness is being transferred: "If this is an animal to which the holiness of an animal was transferred, the animal that was brought remains an ordinary animal. If this animal is an animal to which the holiness of a burnt-offering or a peace-offering was transferred, the animal that was brought is a burnt-offering or a peace-offering." Thus the animal which he brought with the second animal to which holiness was transferred is like a sacrificial animal that became intermingled with an animal to which holiness was transferred. We have already explained the laws pertaining to the intermingling of animals to which holiness was transferred in Hilchot Pesulei HaMukdashim.

7 When an animal consecrated as a peace-offering became intermingled with a firstborn animal or a tithe offering and one transferred the holiness of one of the animals of the mixture to another animal, that animal should not be offered. Instead, it should be left to pasture until it contracts a disqualifying blemish and then be redeemed, and then it should be eaten in the same manner as a blemished firstborn or tithe offering, as explained.

Chapter 4

1 What are the laws pertaining to the offspring of consecrated animals? The offspring of an animal consecrated as a peace-offering and the offspring of an animal to which the holiness of a peace-offering was transferred are like peace-offerings and they should be treated like peace-offerings in all respects. Similarly, the offspring of an animal consecrated as a thanksgiving-offering and the offspring of an animal to which the holiness of a thanksgiving-offering was transferred should be sacrificed like a thanksgiving-offering, except that they do not require bread. For bread is brought only for a thanksgiving-offering itself. This is derived from Leviticus 7:12 which states: "He shall offer on the slaughtering of the thanksgiving-offering...." Implied is on its slaughtering, and not on the slaughtering of its offspring or on that of an animal to which its holiness was transferred, as we explained.

To what does the above apply? To the offspring themselves. But the offspring of the offspring should not be sacrificed. From his conduct, it is obvious that he is delaying their offering to raise herds from them. Hence, he is penalized and should not offer them.

2 The offspring of a sin-offering, and, needless to say, the offspring of an animal to which the holiness of a sin offering was transferred, should be consigned to death.

3 If a person slaughters an animal offered as a sin-offering and discovers that it was carrying a four-month old fetus that was alive, it may be eaten like the meat of the sin-offering. For the offspring of consecrated animals while they are in their mother's womb are like the consecrated animals themselves.

4 The offspring of an animal to which the holiness of a guilt-offering was transferred, the offspring of its offspring, and so too until the end of time should be allowed to pasture until they contract a disqualifying blemish. Then they should be sold and the proceeds used to purchase freewill offerings. If the animal to which the holiness of the guilt-offering was transferred gave birth to a male after the guilt-offering is sacrificed, the offspring itself should be sacrificed as a burnt-offering.If one set aside a female animal as a guilt-offering and it gave birth, it and its offspring should be allowed to pasture until they become blemished. Then they should be sold and the person's guilt-offering purchased with the proceeds of the sale. If he already sacrificed his guilt-offering, the proceeds of their sale should be used to purchase freewill offerings.

5 The male offspring of an animal to which the holiness of a burnt-offering was transferred, the offspring of its offspring, and so too until the end of time are considered as burnt-offerings and should themselves be offered as burnt-offerings.

If one set aside a female as a burnt-offering and it gave birth, even though it gave birth to a male, the offspring should be allowed to pasture until it contracts a disqualifying blemish and then the proceeds of the sale should be used to bring a burnt-offering.

We already explained in Hilchot Ma'aseh HaKorbanot that whenever we use the expression "the proceeds of the sale should be used to purchase freewill offerings" the intent is that the money should be placed in the chests that existed in the Temple whose number we explained in Hilchot Shekalim. The court sacrifices freewill burnt-offerings with that money. The accompanying offeringsare brought from communal funds and they do not require semichah. Whenever, by contrast, we use the expression "it itself should be offered as a burnt-offering" or "he should bring a burnt-offering with the proceeds," the sacrifice requires semichah and the owner must bring the accompanying offerings.

6 The offspring born to an animal selected as a tithe offering, the offspring of an animal to which the holiness of a tithe offering was transferred, and the offspring of an animal to which the holiness of a firstborn animal was transferred, and the offspring of their offspring until the end of time should not be offered. Instead, they should be allowed to pasture until they contract a disqualifying blemish and then they should be eaten according to the laws applying to a blemished firstborn animal and tithe offering.

The offspring of an animal to which the holiness of a firstborn animal was transferred belongs to the priest. The offspring of an animal selected as a tithe offering and the offspring of an animal to which the holiness of a animal designated as a tithe offering was transferred belong to the owner.

7 The laws that apply to the offspring of an animal to which the holiness of a Paschal sacrifice was transferred are the same as those applying to an animal to which the holiness of a Paschal sacrifice was transferred itself. If its mother should be sacrificed as a peace-offering, its offspring should be offered as a peace-offering. If the law was that the mother should be allowed to pasture until it contracts a blemish and then be sold and the proceeds used to purchase a peace-offering, this same law applies to its offspring.

If one designated a female for one's Paschal sacrifice and it gave birth or he designated it for that sacrifice while pregnant, it and its offspring should be allowed to pasture until they contract a disqualifying blemish and a Paschal sacrifice should be brought with the proceeds of their sale. If this female remained unblemished until after Pesach or it gave birth after Pesach, it and its offspring should be allowed to pasture until they contract a disqualifying blemish and a peace-offering should be brought with the proceeds of their sale.

8 When the offspring of sacrificial animals were born through Caesarian section, as a tumtum, an androgynus, a hybrid, or a tereifah, they should be redeemed and a sacrificial animal that is fit to be brought with the money from the sale of these offspring should be brought.

9 The offspring of a blemished consecrated animal is like the offspring of an unblemished consecrated animal in all respects and it should be offered in the appropriate manner.

10 When a consecrated animal discharges a stillborn animal or a placenta, it should be buried and it is forbidden to benefit from it.

11 A person who changes the purpose for which an article was consecrated from one holy purpose to another violates a prohibition. This is derived from Leviticus 27:26 which states with regard to a firstborn animal: "A person may not consecrate it," i.e., he may not designate it as a burnt-offering or a peace-offering. The same applies to other consecrated animals. They may not be changed to a purpose other than that for which they were originally consecrated. This applies both to animals consecrated for the altar and animals consecrated for the improvement of the Temple. What is implied? If an article was consecrated for the improvement of the Temple Sanctuary, it should not be changed and the money used for the improvement of the altar. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations. One is not liable for lashes for the violation of this prohibition.

12 What clever technique can be used with regard to a firstborn to consecrate it to the altar for another sacrifice? One may consecrate it in its mother's womb, before it is born. This is derived from Leviticus 27:26: "which will become a firstborn for God among the livestock - a man shall not consecrate it." Implied is that when it is born, one may not consecrate it, but one may consecrate it in its mother's womb.

Therefore one may say: "If the fetus in the womb of this cow that has not given birth previously is male, it is consecrated as a burnt-offering." He may not, however, designate it as a peace-offering, for he cannot remove it from the holiness of the firstborn in order to benefit from it. If one said: "It should be a burnt-offering when the majority of its head emerges," it is a firstborn and not a burnt-offering.

13 One may not use a clever technique to change the fetus of a consecrated animal to another purpose. Instead, it is consecrated with the holiness of its mother. The rationale is that the offspring of a consecrated animal become consecrated in the womb, as we explained. Thus every fetus is consecrated with the holiness of its mother and its holiness cannot be changed in the womb as one may with regard to a firstborn animal. The rationale is that a firstborn animal becomes consecrated only when it emerges from the womb.

Although all of the statutes of the Torah are decrees, as we explained in the conclusion of Hilchot Me'ilah, it is fit to meditate upon them and wherever it is possible to provide a reason, one should provide a reason. The Sages of the early generations said that King Solomon understood most of the rationales for all the statutes of the Torah.

It appears to me that the verse Leviticus 27:10: "It and the animal to which its holiness will be transferred shall be consecrated" shares a similar motivating rationale as the verse ibid.:15: "If the one who consecrates it shall redeem his house, he shall add a fifth of the money of the redemption valuation to it." The principle behind these laws is that the Torah descended to the bottom of a person's thoughts and the scope of his evil inclination. For human nature tends to increase his property and attach importance to his money. Even though he made a vow or consecrated something, it is possible that he will reconsider, change his mind, and redeem it for less than its worth. Hence the Torah states: "If he redeems it for himself, he must add a fifth." Similarly, if he consecrated an animal in a manner that its physical person becomes consecrated, he might reconsider. In this instance, since he cannot redeem it, he will exchange it for a lesser one. If he was given permission to exchange an inferior animal for a superior one, he will exchange a superior one for an inferior one and claim that it was superior. Therefore, the Torah removed that option, forbidding all exchanges and penalized him that if he made an exchange, "It and the animal to which its holiness will be transferred shall be consecrated."

All of these ordinances are to subjugate one's evil inclination and improve one's character. Similarly, most of the Torah's laws are nothing other than "counsels given from distance" from "He Who is of great counsel" to improve one's character and make one's conduct upright. And so it is written Proverbs 22:20-21: "Behold, I have written for you in the Torah prominent matters, to inform you of the veracity of the words of truth, so that you will respond truthfully to those who send to you."

Mishneh Torah, Defilement by a Corpse

Trans. by Eliyahu Touger, Moznaim Publishing

1 A human corpse imparts ritual impurity that persists for a minimum of seven days when it is touched or carried or when one is under the same structure (ohel). The impurity imparted by touching a corpse or being under the same structure is explicitly mentioned in the Torah, as Numbers 19:11 states: "One who touches a corpse of any human being will be impure for seven days" and ibid.:14 states: "Anyone who enters the tent and anything in the tent will be impure for seven days.

2 The impurity stemming from carrying a human corpse is derived from the Oral Tradition. It is based on an inference from a lesser matter to a more severe one. If the carcass of animal makes a person impure only until the evening, but does not cause a person to incur ritual impurity when under the same shelter, and yet causes him to incur impurity when carrying it, as Leviticus 11:40 states: "One who carries their carcasses," how much more so should this apply with regard to a human corpse. And the process of reasoning continues: if touching an animal carcass causes one to become impure until the evening and carrying it causes a person to be impure until the evening, so too, since touching a corpse causes a person to be impure for seven days, it should cause him to be impure for seven days if he carries it. The impurity resulting from carrying a corpse is not considered of Rabbinic origin, but is instead, a Scriptural Law. It appears to me that Scripture remained silent concerning this type of impurity in the same way that it remained silent concerning the prohibition against relations with one's daughter, because it explicitly forbade relations with the daughter of one's daughter. And it remained silent concerning the prohibition against partaking of meat cooked with milk, because it explicitly forbade cooking it. Similarly, Scripture did not mention the impurity incurred by carrying a human corpse because it explicitly mentioned that one who was under the same shelter as a corpse incurs impurity. Thus one can infer that this certainly applies to one who carries it.

3 The impurity incurred by touching mentioned in all situations, whether involving a human corpse or another source of impurity, is brought about by a person touching the source of impurity itself. Whether he touches it with his flesh, his hand, his foot, or any other portion of his body, even with his tongue, he becomes impure. Similarly, it appears to me that if a person touches a source of impurity with his nails or with his teeth, he becomes impure. The rationale is since they are connected to the body, they are considered as the body itself. If, however, a person took a source of impurity, skewered it with a weaving needle, and inserted it into the throat of a person who is ritually pure without it touching his tongue or inserted it within the womb of a woman from below without touching her flesh, the person who swallowed the source of impurity does not become impure because his inner organs came in contact with the source of impurity. The rationale is that contact between a source of impurity and one's inner organs is not considered as touch.

4 A scab over a bruise is considered as skin with regard to touching sources of impurity. The underdeveloped body hair of a child, by contrast, is not considered as skin.

What is implied? If a source of impurity touches a person on the scab over a bruise, he is impure; it is as if it touched his flesh. Conversely, if it touched the thin hair on the body of a child, he does not become impure.

Similarly, if an impure person has a bruise and a pure person touched the scab on the bruise, he becomes ritually impure. If a minor was impure and a pure person touched the underdeveloped hair on his body, he does not become impure. This applies both with regard to impurity stemming from a human corpse or other types of impurity.

Similarly, blotches of filth, mud, or similar things that are not considered as intervening substances or dried pieces of filth and things that are considered as intervening substances are not considered as flesh, neither to impart ritual impurity to others, nor to contract ritual impurity.

5 Just as a person becomes impure when he comes into contact with a source of impurity, so too, keilim become impure when a source of impurity touches them with the exception of an earthenware utensil that incurs ritual impurity only when a source of impurity enters its inner space, as will be explained in Hilchot Keilim.

This is an inclusive general principle that applies with regard to ritual impurity: Whatever causes a person to contract ritual impurity when touching him, causes keilim to contract ritual impurity. Whatever does not cause a person to contract ritual impurity when touching him, does not cause keilim to contract ritual impurity. A person and keilim contract ritual impurity only from a primary source of ritual impurity.

6 The impurity incurred by carrying mentioned in all situations - whether involving a human corpse or another object that conveys impurity by carrying - is brought about by a person carrying a source of impurity even though he did not touch it. Even if there is a stone between the person and the source of impurity, since he carried it, he becomes impure.
The above applies whether he carries it on his head, his hand, or another portion of his body. And it applies whether the person lifted up the source of impurity himself or another person lifted it up and put it on him; since he carried it on his person in any way, he becomes impure. Even if the source of impurity was hanging on a string or a hair and he hung the string from his hand and lifted the source of impurity to the slightest degree, he is considered to have carried it and he becomes impure.

7 Moving an article is considered as carrying it. Any article that imparts impurity when it is carried imparts impurity when moved.
What is implied? There was a beam resting on a wall and on its side was a human corpse, an animal carcass, or the like. A pure person came to the other end of the beam and moved it. Since he moved the impurity at the other end of the beam, he becomes impure for carrying the source of impurity. Needless to say, this applies if he pulled the other end of the beam toward the earth until the source of impurity was lifted up or he dragged it on the ground, for this is certainly considered as carrying. The above situation and anything similar refers to the activity of moving that imparts ritual impurity, as mentioned in all instances.

8 When a person carries a source of impurity in a hidden part of his body, he becomes impure. Even though touching such portions of the body is not considered as touch, carrying an article there is considered as carrying unless the source of impurity is swallowed up in the person's digestive system. Once a source of impurity reaches a person's stomach, it is not considered as if he touched or carried it. If such a person immerses in a mikveh he regains purity, even though the source of impurity is in his digestive system.

9 Only a human being becomes impure for carrying a source of impurity, not keilim.

What is implied? Ten containers were placed on a person's hand, one on top of the other, and the carcass of an animal or another source of impurity was placed in the uppermost container. The person is considered impure, because he carried the carcass of an animal. The containers on his hand, by contrast, are all pure except for the uppermost one which was touched by the source of impurity. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

10 The ritual impurity of ohel does not apply with regard to other sources of impurity, only with regard to a human corpse. Whether a person and/or a k'li, even a needle, was extended over a corpse, a corpse was extended over a person and/or a k'li, or a corpse and a person and/or a k'li were under one shelter, they are impure.

11 The impurity of ohel mentioned in all places refers to impurity imparted by a source of impurity to a person or keilim in one of these three ways.

Whether a person enters entirely to the shelter where a corpse is located or part of his body enters, he becomes impure because of the ohel. Even if he inserted merely his hand, his fingertips, or his nose into the shelter where a corpse is located, his entire person becomes impure. If he joined his hand to the lintel of the doorway of such a shelter, he becomes impure as if part of his body entered. If he touched the doorframe from a handbreadth and below above the ground, he is pure. From a handbreadth and above, he is impure. It appears to me that this impurity is of Rabbinic origin.

12 Corpses of both Jews and gentiles impart impurity through touch or through carrying.

13 The corpse of a gentile does not impart ritual impurity through ohel. This matter was conveyed by the Oral Tradition. With regard to the war with Midian, Numbers 31:19 states: "All who touch a corpse...", but does not mention an ohel.

Similarly, a gentile does not contract the impurity connected with a corpse. Instead, if a gentile touches a corpse, carries it, or stands over it, it is as if he did not touch it. To what can the matter be compared? To an animal that touched a corpse or stood over a corpse.

Not only the impurity imparted by a human corpse, but all types of impurity do not cause gentiles and animals to become impure.

14 According to Rabbinic Law, gentiles are considered as zavim, According to Scriptural Law, there is no type of living being that contracts ritual impurity while alive or imparts ritual impurity while alive, except a human, and even then, only when he is Jewish.

Both a Jewish adult and a minor can contract all forms of ritual impurity, even the impurity stemming from a corpse, concerning which Numbers 19:20 states: "A man who shall become impure." Nevertheless, both an adult and a minor can contract this impurity, for ibid.:18 states: "for all the souls that were there." Even a newborn infant that touched, carried, or extended a limb over a corpse becomes impure and he is considered impure because of contact with a human corpse.

The above applies provided the baby was born after a nine month pregnancy. If he is born after an eight month pregnancy, he is considered as a stone and he does not contract ritual impurity.

15 A corpse does not impart ritual impurity until the person actually dies. Even if one's veins have been cut, or he is in his death-throes, even if his two vital signs have been slit, he does not impart ritual impurity until his soul expires, as ibid.:13 states: "The soul of a man who dies...."

If his backbone is broken together with most of the surrounding flesh, he was torn apart like a fish from his back, he was decapitated, or he was cut in half from his stomach, he imparts impurity, even though some of his limbs are still making convulsive movements.

Chapter 2

1 A stillborn fetus, even though it is underdeveloped and its limbs have not been firmly connected with their sinews, imparts ritual impurity when it is touched, carried, or when one is under the same structure as it, like the corpse of an adult that has died, as implied by Numbers 19:11: "One who touches a corpse of the soul of any man."

Similarly, an olive-sized measure from the flesh of a corpse imparts impurity like an entire corpse, whether it still retains its moisture or it has become dry like a shard. Netzal is like flesh and imparts impurity when an olive-sized portion is present.

What is meant by the term netzal? Flesh that has decomposed and turned into a putrid liquid mass, provided that the liquid mass that resulted from the corpse coagulates. For if it coagulates, it is apparent that it comes from the flesh of the corpse. If it does not coagulate, it does not impart impurity, for perhaps it is from the deceased's phlegm or other body fluids.

2 Even though these measures were all conveyed as halachot to Moses at Sinai, our Sages said: At the onset of his conception, man's body is the size of an olive. Therefore the measure for which his flesh imparts ritual impurity is the size of an olive.

3 A limb that was cut off from a living person is considered as an entire corpse and imparts impurity when it is touched, carried, or one is under the same structure. This applies even to a limb of a newborn infant, for there is no minimum measure that applies with regard to complete limbs. This is derived from Numbers 19:16 which states: "Anyone who touches a corpse slain by the sword... on the open field." It is a known matter that the laws applying to one slain by the sword are the same as one slain by a stone or through other means. According to the Oral Tradition, we learned that the verse comes only to deem a limb severed by a sword as impure.

When does the above apply? When the limb was intact as it was when it came into being with flesh, sinews, and bones, as the abovementioned verse states: "Or the bone of a man." Implied is that the bone must be like a man, i.e., a human corpse. Just as a human corpse has flesh, sinews, and bones, so too, a limb from a living person must be intact as it was when it came into being and have flesh, sinews, and bones. In contrast, a kidney and a tongue, and the like, even though they are considered as complete organs, since they do not contain bones, they are considered as the remainder of a person's flesh.

If even the slightest amount of bone was missing from a limb severed from a living person, the entire limb is pure. The following rules apply if some of its flesh was missing: If there remained enough flesh on it that, were the person to be alive, his flesh would regenerate, be healed, and return to a state of wholeness, the limb imparts impurity when it is touched, carried, or when one is under the same structure. If not, it imparts impurity when it is touched, carried, but not when one is under the same structure.

Flesh that is separated from a living person is ritually pure. Similarly, a bone without flesh that is separated from a living person is ritually pure.

4 When a limb is separated from a corpse, it imparts impurity as a corpse does when it is touched, carried, or when one is under the same structure, provided it is intact as it was when it came into being with flesh, sinews, and bones.

If a portion of the bone was lacking, when there is at least an olive-sized portion of flesh on it, it imparts impurity like an entire corpse. The following rules apply if some of the flesh was lacking, but none of the bone. If there remained enough flesh on it that, were the person to be alive, his flesh would regenerate, it imparts impurity like an entire corpse. If not, it is like other bones of a corpse on which there is no flesh.

5 The marrow of a bone causes flesh to regenerate on the bone's surface. Therefore if the hipbone of a corpse, a bone that is closed on both of its sides, has sufficient marrow to cause the flesh to regenerate, it is considered as an entire corpse.

The following laws apply if a bone has marrow that has dried out and rattles within. If there is an olive-sized portion of marrow, the bone imparts impurity when one is under the same shelter. Even though the bone is closed on all sides, the impurity breaks through and ascends and breaks through and descends, as will be explained. For the marrow is considered like flesh in all contexts.

6 The following laws apply when there is a limb and/or flesh limply hanging from a person. Even though they cannot be restored to their natural state and vitality, they are pure. If the person dies, the flesh is pure and the limb imparts ritual impurity according to the laws pertaining to a limb severed from a living body and not according to the laws pertaining to a limb severed from a corpse.

What are the differences between the laws pertaining to a limb severed from a living body and the laws pertaining to a limb severed from a corpse? Flesh and bones that become separated from a limb severed from a living person are pure. Flesh and bones that become separated from a limb severed from a corpse are considered as if they were separate from an entire corpse and impart impurity according to the appropriate measures.

7 There is no minimum measure for either a limb severed from a living body or a limb severed from a corpse.

A man has 248 limbs, every one of them comprising flesh, sinews, and bones. The teeth are not included in this number. There are 251 in a woman.

Any limb that became separated while intact as it was when it came into being, whether it was separated while the person was alive or after his death imparts impurity when it is touched, carried, or one is under the same structure with the exception of the three extra limbs possessed by a woman. The latter do not convey impurity when one is under the same structure.

Similarly, an extra finger that has a bone, but does not have a nail, can be counted as part of the sum of the majority of a person's limbs if it is counted on his hand together with his other fingers. If it is not counted on his hand together with his other fingers, it can, nevertheless, impart impurity when it is touched or carried. It does not, however, impart impurity when one is under the same shelter. The impurity it imparts is of Rabbinic origin. If it has a nail, it is considered as other limbs.

Why did the Sages rule that a finger that is not counted should impart impurity? This decree was a safeguard lest the impurity that could be imparted by one that is counted would be ignored. Why did they rule that it does not impart impurity when under the same shelter? They established a point of distinction to make it known that the impurity it imparts originates in a Rabbinic decree so that terumah and sacrificial meat will not be burnt because of this type of impurity.

8 If there is no flesh on the bones of a corpse, they impart impurity like an entire corpse when they are touched or carried or when one is under the same structure, provided it is apparent that they have the form of bones, for one can still refer to them as "the bones of a man." These are the bones that impart the ritual impurity of a corpse: the backbone, the skull, the majority of the body's structure, and the majority of the number of bones in the body.

What is meant by the backbone causing impurity? When the backbone is intact, it is considered as an entire corpse. If even one of the eighteen vertebrae is missing, they are considered as other bones.

What is meant by the skull causing impurity? When the skull is intact, it is considered as an entire corpse. If it is missing a portion as large as a sela, it is considered as other bones. If it has small holes, their area is added together to see if it compromises that of a sela.

The entire structure of a man is: the two shins, the hips, the ribs, and the backbone. The majority of the structure of a corpse is considered as an entire corpse. What is implied? For example, if his two shins and one hip are present, it is as if the entire corpse was present. If even the slightest amount is missing from "the majority of the structure," the bones are considered as other bones.

What is meant by the majority of the number of the bones? The majority of the number of bones, e.g., 125 bones. If there are 124, they are considered as other bones. Even though this particular person had extra limbs or fewer limbs, this figure is calculated according to the number of bones of the majority of people unless the extra limb is a finger that has a nail or which is counted on his hand together with his other fingers. Such a finger is counted in the sum of a person's bones, as stated.

9 The following laws apply to the remaining bones of a corpse when among them, there is not the majority of the number, nor the majority of the structure of the corpse, and not an intact backbone, nor an intact skull. If there are a fourth of a kab of bones, they impart impurity like an entire corpse when they are touched or carried or one is under the same structure. If there are less than a fourth of a kab - this applies even to a bone merely the size of a barley-corn - they impart impurity when they are touched or carried. They do not, however, impart impurity through being under the same structure.

10 If there is one bone, even if it is a fourth of a kab in size, it imparts impurity when it is touched or carried. It does not, however, impart impurity through being under the same structure.

The impurity imparted by one bone is a halachah conveyed by the Oral Tradition. Numbers 19:18 states: "And all who touch the bone." The Oral Tradition teaches that even a bone the size of a barley-corn imparts impurity when it is touched or carried. Since this impurity is taught as halachah by the Oral Tradition, it is considered as Scriptural Law and not as a Rabbinic decree.

11 When the bones of a corpse decompose in the grave and become a rekev, two handfuls of that rekev impart impurity when that quantity is carried or it is located under the same structure as a person or object. It does not, however, impart impurity when it is touched, because it is impossible to touch it in its entirety, because it is not a whole entity. Even if it was mixed with water, the different portions are not considered as joined together.

12 The blood of a corpse imparts impurity like the corpse itself when it is touched, carried, or one is under the same structure, for Numbers 19:13 speaks of: "the soul of man" and Deuteronomy 12:23 states: "the blood is the soul."

What is the measure of blood that imparts impurity? A revi'it. Even the liquid left after blood coagulates imparts impurity when one is under the same structure, as a corpse does, as long as it is red in color.

13 Blood from a living person, even if it is the blood that flows out when the person is stabbed in the throat, is pure as long as the person is alive. If the blood which flows from his body at the end, i.e., before his death, becomes mixed with the blood which flows from his body after he died and the entire mixture is a revi'it, and it is not known how much flowed out while he was alive and how much flowed out after his death, even if half a revi'it flowed out while he was alive and half after his death, this is referred to as "weltering blood." It imparts impurity when it is touched, carried, or when one is under the same structure. This impurity is, however, of Rabbinic origin.

14 The following laws apply when the corpse of a person who was slain was lying on a bed. His blood had been dripping from his body while he was alive and descending into a hole. At one point, he died. After he died, the blood continued dripping and descending into that hole. All of the blood is pure. For the drops of blood are nullified one by one, as they become mixed with the blood that flowed from his body during his lifetime.
If only a revi'it of blood flowed out from the person's body and there is a doubt whether it all flowed out during the person's life or afterwards, this is a questionable situation of ritual impurity like other questionable situations. One who touches it in a private domain is impure. In a public domain, he is pure, as will be explained in the appropriate place.

15 According to Scriptural Law, as long as the source of impurity is in a grave, the grave imparts impurity when it is touched or when one is under the same structure, as a corpse does, for Numbers 19:16 mentions touching "a corpse, the bone of a man, or a grave." A person is impure whether he touches the covering of a grave or its sides, provided it is built and totally enclosed. Afterwards, in such a situation, the grave imparts impurity in its entirety when it is touched or when one is under the same structure.
If, however, one places keilim, stones, or the like at the side of a corpse and covers the corpse with keilim, stones, or the like, the covering that shelters the corpse from above is called a gollel. And the objects at the side that support the gollel and upon which it rests are called a dofek. Both of them, the gollel and the dofek impart impurity when they are touched or when one is under the same structure, as is true with regard to a grave. The impurity they impart is of Rabbinic origin. They do not impart impurity when carried. Accordingly, if one drags a gollel with ropes until it covers a corpse or drags it or pulls it away from being above a corpse, or one dragged a dofek until he positioned the gollel above it or pulled it by ropes from under the dofek, the person is pure.

Entities that support the dofek are called dofek dofekkim and they are pure.

16 When a field containing a grave was plowed and the bones of the corpse were lost in its earth, this is called a beit hapras. Its earth imparts impurity when it is touched or carried, for perhaps it contains a bone the size of a barley corn, but it does not impart impurity when one is under the same structure.

Similarly, the earth in the entire Diaspora imparts impurity when it is touched or carried, because of the possibility of the presence of bones, for they are not careful about burying them. The impurity of a beit hapras and the earth of the Diaspora is of Rabbinic origin, as will be explained.

1 The following entities impart ritual impurity when they are touched, carried, or one is under the same structure: a) a corpse, even a stillborn fetus whose limbs have not become attached to its body with sinews, b) an olive-sized portion of flesh from a corpse, c) an olive-sized portion of netzal, d) a limb from a living person that has the required amount of flesh, e) a limb from a corpse that has the required amount of flesh, f) the backbone of a corpse, g) its skull, h) the majority of its structure, i) the majority of the number of its bones, j) a fourth of a kab of bones in any instance, even if they do not comprise the majority of the structure of the number of the bones of the corpse, k) a revi'it of blood, and l) a revi'it of blood of "weltering blood"; twelve entities in total.

2 The following entities impart ritual impurity when they are touched or carried, but not when one is under the same structure: a) a limb from a living person that is lacking enough flesh to regenerate itself, b) a limb from a corpse that is lacking either flesh or bone and does not have enough flesh to regenerate itself or the bone is lacking, even if has enough flesh to regenerate itself, c) a backbone that is lacking and does not possess a fourth of a kab of bones, d) a skull that is lacking and does not possess a fourth of a kab of bones, e) a bone, even if it is the size of a barley corn, f) the earth of the nations, and g) a beit hapras; seven entities in total.

3 A gollel and a dofek impart ritual impurity when they are touched or when one is under the same shelter, like a grave. They do not impart ritual impurity when carried. The decomposed mass of a corpse imparts ritual impurity when it is carried or when one is under the same shelter. It does not impart ritual impurity when touched.

It appears to me that the ritual impurity imparted by a fourth of a kab of bones when one is under the same structure, a revi'it of blood, a limb that does not have the sufficient amount of flesh, whether from a corpse or from a living person is not of Scriptural origin, as evidenced by the fact that a nazirite need not shave his hair because of them, as we explained in Hilchot Nizirut. Nor is one liable for entering the Temple after having contracted such impurity and when a person is impure due to an impurity of Scriptural origin, he is liable for entering the Temple. Therefore I maintain that all sources of impurity from a corpse that do not require a nazirite to shave are not of Scriptural origin.

4 The decomposed mass of a corpse does not impart ritual impurity unless it is buried naked in a coffin of marble, glass, or the like, and it was totally intact at the time of burial. If it was lacking a limb, it was buried in its garments, or it was buried in a coffin of wood or metal, the decomposed mass does not impart ritual impurity. The rationale is that the rot of the garment or the wood and the rust of the metal will become mixed with the decomposed mass of the corpse.

When any amount of earth becomes mixed with the decomposed mass of a corpse, it remains impure. These laws of rekev applies only to the corpse of one who died naturally. They do not apply to one who was slain.

5 When two corpses are buried together, a deceased's hair or nails were trimmed and then buried with him, or a pregnant woman was buried with the fetus she was carrying, the laws of rekev do not apply.

6 If one ground a corpse until it became a decomposed mass, it does not convey the impurity of rekev. Those laws do not apply unless it decomposes as part of a natural process.

7 If one ground a corpse and then left its remains until they decomposed naturally or a portion of the body decomposed while the person was alive, he died, and then the entire body decomposed, there is an unresolved doubt concerning the ruling. Hence, if a person becomes impure because of two handfuls of this rekev, he must consider himself impure, because of this unresolved doubt.

8 The following laws applies when there are two handfuls and more of earth that was found under a corpse or in a grave and it is not known what it comprises: whether it is rekev that imparts impurity when under the same shelter or it is merely earth that has become soiled with the netzal and the blood of the corpse. It imparts impurity when carried and when one is under the same shelter, because this mass that is more than two handfuls contains two full handfuls of rekev. It appears to me that also this impurity is a Rabbinic decree.

9 When a corpse was burned and its skeleton - i.e., the backbone and the ribs - is intact, it conveys impurity like an entire corpse. Needless to say, this applies if the flesh is merely charred. If, however, it is burnt to the extent that its form is destroyed, it is ritually pure.
Similarly, if a miscarried embryo which had already begun to have its limbs take form was mixed with water, it is pure, because its form was destroyed.

10 When the flesh of a corpse has become powdery and flourlike, it is ritually pure. Similarly, the ashes of corpses that were burnt are ritually pure. Similarly, worms which come into existence from the flesh of a corpse, whether they are alive or dead, are ritually pure.

We have already explained that bone marrow is considered as flesh in all instances, whether with regard to a human corpse or with regard to the carcass of an animal or crawling animal.

11 A person's skin is considered as his flesh. If it was processed entirely or trodden upon as is necessary for processing, it is considered as pure according to Scriptural Law. According to Rabbinic Law, however, an olive-sized portion imparts impurity like the flesh of a corpse. This is a decree, enacted so that people do not become accustomed to processing human skin and using it.

12 The skin that appears opposite the face of a infant when he is born, whether both he and his mother survive the birth or he and his mother die in the process of the birth, is considered as ritually pure. The rationale is that it is like a waste produce, like filth, vomit, or the like.

13 Every element of a corpse is impure with the exception of the teeth, the hair, and the nails, for they are replaced. While they are attached to the body, they are all impure.

What is implied? When a corpse is outside a house and his hair which is attached to his body is inside, everything in the house becomes impure. Similarly, one who touches hair, teeth, or nails while they are attached to a corpse becomes impure. When the hair of the deceased was ready to be cut or his nails were ready to be trimmed, their halachic status is in doubt because they are prepared to be cut off. Therefore, one who touches them is considered as ritually impure because of the doubt.

Any liquid that flows out from a corpse is pure except for its blood. Any liquid with the color of blood that flows from a corpse is impure, as we explained. Why wasn't a decree made with regard to liquids that flow from a corpse as was made with regard to liquids flowing from other impure individuals? Since everyone withdraws from a corpse, they did not feel the need to enact a decree regarding liquids that flow from it.

14 When a liver has decomposed, a revi'it of it imparts impurity, because it is considered like blood that has coagulated.
If all the blood of an infant flows out, but it does not amount to a revi'it, it is pure even though it comprises all the blood in his body.

15 If even the slightest amount of these measures are lacking, the substances are pure: a) a revi'it of blood, b) a piece of bone the size of a barley-corn, c) an olive-sized portion of flesh, d) an olive-sized portion of netzal, e) two handfuls of rekev, and f) a limb from a living person from which the slightest portion of the bone was lacking.

Chapter 4

1 When a revi'it of blood comes from two corpses, it is pure. To impart impurity, the entire revi'it must come from one corpse. When a backbone was put together from two corpses, e.g., some of the vertebrae came from one corpse and others, from another, when a skull was put together from two corpses, or a fourth of a kab of bones came from two corpses or a limb came from two corpses: in all these instances, impurity is not imparted when one is under the same structure, only through touching and carrying, as is true with regard to other bones.

2 When a limb from a living person comes from two people, it is pure. Even if it comes from one person, it is pure if it was cut into two.

3 An olive-sized portion of flesh that comes from two corpses, an olive-sized portion of netzal that comes from two corpses, and two handfuls of rekev that come from two corpses when the laws of rekev apply to each one of them, can be combined. Similarly, a half of an olive-sized portion of flesh and a half an olive-sized portion of netzal can be combined with each other. All of the other sources of impurity stemming from a corpse are not combined with each other, because they are not of equal measures.

4 When a bone the size of a barley-corn is divided into two, it imparts impurity when carried. Similarly, when a quarter of a kab of bones were crushed, although none of them are the size of a barley-corn, they impart impurity when one is under the same shelter as if they were not crushed.

5 When an olive-sized portion from a corpse was cut into small pieces, flattened, and pressed together, it imparts impurity when under the same shelter and when carried, but it does not impart impurity when one touches a portion of it, even when the pieces are joined together, because anything joined together by man is not considered as joined.

6 When an olive-sized portion of fat that was intact was liquefied, it is impure. If it was separated and it was liquefied, it is pure.

7 When the majority of the vertebrae were taken from a backbone, it does not impart impurity when under the same shelter, even through its form remains. If it is in the grave, even if it is broken and even if it is crushed, it imparts impurity when under the same shelter. The rationale is that the grave joins it together.

8 Whenever a substance that imparts impurity when under the same shelter was divided and then both portions are brought into a house, it is considered as joined together by the shelter and impurity is imparted by them because of it.

9 When there is an olive-sized portion of flesh that grew on a bone through the influence of heaven, and a portion of that bone was brought inside a house, the house contracts ritual impurity. If the flesh had been pushed into the bones by humans, the house is pure. The rationale is that anything joined by man is not considered as joined.

10 When two handfuls of rekev are spread out throughout a house, the house is impure.

11 When a revi'it is absorbed in a house, in the future, the house is pure. Anything that was in the house at the time the blood was absorbed in the earth, is impure.

12 When an olive-sized portion of a corpse was lost inside a house and it was searched for and not found, the house is assumed to be pure. If it is discovered afterwards, the house is deemed impure retroactively from the time it was lost until the time it was discovered.

13 The following laws apply when a revi'it of blood was poured in an open space. If it coagulated or it was in a place where it could collect, i.e., a low place like a pit and an entity projects over even a portion of it, that entity is impure. If it was spilled on the doorstep which was on an incline, whether to the inside or outside, the house is pure. The rationale is that the blood did not come to rest on the doorstep. If the doorstep was a place where the blood could collect or it coagulated there, the house is impure.

The following laws apply when a revi'it of blood is absorbed in a garment. If it could be washed and a revi'it of blood would be discharged from it, the garment imparts impurity when touched, carried, or when one is under the same shelter. If not, it does not impart impurity when one is under the same shelter and it is considered as a garment that came into contact with a corpse. The rationale is that whenever something absorbed cannot be discharged, it is considered as pure.

How is the quantity of blood measured? The garment should be washed in water. Then an equal quantity of water should be brought and a revi'it of blood placed in it. If their appearance was the same or the water in which the garment was washed was of a redder hue than the mixture, it is apparent that a revi'it was discharged.

14 Carrying, touching, and being under the same structure are three different categories. Whenever activities come from one category, they can be combined and impart impurity. If they are from two categories, they are not combined and are pure.

What is implied? A person becomes impure in all of the following situations, for the activities that are combined are from the same category:

a) He touches two portions of a corpse that are half the size of an olive at the same time or carries two portions of a corpse that are half the size of an olive at the same time.

b) He stands over two portions of a corpse that are half the size of an olive.

c) He stands over a portion of a corpse that is half the size of an olive and has a similar portion hang over his body.

d) He and a portion of a corpse half the size of an olive were under one shelter and a portion of his body stood over another similar portion, or a similar portion was suspended over his body.

One is, by contrast, pure in all of the following situations. He touches a portion of a corpse half the size of an olive or carries such a portion and:

a) another entity covers both him and another such portion from a corpse;

b) another such portion was suspended over a portion of his body; c) he stood over such a portion, or

d) he touched such a portion and carried such a portion. The rationale is that a quantity that is touched is not combined with one that is carried, neither with regard to a corpse, nor with regard to other forms of impurity. Similarly, a quantity that is touched is not combined with one that is governed by the laws of ohel, nor is one governed by the laws of ohel combined with one that is carried, because they are not from the same category.

1 All entities - whether humans or keilim - that become impure because of contact with a human corpse contract impurity that lasts seven days.
What is implied? When a person or a k'li touch an entity that imparts the impurity associated with a corpse when touched or contract impurity through ohel from one of the entities that impart impurity through ohel, or carry an entity that imparts the impurity associated with a corpse when carried, he or it contract impurity that lasts seven days, as Numbers 19:14 states: "Anyone who enters the tent and anything that is inside the tent will be impure for seven days."

2 A person who becomes impure because of a corpse and keilim which such a person touches contract impurity that lasts seven days, as Numbers 31:24 states: "And you shall wash your garments on the seventh day and become pure."
If, by contrast, a person touches a person who contracted impurity because of a corpse - whether he touched him after he disengaged himself from the corpse that imparted impurity to him or whether he is still touching the corpse - the second person is impure only until the evening, as ibid. 19:22 states: "And the soul that touches it will be impure until the evening."
This is the Scriptural Law. According to Rabbinic Law, if one touches a corpse and touches another person while he is still touching the corpse, they both contract impurity that lasts seven days, as if the second person touched the corpse itself.

In what context does this apply? With regard to partaking of terumah and sacrificial food. By contrast, a nazirite or one who brings a Paschal sacrifice who are touched by a person who touched a corpse only becomes impure until the evening as is Scriptural Law, whether the first person is still touching the corpse or whether he is not.

3 When keilim become impure due to contact with a corpse, whether because they were touched or because they were under the same shelter, one who touches them is considered like one who touches a corpse itself. Just as a corpse imparts impurity that lasts seven days to whatever touches it, whether a person or a k'li, so too, when a k'li became impure due to contact with a corpse, it and other keilim, or a person who touches it contract impurity that lasts seven days, as implied by Numbers 19:16: "one slain by the sword or a corpse." According to the Oral Tradition, it was taught that a sword is like a corpse. This also applies to other keilim, whether they are metal utensils, keilim that can be purified by immersion, or garments.

These concepts can also be inferred from ibid. 31:19 which states: "Everyone who killed a person and everyone who touched a corpse must purify himself." Would one think that a person who shot an arrow or threw a stone and killed another person would become impure for seven days? Instead, this is speaking about a person who kills with a sword or the like who becomes impure because he touched the k'li with which he killed, for that k'li touched a corpse.

What is the source from which we learn that keilim that touch a person who touched keilim that became impure because of contact with a corpse become impure? It is written: "And you shall wash your garments on the seventh day and become pure." This teaches that any person who contracts impurity that lasts seven days imparts impurity that lasts seven days to his garments.

4 Thus in summary: When a person touches a corpse and then touches another person, the first contracts impurity that lasts seven days and the second, impurity that lasts until the evening. When keilim touch a corpse and then other keilim touch them, they both contract impurity that lasts seven days. An entity whose connection is of the third degree, whether a person or a k'li, contracts only the impurity that lasts until the evening.
When keilim are touching a corpse and a person touches those keilim and other keilim, all three contract the impurity that lasts seven days. An entity whose connection is of the fourth degree contracts only the impurity that lasts until the evening.

5 When does the above apply? With regard to terumah and sacrificial food. With regard to liability for karet for entering the Temple or partaking of sacrificial foods, by contrast, only the first two are liable - the first person who touched the corpse and the second person who touched him - as mandated by Scriptural Law, as Numbers 19:22 states: "Everything which is touched by the impure person becomes impure."
When, by contrast, one touches keilim that were touched by an impure person or one touches a person who touches keilim that touched a corpse, he is exempt, as we explained in Hilchot Bi'at HaMikdash. For these matters, although part of the Oral Tradition, are not considered as Scriptural Law. The rationale is that it was only explicitly stated in the Torah that one who became impure because of contact with a corpse becomes a primary source of impurity and secondly, that an entity, whether a person or a k'li,that touches him becomes impure, becoming a first degree derivative of impurity.

6 When an earthenware container touched a corpse or was in the same structure as it, it contracts ritual impurity. It does not impart ritual impurity, neither to a person, nor to another earthenware container, nor to any other k'li. For an earthenware container never becomes a primary source of ritual impurity, neither with regard to impurity stemming from a corpse or other sources of impurity. This is Scriptural Law, even though it is part of Oral Tradition.

7 This is a great general principle with regard to ritual impurity. Any primary source of ritual impurity imparts ritual impurity to humans, garments, and utensils, whether metal implements, utensils that can be purified by immersion, or earthenware containers. Any entity that imparts impurity to a person or keilim when touched is called a primary source of ritual impurity. Any derivative of ritual impurity imparts ritual impurity to food and drink, but it does not impart impurity to a person or keilim, neither to earthenware containers, nor to other keilim and garments.

8 Any entity that touches a primary source of impurity is referred to as a derivative of the first degree. Anything that touches a derivative of the first degree is referred to as a derivative of the second degree. Anything that touches a derivative of the second degree is referred to as a derivative of the third degree. And anything that touches a derivative of the third degree is referred to as a derivative of the fourth degree. A derivative of the first degree and those on a lesser level are called "the offspring of impurity."

9 Any entity, whether a person or a k'li, which contracts impurity that lasts seven days as a result of contact with a corpse is referred to as tamei meit. The person or the k'li is a primary source of impurity with regard to imparting impurity to terumah and sacrificial food, as we explained. From it, are counted a first degree derivative and a second degree derivative to impart impurity to people and keilim when it is touched, like other primary sources of impurity. It does not impart impurity when carried.

10 Any entity that contracts impurity that lasts until the evening as a result of contact with an entity that contracted impurity from a corpse is considered as the offspring of impurity. It is a derivative of impurity of the first degree. It is possible that a fourth degree contact with a corpse can be a first derivative of impurity, as we explained with regard to terumah and sacrificial foods.

11 When a person or keilim contract impurity because of contact with the lands of the nations or a beit hapras or because he carried such earth or he touched weltering blood, a gollel or a dofek, or entered a shelter where they were located or carried weltering blood, in all instances, these individuals or keilim and the like are all primary sources of impurity by Rabbinic decree. Similarly, garments that contract impurity that lasts seven days because of these entities are all primary sources of impurity by Rabbinic decree.

12 A tent itself which encompasses a source of impurity contracts impurity that lasts seven days according to Scriptural Law even though the impurity did not touch it. It is like garments that were touched by a corpse, as implied by Numbers 19:18: "And he shall sprinkle on the tent."

When does the above apply? When the tent was made from cloth, sackcloth, or a wooden k'li, or a hide, either a hide from an animal or beast that is permitted to be eaten or one which is forbidden to be eaten. These concepts are derived from Exodus 40:19: "And he spread the tent over the Sanctuary." The term "tent" applies only to an entity that is woven or made from hides, as in the Sanctuary. If, by contrast, the structure was made from slats of wood, like a roof, a mat, or the like, or it was bone, or made of metal, it is pure. Needless to say, if it was made from building materials, it is pure.

Whenever the Torah uses the expression, "the house is impure," the intent is the person and the keilim in the house. There is no product of wood that becomes impure as a tent except flax.

13 When garments touch a corpse, even though they are considered as a corpse with regard to imparting impurity that lasts seven days to other entities that touch them, they are not considered as a corpse with regard to imparting impurity when one is under their shelter or when one carries them. The rationale is that the impurity stemming from carrying a corpse itself is not explicitly stated in the Torah, as we explained. And with regard to the impurity imparted by a tent, Numbers 19:14 states: "A man when he will die in a tent." Therefore if one carried garments that touched a corpse without touching the garments, or if one stands over them, they are held over him, or they were in a structure with him, he is pure.

Similarly, when a person contracted impurity from a corpse and stood over keilim, they are pure. For one who contracts impurity from a corpse imparts impurity through touch alone.

14 A corpse does not impart impurity to a seat or a couch that is below him, nor to articles that are placed upon him, only to a k'li that touches a corpse whether it was at its side or it was below the corpse or on top of it.
What is implied? There were ten garments one on top of the other and the corpse was on top of them and then there were ten garments on top of him. The garment that is touching him and the second garment which is touching the garment touching him both contract the impurity that lasts seven days. The third garment, whether on top or below, contracts the impurity which lasts until the evening.
When does the above - that all the garments or keilim above him and below him are pure - apply? When the impurity was not retzutzah, the laws of ohel do not apply, or there was a stone intervening between them, as will be explained in the appropriate place.

Chapter 6

1 When one makes keilim out of the bones of a fish or its skin, they are not susceptible to ritual impurity, neither according to Scriptural Law, nor according to Rabbinic Law. Similar concepts apply with regard to the green moss that appears at the surface of the water and the like. For all entities that come from the sea are pure, as will be explained in Hilchot Keilim. Accordingly, when one makes a tent from the skin of a fish or from moss growing in the sea, the tent itself is not susceptible to impurity although it conveys impurity to everything under it like other tents.

2 Keilim made from animal turds, stone implements, or implements made from earth (raw dirt), are not susceptible to ritual impurity, neither according to Scriptural Law, nor according to Rabbinic Law. This applies to the impurity stemming from a human corpse and to other types of impurity.

Similarly, containers that are made to be left in place semi-permanently, e.g., a chest, a cabinet, a container shaped like a beehive which can contain 40 se'ah of a liquid and have a base are not susceptible to ritual impurity, neither according to Scriptural Law, nor according to Rabbinic Law. They are called: oversized wooden containers.

3 When implements are made from wood, those which are flat are pure, while those that can serve as a container are susceptible to impurity. Similarly, with regard to earthenware implements: those which are flat are pure, while those that can serve as a container are susceptible to impurity. The latter are susceptible to impurity only from their inner space or when moved by a zav. Even when a corpse touches the outer surface of an earthenware container, the container does not contract impurity. If any of the sources of impurity enter the inner space of such a container, they impart impurity even though they do not touch the container.

If an earthenware container was in the same tent as a corpse, it contracts impurity, because the impurity enters its inner space. If it had a cover fastened to it, it and everything in it is pure, as stated in the Torah, for impurity enters it only through its opening and when it is moved by a zav. In the latter instance, it is impure, because he is considered to have touched it in its entirety.

4 When one makes a gollel from an object that is not susceptible to impurity, e.g., he placed a stone, a vessel made from earth, an oversized wooden container, an earthenware container that was fastened closed, or a fish skin or its bone, on a grave, one who touches these articles contracts the impurity that lasts seven days, because he has touched a gollel. If they ceased serving as a gollel, or the corpse was removed from beneath them, they are pure,

Similarly, when an animal is tied down and made a gollel, anyone who touches it contracts the impurity that lasts seven days as long as it serves as a gollel. If the animal is released, it is pure, like all other animals. Similarly, if a barrel filled with liquids that was fastened closed was made into a gollel for a corpse, one who touches it contracts the impurity that lasts seven days. The barrel and the liquids are pure.

5 When a beam is used as a gollel for a grave, whether it is standing upright or lying on its side, only the portion that is above the opening of the grave becomes impure. One who touches the end of it which is lying outside the grave is pure.

If one made its head a gollel for a grave and it is standing over the grave like a tree, anyone who touches it within the four handbreadths that are immediately above the grave is impure because of the laws of gollel. If he touches it above four handbreadths, he is pure.

When does the above apply? When he will cut off the upper portions of the beam in the future. If he is not planning to cut them off, the beam is considered as a gollel in its entirety.

6 If two large stones, four handbreadths by four handbreadths, were used as a gollel, when one stands over either of them, he is impure. If one of them was removed, one who stands over the other is pure. The rationale is that the impurity has a path through which to depart.

7 When one uses a mound of small stones as a gollel for a grave, only the inner layer which covers the grave per se imparts impurity. One who touches the remainder of the stones is pure.

8 When a burial vault was hewed out of a large stone, the corpse was placed inside and then one covered it with a gollel, one who touches any portion of the stone is pure. One who touches the gollel is impure. To what can this be compared? To a large pit filled with corpses with a large stone covering its opening. Only the portion above the open space imparts impurity. If one builds a structure over it, it is considered as a closed grave which imparts impurity from all sides.

If a burial vault hewn into the stone was wide at its bottom and narrow at its top, and a corpse was placed within, one who touches it from below is pure, but one who touches it from above is impure. The rationale is that the side portions above are resting over the corpse and are considered like a gollel.

If a burial vault hewn into the stone was wide at its top and narrow at its bottom, one who touches any place on it is impure. If its sides are straight, one who touches it from the handbreadth next to the bottom of the grave and upwards, is impure. If he touches from that handbreadth and lower, he is pure. If one hollowed out a burial vault in a stone and inserted the corpse in it like a nail, one who touches anywhere on the stone's surface is pure, except for the opening through which the corpse was inserted.

9 The following laws apply to a cave in which a grave is located and to the courtyard in front of the cave. When the courtyard is open, one standing in it is pure as long as he does not touch the lintel of the cave. Different laws apply when the courtyard is covered. If there is an area four handbreadths by four handbreadths or more that is open at the side of the cave, anyone who enters the courtyard is pure. If the open space was less than four handbreadths by four handbreadths, one who enters the courtyard is impure, even though he did not touch the entrance to the cave.

Chapter 7

1 When a corpse is located in a closed structure or in one which had an opening, but its doorframe was destroyed and it was closed up, it imparts impurity to all its surroundings. Anyone who touches the back or the roof of the structure contracts the impurity that lasts seven days, because it is like a closed grave.

If an entrance had been opened in it, even if it was closed up, as long as the doorframe was not destroyed, one who touches the back of the structure or its roof, is pure. Only the area in front of the door is impure.

How large is the measure of a doorway? If an entire corpse is in the building, the entrance must be four handbreadths. If there is only an olive-sized portion of a corpse, the entrance must be a handbreadth. Any portion larger than an olive-sized portion is considered as an entire corpse and requires an entrance of four handbreadths

2 The following rules apply when there is a corpse in a building that has many entrances. When they are all closed, they all impart ritual impurity. One who sits near any of the entrances under the roof that protrudes over the entrance becomes impure.

If one of them was opened or one intended to remove the corpse through one of them even though he had this thought after the person died and even if he intended to remove it through a window that is four handbreadths by four handbreadths, this saves all the other entrances. Only the entrance that is open or about which he thought imparts impurity. The others are pure, because they are closed and the building is not considered as a closed grave. Similarly, if one began hollowing out an opening through which to remove the corpse, when he has hollowed out an area four handbreadths by four handbreadths, this saves all the other entrances.

If there was a closed entrance and he intended to remove the corpse through it and began to open it, once he opens it, it saves all the other entrances. If the building had many windows, but they were all closed, they are all pure. If they are open, they all impart impurity, but they do not save the entrances.

When there is a small entrance inside a large entrance, anything that covers either of them imparts impurity. If one intended to remove the corpse through the smaller entrance, the smaller entrance purifies the larger one. If they are both of equal size, anything that covers either of them imparts impurity. If one intended to remove the corpse through either of them, it purifies the other.

If the building had one entrance in the north and one entrance in the south and one intended to remove the corpse through the northern entrance, that entrance imparts impurity. If, afterwards, the brother or the relatives of the deceased came and said: "We will remove it only from the southern entrance," the southern entrance replaces and purifies the northern entrance provided one does not say so as a ruse. If he says so as a ruse, they both impart impurity.

3 The following rules apply when several houses open to an exedra and a corpse is located in one of the houses. If the usual practice was to remove the corpse through the exedra, the gateway and the houses become impure. If not, the gateway is impure and the houses are pure.

If there is a closed room in a house and a corpse was brought into the room through an open window, the outer portion of the house is pure.

The rationale is that the impurity goes back and departs through the same window that it entered.

4 A grave does not impart impurity to the area around it unless there is empty space a handbreadth long, a handbreadth wide and a handbreadth high above the corpse. Should that condition be met, even if one built a structure over the space of one cubic handbreadth until the heavens, it imparts impurity in its entirety, because the entire structure is considered as a grave.

If the impurity was flush against the covering and there was not an empty space of a cubic handbreadth, the impurity pierces through and ascends and pierces through and descends. The only ones who are impure are those who touch the space above the impurity, stand over it from above, touch the space below it, or stand below it. If, however, one touches the side of the building, he is pure.

5 This is a great general principle with regard to the impurity stemming from a corpse: If the impurity is flush with its covering, the impurity pierces through and ascends until the heavens and pierces through and descends until the depths, but does not impart impurity to those on the sides.

What is implied? There is a heap of grain or a pile of stones with an olive-sized portion of a corpse in its midst. There are keilim next to the source of impurity, but they are not touching it. Those keilim are pure, but any k'li in the pile that is directly above or below the impurity is impure, because the impurity pierces through and ascends and pierces through and descends. If there was empty space, a handbreadth long, a handbreadth wide and a handbreadth high above the corpse, it is considered as a closed grave and it imparts impurity from all sides.

6 When a building was filled with earth or pebbles, it is as if the house no longer exists. It is like a pile of earth or pebbles. If there was a source of impurity in the midst of the earth, the impurity pierces through and ascends and pierces through and descends, but the keilim in the earth at its sides are pure.

7 When impurity that was flush against its covering was in a wall and one rested a sukkah against the wall, the sukkah is impure. The rationale is that the wall became one of the sides of a structure containing a corpse. Although the sides of the structure would be pure when touched by a person if it did not have a roof, once a roof was placed over them, everything in the structure is impure, because the impurity is contained in the structure.

Chapter 8

1 When a grave became lost in a field, its earth imparts ritual impurity when one touches or carries it like the earth of a beit hap'ras, for perhaps the grave that was there was crushed and there are bones the size of a barley-corn in its earth. Similarly, one who stands over any portion of the field contracts ritual impurity. If one builds a structure there, everything inside the structure contracts impurity, for perhaps the structure he constructed in that field is constructed over the grave.

2 The following laws apply when a person built a house and a loft on top of it in such a field. If the entrance to the loft was directly above the entrance to the house, the loft is pure. Even if the grave was under the lintel of the house, the loft is pure, for there is one structure on top of another structure, as will be explained. If they were not directly above each other, the loft is also impure, for perhaps the entrance to the loft is above the grave and thus the loft is projecting over the grave.

3 It is permitted to sow any type of seeds in this field, because the roots of the plants growing from the seeds do not reach the grave. One should not, however, plant any fruit trees inside of it, because their roots will reach the corpse.

We operate under the presumption that low hills that are close to a town and near to a cemetery or to the road leading to the cemetery, whether ancient or new, are impure, because women bury fetuses that they miscarry there and lepers bury their limbs there. Different rules apply to those hills which are distant from a town. The new ones are pure, but the ancient ones are impure. The rationale is that perhaps they were close to a town that was destroyed or a road that was lost.

What is meant by a hill close to a town? Any hill that does not have another one closer than it. What is meant by an ancient one? One that no one remembers whether there was a cemetery there or not.

4 The following laws apply to a field for weeping, i.e., a place near a cemetery where women sit and weep over the departed: Even though its earth is pure, because it has not been established that a corpse is buried there, trees should not be planted there, nor should crops be sown there, so as not to have people frequent it, for perhaps a corpse was buried there. Our Sages had this suspicion, because its owner will have despaired of its use, because it is close to the cemetery. Therefore it is possible that a person will come and bury a corpse there.

One may use the earth of such a place to make ovens to cook sacrificial meat, because it has not been established that impurity was there.

5 When a grave is discovered on one's property, it is permitted to disinter the corpse and rebury it elsewhere. If it was reburied, the place around the first grave is impure and it is forbidden to benefit from it until it is checked, as will be explained. When it is known that a grave is located in a field, it is forbidden to disinter the corpse and rebury it elsewhere. If it was reburied, the place around the first grave is pure and it is permitted to benefit from it.

6 When a grave causes harm to people at large, the corpse should be disinterred. Its place is impure and it is forbidden to benefit from it.

7 The following laws apply when a person encounter a meit mitzvah. If he finds it within the city's Sabbath limits, he should bring it to the cemetery. If he found it outside the Sabbath limits, even in a field of saffron, it acquires its place and should be buried where it is found.

If he found it in the public thoroughfare, he should move it to the side. If an uncultivated field was on one side and a plowed field was on the other side, he should bury it in the uncultivated field. If there was a plowed field on one side and a field that had been sown on the other side, he should bury it in the plowed field. If a field that had been sown was on one side and a vineyard on the other side, it should be buried in the field that had been sown. If there was an orchard on one side and a vineyard on the other, he should bury it in the vineyard, because of the impurity of ohel. If both fields were of equal value, he may bury it wherever he chooses.

8 When a grave is discovered, it imparts impurity retroactively. If someone comes and says: "it is definitely clear to me that there was not a grave here," even if he is speaking about a period twenty years earlier, the grave does not impart impurity except from the time of its discovery onward.

9 Whenever a person discovers a grave, a corpse, or a portion of a corpse that would impart impurity through ohel, he should designate it, so that it will not create an obstacle for others.

During Chol HaMoed, agents of the court go out to designate the graves. A designation is not made over a portion of a corpse that is exactly the size of an olive, because ultimately, its size will be reduced in the earth.

With what is the designation made? With lime. It should be mixed and poured over the place of the impurity. The designation should not be placed on the exact perimeters of the impurity, but instead, should extend somewhat on either side so as not to ruin pure articles. The designation should not be extended much beyond the place of the impurity so as not to spoil Eretz Yisrael. A designation is not made on places that are definitely known to be used for burial, for their identity is universally known, only on the places that are doubtful, e.g., a field in which a grave was lost, the low-hanging branches of trees, or rocks jutting out from a wall.

10 When a person discovers a field that has been designated and does not know what the nature of the problem is, he should follow these guidelines. If it does not have trees, he should assume that a grave was lost in it. If it has trees in it, he should assume that a grave was plowed over in it, as will be explained.

11 When a person finds a stone that is designated, the area under it is impure. Should there be two such stones, if there is lime between them, the area between them is impure. If there is no lime between them, only on top of them, the following laws apply: If there is a shard between them, they are pure, because they are the remnants of a building. If there is no shard between them, and a light layer of lime was smoothed out over their heads on either side, we assume that this is a designation and they are impure.

If one boundary line of a field is designated, it is impure and the remainder of the field is pure. This applies also if a second or a third boundary line is designated. If all four boundary lines are designated, they are pure and the entire field is impure, for the sign should not be placed far from the place of the impurity.

1 When a person was digging in a field and he found many corpses in a one pit, one on top of the other or one next to the other, or he found the bodies of people who were slain, or he found a corpse sitting or with its head between its knees, he need not be concerned that perhaps this was a cemetery. Instead he should take the corpses and all the soft earth beneath it and then dig down three fingerbreadths He should then take all of this away. The remainder of the field is considered as pure just as it was before the corpse was discovered. This earth and the three fingerbreadths of virgin soil is called the tevusah of the corpse.

2 When the bodies of slain corpses are found in a field, one should collect all the bones from the field and then, it is pure. Similarly, when one disinters a corpse from a grave in his field, he should gather all the bones one by one and then it is pure. Similarly, a pit into which miscarried fetuses or slain corpses are cast, one should gather all the bones one by one and then it is pure.

3 If one was digging and he discovered a corpse buried in an ordinary manner, he should remove it and the earth of their tevusah. Similarly, if he discovered two corpses buried in an ordinary manner, he should remove both of them and the earth of their tevusah, and the entire field is pure. More stringent laws apply when one finds three corpses, each one lying in the manner in which corpses are usually buried. If there are between four and eight cubits between one grave and the other - i.e., the space for a bier and the buriers - it is necessary to check an additional twenty cubits - i.e., the space for two burial crypts and the open space between them from the last grave. If he does not find another corpse in this space, those twenty cubits that he checked are pure, even though they are in an area close to graves.

If he finds another corpse at the end of the 20 cubit area, it is necessary to check another twenty cubits from it, for there is a basis for the assumption that other graves will be found.

If one of the corpses that was found originally or ultimately had been slain, was sitting, or lying in an unordinary manner, e.g., its head was between its knees, it is not necessary to check another twenty cubits. Instead, one must merely remove the remains of the corpse and its tevusah, The rationale is that we operate on the presumption that the corpses are of gentiles.

4 The laws governing the impurity of graves do not apply to those of gentiles since the impurity of ohel does not apply with regard to them. One who touches their graves is pure unless he touches the corpse itself or carries it.

5 When a corpse is lacking a limb or an organ that, were it to be removed from a living person, he would die, there is no requirement to remove the tevusah, nor is there an obligation to check the area around the grave. When corpses are found lying openly on the surface of a field, there is no requirement to remove the tevusah, nor is there an obligation to check the area around the grave. Instead, one should merely gather bone after bone, and the area is pure.

When a corpse is buried without permission of the owner of the field, there is a requirement to remove the tevusah, but there is no obligation to check the area around the grave.

6 When one finds three corpses buried in an ordinary manner at the outset, three hollows in the wall of a cave, or a hollow, a grave, and a crypt, it is considered as a burial area.

If one finds two and the existence of one had been known previously, there is a requirement to remove the tevusah, but there is no obligation to check the area around the grave. The rationale is that a grave whose existence is known does not cause a place to be considered as a burial area. It was said only that when one finds three graves at the outset, then an inspection is required.

How should the inspection of the twenty cubits mentioned be carried out? One should dig until he reaches a rock or virgin earth, i.e., earth that appears that it has never been tilled. If one dug even 100 cubits deep and discovered earth that was plowed, the original requirement remains and one must dig deeper until he reaches virgin earth. If one reaches water, it is as if he reached virgin earth.

7 When making this inspection, a person does not have to dig a trench extending from the beginning of the twenty cubits until their end. Instead, it is sufficient for him to dig a trench one cubit by one cubit, leave a cubit as is, and dig another cubit by cubit trench, continuing this pattern until the end. The rationale is that there is never less than a cubit between one grave and another.

8 If while one was checking, within the twenty cubits, he reached a river, an irrigation channel, or a public thoroughfare, he should cease. There is no need to search further, because the burial area has been interrupted.

9 The person who removes the earth which is searched is considered as pure unless impurity is discovered in the place which was dug up. Before it is discovered, he may partake of terumah.

One who is digging up a landslide may not partake of terumah, for it is certain that there are corpses under the landslide. It is only that he is not aware of their location.

10 The following laws apply when an impure landslide becomes intermingled with two pure landslides. If one inspected one of them and found it to be pure, it is considered pure and the others impure. If he inspected two of them and found them to be pure, they are considered pure and the other impure. If he inspected all three and found them to be pure, they are all presumed to be impure until he inspects the three of them to the extent that he reaches a stone or virgin earth and discovers all three to be pure.

11 When there is a pit into which miscarried fetuses are cast, one who stands over it is impure according to Scriptural Law. Although moles and hyenas are found there, a mere possibility does not change the definitive ruling based on prior conditions. If, however, a woman cast a miscarried fetus there and it was not determined whether she miscarried something which imparts impurity or not, since there are moles and hyenas there, the multiple doubts cause the place to be deemed pure.

12 It is well known that all these and other similar instances which are ruled impure although there is a doubt involved are Rabbinic safeguards. According to Scriptural Law, only one who has definitely contracted impurity is deemed impure. All stringencies stemming from doubt, whether with regard to ritual impurity, forbidden foods, forbidden intimate relations, or the observance of the Sabbath, are only Rabbinic in origin, as we explained in Hilchot Issurei Bi'ah and in other places. Nevertheless, when there is a situation where one would be liable for karet for an intentional violation, it is forbidden by Scriptural Law to act in a manner that allows for the possibility that one committed such a violation, as evidenced by the fact that one who performs such an act is obligated to bring a provisional guilt-offering, as stated in Hilchot Shegagot.

Chapter 10

1 What is meant by a beit hapras? A place where a grave was plowed over. Since, in such a situation, the bones of the corpse are crushed and dispersed throughout the field, our Sages decreed that any field where a grave was plowed over is impure. This applies even if one plowed over a coffin and even when the corpse was placed under stone tablets or rocks. Even if there are two stories high of earth above a coffin, since one plowed over the grave, the field is considered as a beit hapras.

How large an area is considered as a beit hapras? 100 cubits by 100 cubits from the place of the grave.

2 All of this square, which is an area in which four se'ah of grain can be sown is a beit hapras. Its earth imparts impurity when it is touched or carried, as we explained. It does not impart impurity because of ohel. Similarly, one who stands over a beit hapras is pure.

3 If one began to plow and plowed over a grave, and while continuing to plow, before he completed the 100 cubits, shook out the plow or knocked it against a rock or a fence, he makes the field a beit hapras only to that point. The remainder of the 100 cubits are pure, because he did not reach it while continuing to plow.

If he plowed 50 cubits or more and then continued plowing until he completed the 100 cubits, the entire area is considered a beit hapras. If he continued plowing beyond the 100 cubits, the area beyond 100 cubits is pure, because the bones in the grave will not be carried more than 100 cubits.

4 We operate under the assumption that bones that were buried are human unless it is known that they came from an animal. Conversely, we operate under the assumption that any bones that are openly revealed are from an animal unless it is known that they are human.

When there was a trench filled with human bones or there were human bones piled on earth, and one plowed these bones together with a field or one plowed a field in which a grave was lost or one in which a grave was discovered, a beit hapras is not created. For our Sages deemed impure only a field in which a grave whose identity was definitely known was plowed. Similarly, when one plows the body of a corpse together with a field, it is not deemed a beit hapras. The rationale is that all these are uncommon situations and our Sages instituted their decree only with regard to a field that was plowed, for this is a common situation.

5 When a person plows a grave in a field that does not belong to him, he does not create a beit hapras, because a person cannot cause an article that does not belong to him to become forbidden. Even a partner, a sharecropper, or a guardian does not create a beit hapras.
When a person plowed over a grave in a field which belongs to him and to a colleague as one, he creates a beit hapras in his portion, but not in the portion belonging to his colleague.

6 When a gentile plows a grave in his field, he does not create a beit hapras, because the concept of a beit hapras does not apply with regard to gentiles.

7 When there is a field which is a beit hapras above and a field that is pure below and rain washes the earth from the beit hapras to the pure field, it remains pure. These laws apply even the earth of the lower field was red and it became white or it was white and it became red. The rationale is that a beit hapras does not make a second beit hapras and impurity was decreed only on the earth in its original state.

8 It is permitted to plant any tree or bush in a beit hapras, because their roots extend below three handbreadths and the area below three handbreadths in a beit hapras is pure, for the bones from the grave are spread out over the surface of the field. We do not, by contrast, sow in it any seeds from which grow crops that are not reaped.

If one sowed crops in such a field and harvested them by uprooting them, one must collect the grainheap in that field and sift the grain with two sifters - and if one grew beans, with three sifters - lest one find a bone the size of a barley corn. One must burn the chaff of the grain and beans there. This is a decree lest there be a bone the size of a barley corn among it. If one were allowed to benefit from the chaff, he would take it out of the field and sell it and thus spread the impurity.

9 When there is a field that is presumed to be a beit hapras, we continue to operate under this assumption even if it is large enough to grow four kor of grain, even if it is to the side of a place of soft mud which is not plowed, and thus does not become a beit hapras, and even if a pure field surrounds it on all four sides.

10 When a person discovers a field that has been designated and does not know what the nature of the problem is, he should follow these guidelines. If it has trees in it, he should assume that a grave was plowed over in it. If it does not have trees, he should assume that a grave was lost in it, as has been explained. The above applies provided there is an elder or a Torah scholar in this place, because not every person is knowledgeable concerning such matters and is not aware that it is permitted to plant in this type of field and forbidden to plant in another.

11 When a person walks through a beit hapras on stones that do not wobble under a person's feet when he is walking on them or he enters it when he is riding on a person or an animal of formidable strength, he is pure. If, however, he walks on stones that usually shake while he treads upon them, even if he was careful and walked so that they would not shake, he is impure, as if he walked upon the ground itself. Similarly, if he was riding on a person who was not strong to the extent that his knees would knock against each other and his thighs would shake when he carried him or on an animal which was not strong to the extent that it would defecate when it carried him, he is impure as if he had walked on the field with his feet.

12 When a person purifies a beit hapras, he must purify it in the presence of two Torah scholars.

How does he purify it? He gathers together all the earth that he can move from the surface of the entire field and places it in a sieve with small holes. He breaks the earth into small pieces and removes any bone that is the size of a barley-corn. Alternatively, it is pure if he places three handbreadths of earth from another place upon it or removed three handbreadths of earth from its entire surface.

If he removed three handbreadths of earth from half the field and placed three handbreadths of earth over the other half, it is pure. If he removed a handbreadth and a half from its surface and placed another handbreadth and a half of earth from another place upon it, his actions are of no consequence. Similarly, if he leveled it and checked it from above and below while removing the rocks, his actions are of no consequence. If he paved it with stones that will not shake when a man walks upon it, it is pure.

1 With regard to the earth of the Diaspora: our Sages instituted a decree regarding a clod of earth - that it be considered like a beit hapras. They would only deem impure one who walked on it or touched or carried its earth. Afterwards, they decreed that even its space imparts impurity, even if one did not touch or carry its earth. Instead, even when one merely inserted his head and the majority of his body into the space of the Diaspora, he becomes impure. Similarly, if the open space of an earthenware implement was taken into the Diaspora or the larger portion of other types of implements were taken into the open space of the Diaspora, they contract impurity.

2 The impurity of the open space of the Diaspora is not as severe as the impurity of its earth, but instead, is more lenient. Because of the impurity of its earth, terumot and sacrificial foods are burnt and one who carries such earth contracts the impurity that lasts seven days and the ashes of the Red Heifer must be sprinkled on him on the third and seventh days. When, by contrast, one contracts impurity through entering its open space, it is not required that the ashes of the Red Heifer be sprinkled on him on the third and seventh days, merely that he immerse himself in a mikveh and wait until sunset. Similarly, the ruling concerning terumot and sacrificial foods that contracted impurity through entering its open space is held in abeyance; they are not eaten, nor are they burnt.

3 The earth of the Diaspora and the earth of a beit hapras impart impurity when touched or carried, as explained.

What is the measure that imparts impurity? The amount of earth necessary for a seal for sacks. This is the size of the large ball of a sack-maker's needle.

The following rules apply when the earth of the Diaspora or the earth of a beit hapras comes attached to a vegetable. If there is an amount the size of the seal of a sack in one place, it imparts impurity. If not, the various pieces of earth are not combined. The rationale is that our Sages instituted a decree only on a clod of earth in its natural state. An incident occurred when letters from the Diaspora were coming to the sons of the High Priests and there were about a se'ah or two of seals. They nevertheless did not show any concern regarding their impurity, because not one of the seals was as large as the seal of a sack.

4 The following rules apply when a person brings ovens, cups, and other earthenware utensils from the Diaspora. Until they were fired in a kiln, they are considered impure because of the earth of the Diaspora. Once they were fired, they are considered impure like an earthenware utensil that became impure in the lands of the Diaspora. Such a utensil does not impart impurity to people or utensils, as we explained.

5 When a person is walking on mountains and boulders in the Diaspora, he contracts the impurity that lasts seven days. If he proceeds in the sea or in a place where the waves of the sea wash up, he is pure despite the decree against touching the earth of the Diaspora, but is impure because of the decree against entering its open space.

One who enters the Diaspora in a cabinet, chest, or closet which are carried in the air is impure, because a tent that is movable, is not considered as a tent.

6 The earth of Syria is impure like the earth of the Diaspora. Its open space is pure, because a decree was not imposed concerning it.
Therefore if there was a portion of Syria next to Eretz Yisrael, one edge to the other edge without the earth of the Diaspora, a cemetery, or a beit hapras interposing between them, one could enter there in a state of purity in a cabinet, chest, or closet, provided he did not touch its earth. Similarly, if there is a portion of the earth of the Diaspora next to Eretz Yisrael and there is no place of impurity between them, it may be checked and is considered as pure.

7 A place where gentiles dwelled in Eretz Yisrael is considered impure like the earth of the Diaspora until it is inspected, lest a miscarried fetus have been buried there.

8 The ruling concerning terumah and sacrificial food that became impure because they were brought into a dwelling of the gentiles should be held in abeyance; they are not eaten, nor are they burnt.
How long must gentiles stay in a dwelling for it to require an inspection? 40 days, sufficient time for a woman to become pregnant and miscarry a fetus that conveys impurity. Even if a gentile man without a wife stays in a dwelling for 40 days, it is impure until it is inspected. This is a decree, instituted because of a dwelling where there is a woman. Even a servant, a eunuch, a woman, or a minor of nine years of age causes a dwelling to be considered as "the dwelling of a gentile."

9 If there was a Jewish servant, woman, or minor who was nine years old in a dwelling of the gentiles, guarding so that a fetus would not be buried there, an inspection is not required.

What do they inspect? The deep septic drains and the cisterns of squalid water. Wherever a pig or a mole could drag out the fetus, an inspection is not necessary, because it can be assumed that they will drag it out.

When a dwelling of the gentiles is destroyed, it is still considered impure, until it is inspected.

10 A covered walkway is not included in the decree concerning the dwellings of the gentiles because it is open and there is no place to hide a miscarried fetus.

There are ten places where the decree concerning the dwellings of the gentiles does not apply. Since these are not permanent dwellings, a decree considering them impure was not instituted with regard to them. These are the ten places: a) Arab tents, b) sukkot, c) rubber tents, d) storage areas, e) roofed areas above pillars without walls; people would dwell there in the summer, f) guard houses, g) the open space of a courtyard, h) a bathhouse, i) a workshop where arrows and other weapons are fashioned, and j) soldiers' barracks.

11 The decree applying to the dwellings of gentiles does not pertain to a store unless a gentile dwells there. When a courtyard is impure as a result of the decree applying to the dwelling of gentiles, its gatehouse and the open space above it are impure like it. The decree applying to the dwellings of gentiles and the concept of a beit hapras do not apply in the Diaspora.

12 The decree concerning the impurity of the earth of the Diaspora does not apply to gentile cities enclosed within the boundaries of Eretz Yisrael, e.g., Sisis and its suburbs, Ashkelon and its suburbs, despite the fact that they are exempt from the tithes and from the obligations of the Sabbatical year, Although the roadways taken by festive pilgrims from Babylon are surrounded by the earth of the Diaspora, they are presumed to be pure.

1 A covering that is a square, a handbreadth by a handbreadth and a handbreadth high brings ritual impurity and intervenes between ritual impurity according to Scriptural Law. For an ohel is given that distinction only when it is a handbreadth by a handbreadth and a handbreadth high or more.

What is implied? There was an olive-sized portion of a corpse lying with open space above it and implements (keilim), e.g., needles and spits, were at its side, without touching it. If one covered the portion of the corpse and the implements with an ohel that was a handbreadth by a handbreadth and was more than a handbreadth above the ground, the covering conveys impurity to the implements and renders them impure.

If there were other implements on top of this ohel that was a handbreadth by a handbreadth, they are pure, because the ohel intervenes between them and the impurity. Thus we have learnt that just as an ohel imparts impurity to everything that is under it, it preserves the purity of anything outside it, and intervenes between the impurity and the implements that are on top of it. Similarly, if the impurity was above the ohel and the implements were below it, the implements are pure, because the ohel intervenes in the face of impurity.

If the ohel was less than a handbreadth high or less than a handbreadth by a handbreadth, even if it was several handbreadths high, the implements that are next to the impurity are pure. Any of the implements that are above this ohel and are directly above the impurity are impure. The rationale is that they were positioned over the impurity and there was no ohel intervening in the face of the impurity. Similarly, if there was impurity above this ohel and implements beneath it, any implements that are directly beneath the impurity are impure, for the impurity was hanging over them and there is no ohel intervening in the face of the impurity. The rationale is that whenever there is less than a handbreadth of open space, it is considered as touching and the impurity under it is considered as "flush," as we explained.

When does the above apply? When the ohel was not a person or an implement. If, however, a person or an implement serves as an ohel over the impurity, whether they were the covering itself or the support for the covering, even if the implements were such that themselves do not contract impurity, they convey impurity and do not intervene in the face of impurity.

What is implied? If there was a board placed upon four men or on four implements, even stone implements or the like that do not contract impurity or, needless to say, if they were placed on four spits or four reeds that were a handbreadth high, and there was impurity and other implements beneath it, those implements are impure. If the implements were on top of the board, even if they were not directly above the impurity, they are impure. If there was impurity above the board and implements below it, all of the implements below the board are impure. If, however, the board was placed on four stones or on an animal or a beast and there was impurity under it, the implements on top of it are pure.

2 If there was impurity on top of a board, all of the implements under it are pure, because the ohel intervenes in the face of the impurity. Implements made from animal turds, stone implements, or implements made from earth that are oversized are considered as ohalim and not as implements. Therefore, they intervene in the face of impurity.

3 The following laws apply when a board was placed on top of a new oven and it protrudes beyond the oven on either side for more than a handbreadth. If there was impurity below the board, implements that are on top of it are pure. If there was impurity on top of it, the implements below it are pure. The rationale is that a new oven is not considered as a k'li in this context. If the oven was old, everything is impure.

4 When a board was placed over two ovens, even if they are old, and it protrudes beyond each oven and there is impurity below it, between the two ovens, only the space between them is impure. Keilim that are beneath the two ends that are beyond the ovens are pure, for the area beneath the ends and that beneath the ovens are considered as two tents, one next to the other.

Similarly, if a board was placed over an oven, even an old one, and it protruded a handbreadth at both ends, but not from the sides, should there be impurity under one end, keilim under the other end are not considered as impure.

5 The following laws apply when a person carries a k'li, e.g., a plow or the like, and one side of the k'li hung over impurity. If the circumference of the k'li was a handbreadth, even though its width was only a finger breadth and a third, it imparts impurity to the person carrying it. Impurity is conveyed to him according to Rabbinic Law, for our Sages decreed impurity for a k'li whose circumference is a handbreadth as a safeguard lest one be lenient when there is one whose width is a handbreadth. It does not, however, convey impurity to keilim that are below it or other people over which it hangs unless its width is a handbreadth.

6 Wooden coffins in which a corpse is placed are not considered as graves. Instead, if there is a handbreadth of empty space between the covering of the coffin and corpse, the cover is considered as an intervening substance and one who stands on the cover is considered as pure according to Scriptural Law. Nevertheless, although most coffins have an empty space of a handbreadth, since there are some which do not have such space, our Sages degreed that no coffin would be considered as an intervening substance. Thus one who walks on a coffin is considered as if he touched a corpse or a grave.

7 The following laws apply when a beam extended from one wall to another wall and there was impurity under it. If it was a handbreadth wide, it conveys impurity to everything under its entire span. Any keilim or persons under it are impure. This applies even if its width is not the same along the entire span and some portions are less than a handbreadth wide. The rationale is that these portions are considered as part of an ohel. If it is not a handbreadth wide, the impurity pierces through and ascends and pierces through and descends, as we explained.

How much must the circumference be for the board to have a width of a handbreadth? If it is round, three handbreadths. If it is square, four handbreadths.

8 When a barrel a se'ah in size was on its side in an open area, it does not convey impurity to everything under its entire expanse unless it is approximately four and half handbreadths in circumference. In this way, its upper portion will be a handbreadth and a half above the ground and there will be a portion of it, a handbreadth by a handbreadth a handbreadth above the ground. Accordingly, if it was suspended half a handbreadth above the ground and its circumference was three handbreadths, it conveys impurity.

Similarly, if there is a round pillar lying in an open space and resting on the earth, it does not convey impurity under its side unless it is 24 handbreadths in circumference. If it is not 24 handbreadths in circumference, the impurity pierces through and ascends and pierces through and descends. The reason that 24 handbreadths are required is that whenever there is a circumference of three, there is a width of one. Whenever there is a square, a handbreadth by a handbreadth, its diagonal will be a handbreadth and two fifths. Therefore if the pillar's circumference was 24 handbreadths, there is a little bit more than a handbreadth by a handbreadth that is a handbreadth high under its entire side. All of these calculations are approximations. This is its form.

1 Whenever there is a covering that is a handbreadth by a handbreadth that is a handbreadth high, it is considered an ohel, as we explained. It intervenes in the face of ritual impurity and conveys ritual impurity whether it was made as a shelter or came into being as a matter of course. Even if it was brought into being without human activity, it conveys ritual impurity and intervenes in the face of it.

What is implied? If there was a cavern that was hollowed out by water or crawling animals or even if the earth itself cratered or one gathered stone and beams and created a covered space of a handbreadth, it is considered as an ohel and it conveys ritual impurity and intervenes in the face of it.

2 When does the above apply? When the ohel was strong and sturdy. A unstable ohel, by contrast, does not convey ritual impurity, nor does it intervene in the face of ritual impurity according to Scriptural Law. According to Rabbinic Law, by contrast, it conveys ritual impurity, but does not intervene in the face of it.

What is implied? When branches of trees that hang over the earth which are called sichachot and stones which project outward from a wall that hang over the earth and are called peraot are sturdy enough to carry an average ceiling and remain standing, they convey impurity and intervene in the face of it according to Scriptural Law. If they are not sturdy enough to carry an average ceiling and would fall, they convey impurity according to Rabbinic decree and do not intervene in the face of it. Similar laws apply in all analogous situations.

3 These substances convey ritual impurity and intervene in the face of it: oversized wooden vessels, keilim made from stone, animal turds, or earth that are oversized, simple leather keilim, a curtain, a sheet, or a reed mat that are made like tents, animals or beasts, whether kosher or non-kosher, provided the head of one is placed between the legs of another and they are flush against each other, a bird that rests, one who digs out a place for a child in a grainheap to save him from the sun, and food that was not made ready to be susceptible to ritual impurity so that it would not become impure.

When vegetables continue to grow in the summer and the winter, they are considered like trees and convey ritual impurity and intervene in the face of it. Among those in this category are: mint, bindweed, wild gourd, and Greek squash. Similarly, all of the following - branches of trees that hang over the earth, stones which project outward from a wall, projections, balconies, dovecotes, the clefts of stones, stones that stick out of a wall, the arches of a wall, and stony precipices - convey ritual impurity and intervene in the face of it.

4 The following convey ritual impurity, but do not intervene in the face of it: a human being, wooden vessels that are not oversized, because they are like all other keilim and convey ritual impurity, simple leather keilim, a curtain, a sheet, or a reed mat that are not made like tents, but merely extended outward, without being on a slant or having walls, an animal or a beast that died, and impure foods or foods that were made susceptible to ritual impurity, for an impure substance does not intervene in the face of ritual impurity, and a hand mill, because it is in the category of stone keilim. All of these convey ritual impurity, but do not intervene in the face of it.

5 The following articles neither convey ritual impurity, nor do they intervene in the face of it: seeds, vegetables that are still connected to the ground with the exception of the four vegetables mentioned, a mound of hail, snow, sleet, ice, or salt, one who skips from place to place, one who runs from place to place, a bird that flies freely, a garment flying in the wind, or a ship that floats on the water. All these neither convey ritual impurity, nor do they intervene in the face of it. Although they create a covering, the covering is not lasting.

6 If one tied a ship to something that could anchor it or covered the corner of a garment with a stone, it conveys ritual impurity.

7 When there is a board floating in the water and there is impurity under one of its sides, the keilim under its other side are pure. The rationale is that, as we already explained, a ship that is floating does not convey impurity.

8 The following entities intervene in the face of ritual impurity, but do not convey impurity]: the threads of the woof on a weaver's loom, the cords of a bed, a net on which fertilizer is held, and lattice shades for windows.

How do they intervene in the face of impurity? If there was a window between two houses, impurity was found in one house, and one of these entities is extended over this window and covers it, it serves as an intervening substance and prevents impurity from entering the second house. This applies even if there is open space within the intervening article, provided there is not a square handbreadth of empty space in this lattice work, net, or cords. If there is a square handbreadth of empty space, impurity will enter as will be explained.

Chapter 14

1 Impurity does not enter a shelter, nor does it depart from it if there is an opening less than a handbreadth by a handbreadth.

What is implied? When there is a window between one house and another or between a house and a loft, if it is a square handbreadth by a handbreadth and there was impurity in one of the structures, the other structure is also impure. If the window does not comprise a handbreadth by a handbreadth, impurity does not depart from it, nor does it enter the second structure.

When does the above apply? With regard to a window made by a person for functional purposes. When, by contrast, a window was made by man for illumination, that light should enter, its measure is the size of pundiyon. Then ritual impurity departs through it.

What is implied? There was impurity in a house. A person came and
